barefoot, and not complain, I do not admire his patience, but pity the poor creature that hath benumbed his feet, and as it were soled them with a brawny dead kind of flesh, so as to lose his feeling : but save your pity much more for those whose consciences are so benumbed, and hearts petrified into a senseless stupidity, that they feel their misery no more than the stone doth the mason's saw which cuts it asunder. Of all men out of hell, none more to be pitied, than he that hangs over the mouth of it, and yet is fearless of his danger ; while thus the poor wretch is incapable of all means for his good. What good does physic put into a dead man's mouth ? if he cannot be chafed to some sense of his condition, all applications are in vain. And if afflictions (which are the strongest physic) leave the creature senseless, there is little hope left that any other will work upon him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3649.) Nor are we to take for this Christian grace the callousness which sometimes follows trials of great severity. They say that the wretch condemned to the Russian knout feels only the few first blows. After these have cut to the bone, and brought away long stripes of flesh from his quivering back, the power to feel is gone. The nerves are crushed, their life destroyed ; his head droops, and the lash falls on the dying man as if he were already dead. And some such callousness has come over hearts that have suffered many and severe afflictions ; future trials giving them no more pain than the hot iron gives the blacksmith's horny hand. I once knew one, a Christian widow, who had early lost the husband of her youth. Other losses succeeded. The pledges of their love, a son and daughter, were snatched from her arms ; her house was left unto her desolate. But these blows did not, as many feared, break that bruised reed. A pious woman, she was patient, resigned to the will of the widow's Husband ; still it was not patience that replied to my sympathy, when, alluding to her first great trial, she said, " My first grief made so large a hole in my heart, that now it can hold no common sorrow. —Guthrie.

2. It is not stubborn.

(3650.) Some bear their sufferings as, if we are to believe the stories we have read, the Indian bears his tortures. Tied to the stake, abandoned of hope, looking on his last sun, a crowd of enemies dance round him with frantic gestures and brandished knives ; and they go round and round in the horrid dance, though avoiding to wound, they strike at his throat and face ; but the red man stands motionless, erect : nor shrinks, nor winks, nor gives sign of terror. Ingeniously cruel, they search out the most delicate seats of feeling, and thrust the burning match up to the quick. Inch by inch they cut his living form to pieces ; but, with blood, they wring out no groan from that defiant man. Naming their braves he has slain and scalped in the battle, this hero of the forest sings his bold death-song, scorning their powers of torture. How different from the central object in this savage scene the form of Christian patience, her head meekly bowing to the hand of God ; heaven in her eye ; resignation in her face ; and on her pale lips the seal of silence ! It is pride, not patience, thus sustains yonder haughty savage—stubborn endurance, the power of an iron will. And in some who, uncomplaining, suffer pain, or loss, or wrong, or calumny, their silence, though they get credit for patience, may be but pride. It is a well-known fact, that a man who stands erect can carry a heavier burden on his head than he can on his back ; and raising itself to the occasion, pride has stood erect under crushing burdens, confronted misfortune, and, while smarting under insult and injuries, has scorned to gratify its enemies by betraying a sign of pain. This is but the counterfeit of patience. —Guthrie.

3. It is not ostentatious.

(3651.) There is a patience that cackles. There are a great many virtues that are hen-like. They are virtues, to be sure ; but everybody in the neighbourhood has to know about them. —Becher.

II. ITS EXCELLENCY.

(3652.) They who are wicked, although they cannot see the goodness of other virtues, yet can see the goodness of patience, and perceive when they see a patient man and an impatient man both sick of one disease, yet both are not troubled alike, but that he who has most patience has most ease, and he who is most impatient is most tormented, like a fish which strives with the hook.

—Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

(3653.) The nobleness of a Christian is seen in his patience. Magnanimity is patient ; like the flint which hath fire in it, but it appears not till it be stricken. —Adams, 1653.

(3654.) Patience is the best chemist, for out of coarse earth she can draw pure gold, out of trouble peace, out of sorrow joy, out of persecution profit, out of affliction comfort. She teacheth the bondman in a narrow prison to enjoy all liberty. He hath within those strict limits his galleries, his walks, his orchards : though he be alone, he never wants company ; though his diet be penury, his sauce is content : all his miseries cannot make him sick, because they are digested by patience. It makes the poor beggar rich : though he goes for his drink to the well, for his bread to another's cupboard, for his garments to the refuse of a cast wardrobe ; yet he looks with as cheerful a countenance, as he that " was clothed in purple, and fared sumptuously every day : " or he that said to his soul, " Eat, drink, and be merry," for this man had but a purpose to be merry, but the patient man is merry indeed. A superior's unjust frowns are all one to him with his flattering smiles ; and causeless aspersions do but rub his glory the brighter. The jailers that watch him are but his pages of honour, and his very dungeon but the lower side of the vault of heaven. He kisseth the wheel that must kill him ; and thinks the stairs of the scaffold of his martyrdom but so many degrees of his ascent to glory. The tormentors are weary of him, the beholders have pity on him, all men wonder at him ; and while he seems below all men, below himself, he is above nature. He hath so overcome himself, that nothing can conquer him. —Adams, 1653.

(3655.) Patience is the true peace-maker. It is the soft answer that breaketh wrath ; cross and thwarting language rather strengthens it : as a flint is sooner broken with a gentle stroke upon a feather bed, than stricken with all the might against a hard coggle. —Sanderson, 1587-1662.

(3656.) Do we desire to lighten our load of sorrow? Oh! there is a buoyancy and strength in the meek and patient spirit, that bears it as the appointment of God. Like the branches of the palm, so significant of victory, that seem to develop an elastic power in proportion to the weight that is laid upon them, it puts on new strength under every pressure of additional affliction. Patience is as a case of armour round the heart, which deadens the blows inflicted on it; while impatience not only strips off that covering, but lays the very quick, in all its tenderness and delicacy of nerve, bare to the wounding knife.

—Wiseman, 1802-1864.

III. ITS NECESSITY.

(3657.) So many things fall out contrary unto our minds every day, that he who wants patience in this world is like a man who stands trembling in a field without his armour, because every one can strike him, and he can strike none. So the least push of pain, or loss, or disgrace; troubles that man more who has not skill to suffer, than twenty trials can move him who is armed with patience, like a golden shield in his hand, to break the stroke of every cross, and save the heart though the body suffers. For while the heart is whole, all is well. "A sound spirit," says Solomon, "will bear his infirmity, but a wounded spirit what can sustain?"

—Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

(3658.) Every Christian soldier's escutcheon must be: "Patience," and his motto: "I serve."

—Adams, 1653.

(3659.) Patience hath her work too; for the most godly conversation will be exercised with troubles. Either the good we would have shall be deferred, or the evil we would not have shall be imposed; we shall mar all if we lose our patience. The same measure of trouble being laid upon two men, is far lighter to him that bears it with patience. Of how pure wood soever an instrument is made, yet if it warp with the sun, or crack with the weather, we dislike it. Let us not lose our credit of the holiness by the least murmur of impatience.

—Adams, 1653.

(3660.) Patience to the soul is as bread to the body, the staff of either the natural or spiritual life: we eat bread with all our meats, both for health and relish; bread with flesh, bread with fish, bread with broths and fruits. Such is patience to every virtue; we must hope with patience, and pray in patience, and love with patience, and whatsoever good thing we do, let it be done in patience.

—Adams, 1653.

(3661.) If because you are Christians you promise yourselves a long lease of temporal happiness, free from troubles and afflictions, it is as if a soldier going to the wars should promise himself peace and continual truce with the enemy: or as if a mariner committing himself to the sea for a long voyage should promise himself nothing but fair and calm weather, without waves and storms; so irrational it is for a Christian to promise himself rest here upon earth. Well, then, let us learn beforehand how to be abased, and how to abound. He that is in a journey to heaven must be provided for all weathers; though it be sunshine when he first sets forth, a storm will overtake him before he comes to his journey's end. It is good to be fore-armed, afflictions will come, and we should prepare accordingly. We enter upon the profession of godliness, upon these terms, to be willing to suffer afflictions if the Lord see fit: and therefore should arm ourselves with a mind to endure them, whether they come or no.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3662.) The Christian's patience is his back on which he bears his burdens; and some afflictions are so heavy, that he needs a broad one to carry them well. But if hope lay not the pillow of the promise between his back and the burden, the least cross will prove intolerable. It is therefore called "the patience of hope."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

IV. ENCOURAGEMENTS TO ITS EXERCISE:

1. Under provocation.

(3663.) We should prevent reproach as much as we can; but then we must bear it when we cannot avoid it. God will try how we can bear the injuries of men. The grace of patience must be tried as well as other graces. We read that Shimei went railing upon David to the peril of his life. Saith David, "It may be God hath bid him curse." A mad dog that bites another makes him as mad as himself. So usually the injuries and reproaches of others foster up our revenge, and then there is no difference between them and us. They sin, and we sin. Revenge and injury differ only in order; injury is first, and revenge is next. Saith Lactantius, "If it be evil in another, for thee to imitate him, to be mad as he, to break out in passion and virulency, it is more evil in thyself, because thou sinnest twice, against a rule and against an example." —Manton, 1620-1667.

2. Under persecution.

(1.) Impatience will but aggravate our misery.

(3664.) When a bird comes to be immured in the cage, being taken from its natural range in the air and the woods, and begins to feel the injury of a restraint and the closeness of a prison, it strives and flutters to recover its native liberty; and perhaps with striving breaks a wing or a leg, and so pines away: and after all this unquietness, is yet forced at last to die in the cage.

It is so with a person overpowered in his right, and bereaved of it by those with whom he cannot grapple. Christianity and reason command him not here to labour in vain, but to make a virtue of necessity and to acquiesce, expecting the issues of Providence, which disposes of things by a rule known only to itself. And by so doing a man is no worse than he was before; but the peace is maintained, and the rewards of patience may be well expected.

—South, 1633-1716.

(2.) Persecution affords an opportunity for the display of our Christian graces.

(3665.) This is the true valour of a Christian, when he can bear his cross without murmuring, overrule his own nature drawing him to revenge, return benefits for injuries, and overcome evil with goodness, according to the example of our Heavenly Father. Then he shows his fortitude, and most gloriously triumphs over his spiritual enemies, when he vanquishes without striking, and though unarmed of all offensive weapons doth courageously march into the field, having nothing in his hand but the shield of patience, and by bearing the blows gets the greater victory. Then he shows his valour and unmatchable strength, when like a firm rock he stands in a sea of miseries, and, when the huge billows of affliction beat upon him, is not moved, but breaks them in pieces with their own violence. Finally, then doth Christian prowess and magnanimity appear, when we keep our standing, as it were daring afflictions after one assault to encounter us again; and with unwearied and invincible constancy continue the fight, till, our enemies being overcome, our great commander the Lord of hosts sounds the retreat, either giving us the warrant of His word for our leaving the field, or calling us by death to receive that glorious crown of victory.

—Downe, 1644.

(3.) It only befalls us by God's permission, and for our good.

(3666.) Joseph said to his brethren, "You did intend me hurt, but God did intend me good." So it may be said concerning all ungodly, wicked men: they do intend evil against the Church and people of God, but God intends His people's good, and, in conclusion, effects it.

—Whitaker, 1647.

(4.) God will bring us triumphantly out of it.

(3667.) When we see one in the streets from every dunghill gather old pieces of rags and dirty clouts, little would we think that of those old rotten rags, beaten together in the mill, there should be made such pure fine white paper, as afterwards we see there is. Thus the poor despised children of God may be cast out into the world as dung and dross, may be smeared and smooted all over with lying amongst the pots; they may be in tears, perhaps in blood, both broken-hearted and broken-boned; yet, for all this, they are not to despair, for God will make them one day shine in joy, like the bright stars of heaven, and make of them royal imperial paper, whereon He will write His own name for ever.

—Baiquanqual, 1634.

(5.) The hour of our deliverance is at hand.

(3668.) The saint's night is darkest a little before their deliverance; as a little before the dawning of the day the darkness is most dense and terrible. So it was in Egypt a little before Israel's deliverance, and their return from captivity. And this should mightily encourage us, in these times, not to be disheartened though our miseries should increase, for the darker and the bigger the cloud is, it will the sooner break; therefore wait with patience.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

8. Under the apparent delays of Providence.

(3669.) The duty that David brought his heart to, before he had a full enjoyment of what he looked for, was patient waiting, it being God's use to put a long date oftentimes to the performances of His promises. David, after he had the promise of a kingdom, was put off a long time ere he was invested to it; Abraham was an old man before he enjoyed his son of promise. Joseph stayed a long time before he was exalted; our blessed Saviour Himself was thirty-four years old before He was exalted up into glory.

God defers, but His deferring is no empty space, wherein no good is done; but there is in that space a sitting for promises; whilst the seed lies hid in the earth, time is not lost, for winter fits for a spring, yea, the harder the winter, the more hopeful the spring; yet were it a mere empty space, we should hold out, because of the great things to come; but being only a preparing time, we should pass it with less discouragement. Let this support us in all the thwartings of our desire. It is a lolly to think, that we should have physic and health both at once. We must endure the working of God's physic. When the sick humour is carried away purged, then we shall enjoy desired health. God promises forgiveness of sin, but thou findest the burden of it daily on thee. Cheer up thyself: when the morning is darkest, then comes day; after a weary week comes a Sabbath, and after a fight victory will appear. God's time is best, therefore resolve upon waiting His leisure.

—Sibber, 1577-1635.

4. Under affliction.

(1.) Impatience will only increase and prolong our misery.

(3670.) When a child, being corrected of his father, suffereth it patiently, his father hath the more pity upon him, and holdeth his hand, and ceaseth the sooner; but if the child show himself forward, cry anything loud, or murmur and grudge against him, then is the father the more angry and fierce over him, and beateth him the more sharply: even so our Heavenly Father punisheth the patient man the more easily, and healeth him the sooner; but toward them that murmur against Him He sheweth Himself sharp and fierce.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(3671.) Considerable are the causes why a broken leg is incurable in a horse and easily curable in a man: the horse is incapable of counsel to submit himself to the farrier, and, therefore, in case his leg be set, he flings, he flounces, and flies out, unjointing it again by his misemployed mettle, counting all binding to be but shackles and fetters unto him; whereas a man willingly resigneth himself to be ordered by the chirurgeon, preferring rather to be a prisoner for some days than a cripple all his life. Thus, it were heartily to be wished that men would not be like the horse or mule, which have no understanding, but let patience have its perfect work in them, so that when they are, as it were, overwhelmed in a deluge of distress, finding no way to get out, they would tarry God's time, and though deliverance come not in an instant, yea, though to wait be irksome at the present, in due time they shall certainly receive comfort.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3672.) A man under God's affliction is like a bird in a net; the more he strives, the more he is entangled.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3673.) It is not wise to fret under our trials; the high-mettled horse that is restive in the yoke but galls his shoulder; the poor bird that dashes herself against the bars of the cage but ruffles her feathers, and aggravates the sufferings of captivity.

—Guthrie.

(2.) Affliction is inevitable in this life.

(3674.) The whole creation groans, and God's children bear a part in the concert. They have their share in the world's miseries; and domestical crosses are common to them with other men in the world : yea, their condition is worse than other's. Chaff and corn are threshed in the same floor, but the corn is grinded in the mill and baked in the oven. Jeremiah was in the dungeon when the city was besieged. The world hates them more than others, and God loves them more than others. The world hates them because they are so good, and God corrects them because they are no better. There is more care exercised about a vine than a bramble. God will not let them perish with the world. Great receipts call for great expenses first or last. God sees it fitting sometimes at first setting forth, as the old Germans were wont to dip their children in the Rhine to harden them, so to season them for their whole course, and they must bear the yoke from their youth or first acquaintance with God (Heb. x. 32). Sometimes God lets them alone while they are young and raw, and of little experience, as we are tender of trees newly planted, as Jacob drove as the little ones were able to bear. "He will not suffer you to be tempted above what you are able." They are let alone till middle age, till they are of some standing in religion ; "Moses when he was come to years" (Heb. xi. 24). Sometimes they are let alone till their latter time, and their season of fighting comes not till they are ready to go out of the world, that they may die fighting and be crowned in the field ; but first or last the cross comes, and there is a time to exercise our faith and patience before we inherit the promises.

—Nanton, 1620-1667.

(3.) Afflictions are the chastisements of a loving Father.

(3675.) If we endure grievous afflictions, and find that our Heavenly Father doth correct us sharply, we are not to impute it to any want of love in Him, as though He took any pleasure in our pain, but are to lay the fault wholly upon ourselves, who are so stubborn and undutiful, that more gentle corrections would not reclaim us. For if there be such love and tenderness in earthly parents (which notwithstanding is but a little drop distilled into them from this fountain, or rather ocean, of mercy and compassion) that they desire, and chiefly delight in showing their kind affection to their children, and in giving to them all testimonies of love ; and are loath to correct them for their faults, if any admonitions will amend them, never thinking stripes seasonable but when they see them necessary ; yea, if their love is such that, according to the same necessity, they are not willing to give them one blow more than they think necessary for their amendment ; then how much less will the Lord exceed this measure of necessity, seeing He both infinitely excels all earthly parents in love and goodness, as being not only gracious, but the God of grace, and not only loving, but Love itself (1 John iv. 8) ; and is alike infinite in wisdom, and therefore cannot, like earthly parents, be deceived in the proportion of His chastisements, but justly knows how much is necessary, and neither too much, nor too little, for the amendment of His children.

—Downname, 1644.

(3676.) God is the greatest of kings and potentates, but yet has nothing of a tyrant in His nature, how ill and tragically soever some may represent Him. He takes no delight in our groans, no pleasure in our tears, but those that are penitential. It is no pastime to Him to view the miseries of the distressed, to hear the cries of the orphan or the sighs of the widow. "God does not willingly afflict the children of men : " He seems to share in the suffering, while He inflicts it ; and to feel the very pain of His own blows, while they fall heavy upon the poor sinner. Judgment is called God's "strange work ; " a work that He has no proneness to, nor finds any complacency in : and therefore, whensoever He betakes Himself to it, we may be confident that it is not for the sake of the work itself, but that He has some secret, overruling design of love, which He is to compass after an unusual, extraordinary way. He never lops and prunes us with His judgments, because He delights to see us bare, and poor, and naked, but because He would make us fruitful ; nor would He cause us to pass through the fiery furnace, but to purge and to refine us. For can it be any pleasure to the physician to administer loathsome potions or bitter pills ? or can it be any satisfaction to a father to employ a surgeon to cut off his child's arm, were not the taking away a part found necessary to secure the whole ? Common humanity never uses the lance to pain and torture, but to restore the patient. But now, the care and tenderness of an earthly parent or physician is but a faint shadow and resemblance of that infinite compassion and affection which God bears to His children, even in the midst of His severest usage of them. —South, 1633-1716.

(4.) God watches over His people in their trials.

(3677.) Thou seest sometimes a father setting down his little one upon its feet to try its strength, and see whether it be yet able to stand by itself or no ; but withal he holds his arms on both sides to uphold it, if he sees it incline either way, and to preserve it from hurt. Assure thyself thy Heavenly Father takes care of thee with infinitely more tenderness in all thy trials either by outward afflictions or inward temptations. "Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down ; for the Lord upholdeth him with His hand." Never did goldsmith attend so curiously and punctually upon those precious metals he casts into the fire, to observe the very first season, and be sure that they tarry no longer in the furnace than the dross be wasted, and they be thoroughly purified and fitted for some excellent use, as our gracious God lovingly waits to take thee out of trouble and temptation, when the rust is removed from thy spiritual armour, thy graces shine out, and thou art heartily humbled and happily fitted to do Him more glorious service for the time to come.

—Bolton, 1572-1631.

(5.) The purpose of our affliction is to restore us to spiritual health.

(3678.) Like as they that are diseased can be content to suffer any of the members of their body to be cut off and to be burnt, so that they might be eased thereby of their continual pain, which is yet but transitory, and be made whole again ; even so ought we willingly to suffer our Lord God, and to be quiet when He sendeth us adversity, whereby we may be relieved of eternal pain, and obtain health, bliss, and salvation for our souls.

—Wermulders, 1551.

(3679.) Our Physician makes these outward blisters in our bodies, to draw out the poisonous corruption that is in our souls : and therefore let us endure what He imposes with patience, and never murmur against Him for effecting His cure ; knowing that it is but childish folly to abhor the medicine more than the disease, and that we count them madmen who rage against the physician who intends their recovery.

Let us rather rejoice that the Lord is content to minister to us, because seeing He undertakes to cure us by these medicines, it is a sign that we are not past recovery. For when in our diseases our estate is desperate, He leaves us to our own appetite, to have what our hearts can desire, and to take our fill of the pleasures of sin. —Downname, 1644.

(3680.) The Lord takes away from His children worldly honours, when He sees that they would be by them puffed up with pride, and become insolent and vain-glorious. Thus He deprives them of riches, when they would be unto them thorns, to choke and hinder the growth of His heavenly graces, or incitements to sin, or the means and instruments to further them in wicked actions, or, like camel's hunches, hinder them from entering into the straight gate which leads to happiness. Thus He takes from us parents, children, and dear friends, when, if we should still enjoy them, we would make them our idols, setting our hearts upon, loving, or trusting in them more than in God Himself. So He deprives us of our earthly pleasures, when He sees that we would prefer them before heavenly joys ; and causes us to find many troubles, crosses, and afflictions in the world, because He knows that if it should smile and fawn upon us, we would make a paradise of the place of our pilgrimage, set our hearts and affections upon these transitory trifles, and never care to travel in the way of holiness and righteousness which leads to our heavenly country.

As therefore skilful physicians do not only apply medicines for the curing of diseases, when men are fallen into them, but also in time of infection, and when they see some distemper in them through the abounding of humours, give wholesome preservatives to maintain health, and to drive away the approaching disease ; so our heavenly Physician uses these potions of afflictions, not only to cure us of the diseases of sin, but also to purge away our inward corruptions, and so to prevent these deadly sicknesses of the soul.

The consideration whereof should move us to bear all our afflictions with much patience and comfort. —Downname, 1644.

(3681.) Look upon thy affliction as thou dost upon thy physic ; both imply a disease, and both are applied for a cure,—that of the body, this of the soul. If they work, they promise health ; if not, they threaten death. He is not happy that is not afflicted, but he that finds happiness by his affliction. Quarles, 1592-1644.

(3682.) Provoke not God, and nothing will proceed from Him but what is good and comfortable. He does not punish or chasten men for holiness and well-doing ; no, it is for want of holiness. Shall the physician be blamed for the trouble of physic, when the patient has contracted a surfeit that makes it necessary ?

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3683.) Under trials we act the part of children, and suffer ourselves to be governed by sense, and not by reason. Take a sick child, it is in vain to reason with him. He shuns the bitterness of the draught ; he will not suffer you to touch the sore place, though you assure him it is the only means by which he can be restored to health. No matter, the child is under the dominion of sense, not of reason, and he is, therefore, wholly governed by the feelings of his senses. So, when cast into the furnace, and under the hands of our gracious Refiner, we are no longer men, but children. It is the flesh which now dictates, and not the spirit. What cares the flesh for argument or reason ? it will not assuage its pain, or take away its suffering. It would turn away from the cup, however medicinal, and from the hand of Him who would heal us. —Salter.

(3684.) The woes of broken health and grim depression ; the pains, the unspeakable agonies by which human bodies are wrenched for whole years ; the wrongs of orphanage ; pestilence, fire, flood, tempest, and famine,—how can a good God launch His bolts on men, we ask, in severities like these ? And the sufferers themselves sometimes wonder, even in their faith, how it is that if God is a father, He can let fall on His children such hail-storms of inevitable, unmitigated disaster. No, suffering mortal ! a truce to all such complainings. These are only God's merciful indirections, fomentations of trouble and sorrow, that He is applying to soften the rugged and hard will in you. These pains are only switches to turn you off from the track of His coming retributions. If your great, proud nature could be won to the real greatness of character by a tenderer treatment, do you not see, from all God's gentle methods of dealing with mankind, that He gladly would soften your troubles ? And if diamonds are not polished by soap, or oil, or even by any other stone, but only by their own fine dust, why should you complain that God is tempering you to your good only by such throes and lacerations and wastings of life as are necessary. —Bushnell.

(6.) We are under the care of a Physician who is "too wise to err, and too good to be unkind."

(3685.) When we have on our bodies wounds or deeply-festered sores, we voluntarily send for the surgeon, and yield ourselves into his hands to be used at his discretion, for the effecting of the cure. We are content that he should not only apply healing plasters, but tormenting corrosives, and that he should search our sores to the bottom, lance and sear, yea, cut off a member for the preservation of the whole body : and fearing lest we should not have courage and strength enough to endure these tortures, we are willing to be bound, that we may not by our struggling and striving hinder him in his courses. So when we are diseased, we crave the help of the learned physician, and are content for the curing of our sickness to follow his direction, to swallow bitter pills and loathsome potions, to use strict diet or total abstinence, and to eat, drink, sleep, and labour, not according to our appetite and natural disposition, but according to his direction ; yea, all this we not only patiently endure, but are ready to gratify their pains with thankfulness and reward. And therefore if in uncertain hope to recover the health of our body, which can last but for a moment, and is ready presently after the cure to languish again, falling into a relapse of the old grief, or into other diseases more dangerous than they, we are content to endure all these miseries at the appointment of mortal men, who often are unfaithful, seeking more their own gain than our health, and often unskilful, neither truly knowing the nature of our disease nor the means how to cure it; how much more should we with all alacrity and cheerfulness endure any crosses and afflictions, when they are used by our heavenly Physician and Surgeon for the curing and healing our souls of the dangerous diseases and sores of sin, which would bring us in the end unto everlasting death, seeing we are certainly assured that He will by this means recover us unto perfect and never-decaying health, as being most faithful and careful over us, and in His wisdom and skill infinite and all-sufficient for the effecting of the cure.

—Downname, 1644.

(3686) When we see that our heavenly Physician has provided divers kinds of medicines for His divers patients; let us not wonder at it. For either their diseases are diverse, or they are diverse in their constitution; and it becometh not the skill of our heavenly Physician, like the ignorant empiric to apply one salve for all sores, and the same medicine for all kind of maladies, but to fit the remedy according to the nature of the infirmity, and condition of the party. And if we have a potion of the largest size and loathsome in taste appointed for us, let us not think it too much, and murmur against our physician, who knows better than we what medicine is fittest for the curing of our diseases. Neither let us say that others have worse sores and more gentle salves, more dangerous sicknesses, and more easy remedies; for if we are often mistaken in our bodily diseases and think that we are in no peril, when the physician sees that our sickness is almost desperate, and in this regard rest not upon our own feeling, but upon his skill, and willingly take that which he prescribes, then how much more may we be deceived in the sicknesses of our souls, thinking our dangerous diseases to be but small infirmities, and deep consumptions in grace but some little distemper and faint languishing; and therefore how much rather should we refer ourselves wholly to the skill and wisdom, of God who cannot err for want of judgment, because He knows all things, nor for want of care, because His love is infinite.

—Downname, 1644.

(3687.) If there be such love and care in a faithful and learned physician that, according to his skill, he will take for the ease of his patient the gentlest courses which he thinks sufficient for the effecting of the cure, how much more may we be assured that our heavenly Physician, who never fails for want of skill, and is also infinite in love and goodness, will never use sharper means than our sickness requires. And, therefore, if we with patience and contentment resign ourselves over to the skill and fidelity of our earthly physicians, though they sometimes fail in both, and do not limit them either in respect of the quantity or quality of their physic, how much more should we wholly rely upon the Lord, neither presenting to Him what we must take, nor how long we must be under cure.

—Downname, 1644.

(3688.) A surgeon, when he meeteth with a sore festered, applieth some sharp corrosive to eat out the dead flesh that would otherwise spoil the cure, which, being done, the patient, it may be, impatient of anguish and pain, cries out to have it removed. "No," says the surgeon, "it must stay there till it hath eaten to the quick, and effected that thoroughly for which it is applied;" commanding those that are about him to see that nothing be stirred till he come again to him. In the meantime, the patient, being much pained, counts every minute an hour till the surgeon comes back again; and if he stay long, thinketh that he hath forgotten him, or that he is taken up with other patients, and will not return in any reasonable time; when, as it may be, he is all the while but in the next room to him, attending the hour-glass, purposely set up till the plaster have had its full operation. Thus, in the self-same manner, doth God deal oftentimes with His dearest children, as David and St. Paul. The one was instant, more than once or twice, to be rid of that evil; and the other cries out as fast, "Take away the plague from me, for I am even consumed," &c.; but God makes both of them to stay His time. He saw in them, as in all others, much corrupt matter behind, that was as yet to be eaten out of their souls; He will have the cross to have its full work upon us, not to come out of the fire as we went in, nor to come off the fire as foul and as full of scum as we were first set on.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(3689.) I observe, when such operations are necessary, if people are satisfied of a surgeon's skill and prudence, they will not only yield to be cut at his pleasure, without pretending to direct him where, or how long he shall make the incision, but will thank and pay him for putting them to pain, because they believe it for their advantage. I wish I could be more like them in my concerns. My body is, through mercy, free from considerable ailments, but I have a soul that requires surgeon's work continually; there is some tumour to be discussed or laid open, some dislocation to be reduced, some fracture to be healed almost daily. It is my great mercy, that One who is infallible in skill, who exercises incessant care and boundless compassion towards all His patients, has undertaken my case; and complicated as it is, I dare not doubt His making a perfect cure. Yet alas! I too often discover such impatience, distrust, and complaining, when under His hand, am so apt to find fault with the instruments He is pleased to make use of, so ready to think the salutary wounds He makes unnecessary or too large; in a word, I show such a promptness to control were I able, or to direct His operations, that, were not His patience beyond expression, He would before now have given me up.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(3690.) When we are pierced with afflictions, the way is not to go to God and say, "Take away this thorn." God says, "No; I put it there to bleed you where you are plethoric." Suffering well borne is better than suffering removed.

—Becher.

(3691.) I will bear it

With all the tender suifrance of a friend,
As calmly as the wounded patient bears
The artist's hand that ministers his cure.

—Ormsby.

(7.) Affliction is a vocation whereby God honours us, and in which we may glorify Him.

(3692.) When we are exercised with grievous afflictions, let us not murmur against Him that inflicted them, but let us bear all with patience and comfort, yea, with joy and thankfulness. For so we may assure ourselves, that as we much glorify God by our sufferings, so by these trials He vouchsafes to us a double honour. For first He honours us by enriching us with His graces; and then by trying of them, whilst thereby their worth and excellency is manifested to all that behold us in these conflicts; and lastly, He will honour us by crowning His graces in us, when by trial they are approved. Even as the skillful armourer first graces his armour by good workmanship, then by bringing it to the proof, and lastly by causing it to be employed in the prince's service.

—Downname, 1644.

(3693.) The general honours the soldier, first by training him to the wars, and making him expert in all feats of chivalry; then by giving him a place of employment fit for his gifts and good parts; and finally by rewarding and crowning his victories, causing him to sit with himself in his chariot of triumph.

As therefore the valiant soldier murmurs not against his captain, when, having a high opinion of his fortitude, he appoints him to services full of danger and difficulty, but accounts himself much honoured, in that he thinks him worthy of such employments; and contrariwise, thinking his valour and abilities undervalued, is full of discontent if he should be appointed to base and easy services, which any coward or fresh-water soldier could achieve without difficulty or danger; so much less have we any cause of repining when our great Commander, who best knows our abilities, employs us in services of a high nature. Yea, rather we have cause of thanksgiving and rejoicing, seeing He has first honoured us with gifts fit for these attempts, and now honours us by giving us opportunity of employing them, and approving them in the trial, and will hereafter crown us with victory. Neither do any of His soldiers perish in their magnanimous attempts, seeing He protects them in all dangers, and never matches them with any enemy but such as He enables them to overcome.

—Downname, 1644.

(3694.) The learned scholar takes great delight when he is posed in difficult questions, according to the measure of his knowledge, that he may approve his sufficiency both to his master and fellows; and contrariwise thinks himself wronged and disreputed, if having read the best authors, he be examined in the first rudiments of grammar or in the A B C. And so in like manner we are much honoured by God, when having received from Him many and great virtues, He also brings us into great and many trials; seeing that as our virtue and strength are fitted according to the power of our enemies who encounter us, so shall our crown be fitted to our graces, and the glory of our crown to the greatness of the victory.

—Downname, 1644.

(3695.) Suffering in all its forms is, and should be looked upon as being, a vocation. There are many, and these real Christians, persons interested in God's service, who regard suffering in a shallow, superficial point of view, as an interference with their vocations, and consequently miss all the golden opportunities of growth in grace and knowledge which it holds out. Their plan of life is put out of joint, and, as it appears, their usefulness impeded by some accident or some grievous sickness; their activity is at an end, or at an end for a time,—quietness is imposed upon them as a condition of life, or of recovery; they chafe and fret at the restraint, because, as they themselves put it, they are precluded from actively doing good. Now what does this fretting indicate? What but this, that they love not the will of God; but merely the satisfaction which accrues in the natural order of things from a consciousness of doing good to others; and to cling to this satisfaction is only a higher form of self-love—not the love of God. The truth is that God, in sending them the sickness or the accident, has been pleased in His wisdom and love to change their vocation, and if minded to be really loyal to His will, they must accommodate and familiarise themselves to the idea, not that their occupation is gone, but simply that it is altered.

As an illustration, let us imagine the conduct of a campaign by the commander-in-chief of the forces of an empire. No one but he himself is in full possession of his plans; he has laid his schemes with a deep foresight and with the most correct calculation of contingencies, but communicates the whole of them to no subordinate. Advices from home, and from the generals of detachments, are arriving all day long at headquarters, and despatches are as continually going out; but no one knows any more of the contents than concerns his own position and duties. Many lookers-on, who cannot see the whole game, misjudge the commander. There is an outcry that he risked unfairly in an enterprise almost desperate, the lives of a small party; but the real truth is, as men would see if they could but know the whole, that this risk was absolutely essential to the safety of the entire force, and that by the exposure of a score of men to fearful odds, the lives of twenty thousand have been secured. Let us now suppose that suddenly some officer is commanded to hold himself and his troop in readiness to undertake some important manoeuvre—to go up into a breach, or to storm a fortress, or to meet and cut off an enemy's supplies—suppose that this enterprise exactly suits both the capacities and inclination of the man on whom it is devolved; that there is room in it for the display of powers which he is conscious of possessing; that it gives him just the opportunity which he coveted of achieving distinction. He is making his preparations with all sanguineness, and anticipating the final order to depart, when lo! the order arrives, but it peremptorily alters his destination; he is not to be of the storming party, he is to go into a secluded dingle with his men, far out of the way of the operations, and there lie still, and send out scouts to make observations of the country, and report. It is a hard trial to one who was girding himself for active service, and longing for an opportunity for displaying prowess and forethought; and it is difficult to bear, just in proportion as there is room to doubt the wisdom of the commander's general arrangements, and his consideration for the individual officer whose destination he thus arbitrarily changes. But supposing these to be beyond all question, supposing that hitherto the most consummate skill had been shown in every arrangement of the campaign, and that on many previous occasions the general had shown the very kindest, and even the most affectionate, regard to the interests of this particular officer, would it then be found impossible or even difficult to reconcile the mind to such a disposition of things? Surely not, when once cool reflection had succeeded to the sting of the disappointment.

And when our Heavenly Father changes our whole plan of life by His providential despatches, and virtually sends us the order, "Lie still; and let another gird and carry thee instead of thy girding thyself, and walking on Mine errands 'whither thou wouldst';" shall we venture even to remonstrate, when we are assured by the testimony of His word, that both His wisdom and His care for us are unbounded? and when our own experience of life, brief as it has been, re-echoes this testimony? Ah! to love God is to embrace His will when it runs counter to our inclinations, as well as when it jumps with them.

—Goulburn.

(8.) The issue of all afflictions is good to the people of God.

(3696.) Job out of his own experience says: "He knoweth my way and trieth me, and I shall come forth like the gold." In respect of which happy issue given by the Lord to all our trials, we have just cause to bear them all with patience and comfort, with joy and thanksgiving. For if we be not counterfeit metal, but good gold, why should we fear the furnace of affliction, seeing it will not consume us like straw or chaff, but only try us, and in trying purify us; that coming to the touchstone we may be approved, and so be reserved for ever in God's treasury of blessedness? If we be good grapes, why do we fear the press of tribulation, which will not destroy us, but bring us to perfection, making us fit wine for God's own use? If we be good wheat, why should we be grieved to come under the flail or fan, seeing it will not hurt us, but only separate and cleanse us from the straw and chaff, that we may be laid up for God's own store in the granaries of heavenly happiness? Finally, if we be God's soldiers in the Church militant, why should we not with joy and Christian courage skirmish with the world assaulting us daily with troubles and afflictions, seeing by this conduct our valour is tried, that being approved it may be crowned; and we assured of God's continual assistance, which will defend us in the fight, and in the end give us the victory?

Let us therefore leave fear and horror, murmuring and repining, to false dissemblers and faithless men, to whom alone these miseries are hurtful and dangerous. Let counterfeit and drossy Christians fear the fiery trial, seeing in it they are sure to be consumed. Let hypocrites, who like fair green leaves make a goodly show but yield no sweet juice of holiness, fear the wine-press and vintage, because their pressing will bring no profit, but they shall be cast away or trodden under foot. Let the chaff and straw fear the flail and fan, because being thereby separated from the good wheat, they shall be either burnt with fire, or cast upon the dunghill. Let dastards and cowards, traitors and enemies, tremble and grieve, when they are encountered by afflictions, seeing in this fight they are led captive of sin, and afterwards for ever imbondaged in the prison of hell and destruction. As for God's faithful ones, let them endure all these trials with patience, comfort, and rejoicing, seeing they do by exercising, manifest God's graces, that He may be glorified in His gifts, and His gifts crowned in them.

—Downname, 1644.

(3697.) I have observed that towns which have been casually burnt, have been built again more beautiful than before. Mud walls, afterwards made of stones; and roofs, formerly but thatched, after advanced to be tiled. The Apostle tells me that I must not think it strange concerning the fiery trial which is to happen unto me. May I likewise prove improved by it. Let my renewed soul, which grows out of the ashes of the old man, be a more firm fabric and strong structure, so shall affliction be my advantage.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3698.) The thorn is one of the most cursed and angry and crabbed weeds that the earth yields, and yet out of it springs the rose, one of the sweetest smelled flowers, and most delightful to the eye, that the earth has. Your Lord shall make joy and gladness out of your afflictions, for all His roses have a fragrant smell.

—Rutherford, 1661.

(3699.) God doth not take the axe into His hand to make chips. His people, when He is hewing them, and the axe goes deepest, may expect some beautiful piece at the end of the work. It is a sweet meditation Parisiensis hath upon Rom. viii. 28.—We know that all things work together for good to them that love God: "Where, O my soul, shouldst thou be more satisfied, free of care and fear, than when thou art among thy fellow-labourers, and those that come to help thee to attain thy so much desired salvation, which thy afflictions do?" They work together with ordinances and other providential dealings of God for good, yea thy chief good; and thou couldst as ill spare their help as any other means which God appoints thee. Should one find, as soon as he riseth in the morning, some on his house-top tearing off the tiles, and with axes and hammers taking down the roof thereof, he might at first be amazed and troubled at the sight, yea, think they are a company of thieves, and enemies come to do him some mischief; but when he understands they are workmen sent by his father to mend his house, and make it better than it is (which cannot be done without taking some of it down), he is satisfied, and content to endure the present noise and trouble, yea thankful to his father, for the care and cost he bestows on him: the very hope of what advantage will come of their work, makes him very willing to dwell a while amidst the ruins and rubbish of his old house. I do not wonder to see hopeless souls so impatient in their sufferings, sometimes even to distraction of mind; alas! they fear presently (and have reason so to do) that they come to pull all their worldly joys and comforts down about their ears, which gone, what, alas! have they left to comfort them, who can look for nothing but hell in another world? But the believer's heart is eased of all this, because assured from the promise, that they are sent on a better errand to him from his Heavenly Father, who intends him no hurt, but rather good, even to build the ruinous frame of his soul into a glorious temple at last, and these afflictions come, among other means, to have a hand in the work, and this satisfies him, that he can say, Lord, cut and hew me how Thou wilt, that at last I may be polished and framed according to the platform which love bath drawn in Thy heart for me. Though some ignorant man would think his clothes spoiled when besmeared with fuller's earth or soap, yet one that knows the cleansing nature of them will not be afraid to have them so used.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3700.) Consider that all your trials shall work for your good, "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God." Why then should you fret, seeing God designs your good in all? The bee sucks sweet honey out of the bitterest herbs; so God will by afflictions teach His children to suck sweet knowledge, sweet obedience, and sweet experience out of all the bitter afflictions He exercises them with. That scouring and rubbing which frets others, shall make them shine the brighter; and that weight which crushes and keeps others under, shall but make them, like the palm-tree, grow better and higher; and that hammer which knocks others all in pieces, shall but knock them nearer to Christ, the corner stone. Stars shine brightest in the darkest night; torches give the best light when beaten; grapes yield most wine when most pressed; spices smell sweetest when pounded; vines are the better for bleeding; gold looks the better for scouring; juniper smells sweetest in the fire; chamomile, the more you tread it, the more you spread it. Where afflictions hang heaviest, corruptions hang loosest; and grace that is hid in nature, as sweet water in rose-leaves, is then most fragrant when the fire of affliction is put under to distil it out.

—Brooks, 1608-1680.

(3701.) As musicians sometimes go through perplexing mazes of discord in order to come to the inexpressible sweetness of after-chords, so men's discords of trouble and chromatic jars, if God be their leader, are only preparing for a resolution into such harmonious strains as could never have been raised except upon such undertones. Most persons are more anxious to stop their sorrow than to carry it forward to its choral outburst. "Now, no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward, it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby."

—Becker.

(3702.) Are you crushed by some recent grief? Is it hard to say and mean, "Thy will be done"? Does your trial look as if it could never wear towards you an expression of beneficence? A statue, reflecting more than mortal grace and loveliness, will disguise and distort its matchless proportions to one standing beneath its pedestal. Be patient: you are too near. Wait; and "good" (Rom. viii. 28) shall not fail to disclose its perfect image.

—Henry Batchelor.

(9.) All temporal sorrows are but "light afflictions," in comparison with the evils from which they deliver us, and the glories for which they prepare us.

(3703.) Grievous and heavy trials did Paul very frequently and abundantly sustain; but in very deed the Holy Spirit was with him in the wasting of the outward man, to renew the inner man from day to day, and by the taste of spiritual rest in the affluence of the delights of God, to soften down, by the hope of future blessedness, all present hardships, and to alleviate all heavy trials. Lo, how sweet a yoke of Christ did he bear, and how light a burden!

so that he could say that all those hard and grievous sufferings, at the recital of which every hearer shudders, were a light tribulation; as he beheld with the inward eyes—the eyes of faith—at how great a price of things temporal must be purchased the life to come, the escape from the everlasting pains of the ungodly, the full enjoyment, free from all anxiety, of the eternal happiness of the righteous.

Men suffer themselves to be cut and burnt, that the pains, not of eternity, but of some more lasting sore than usual, may be bought off at the price of severer pain.

For a languid and uncertain period of a very short repose, and that, too, at the end of life, the soldier is worn down by all the hard trials of war, restless it may be for more years in his labours than he will have to enjoy his rest in ease.

To what storms and tempests, to what a fearful and tremendous raging of sky and sea, do the busy merchantmen expose themselves, that they may acquire riches, inconstant as the wind, and full of perils and tempests, greater even than those by which they were acquired!

What heats and colds, what perils from horses, from ditches, from precipices, from rivers, from wild beasts, do huntsmen undergo! what pain of hunger and thirst, what straitened allowances of the cheapest and meanest meat and drink, that they may catch a beast! and sometimes, after all, the flesh of the beast for which they endure all this is of no use for the table. And although a boar or a stag be caught, it is more sweet to the hunter's mind because it has been caught, than to the eater's palate because it is dressed.

By what sharp corrections of almost daily stripes is the tender age of boys brought under! By what great pains, even of watching and abstinence, are they exercised, not to learn true wisdom, but for the sake of riches, and the honours of an empty show, that they may learn arithmetic, and other literature, and the deceits of eloquence!

Now in all these instances, they who do not love these things feel them as great severities; whereas they who love them endure the same, it is true, but they do not seem to feel them severe; for love makes all, the hardest and most distressing things, altogether easy, and almost nothing. How much more surely, then, and easily, will charity do, with a view to true blessedness, that which mere desire does as it can, with a view to what is but misery! How easily is any temporal adversity endured if it be that eternal punishment may be avoided, and eternal rest procured! Not without good reason did that vessel of election say with exceeding joy, "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us" (Rom. viii. 18).

—Augustine, 353-429.

(3704.) Let me wither and wear out mine age in a discomfortable, in an unwholesome, in a penurious prison, and so pay my debts with my bones, and recompense the wastefulness of my youth with the beggary of my age; let me wither in a spital, under sharp, and foul, and infamous diseases, and so recompense the wantonness of my youth with that loathsomeness in mine age; yet, if God withdraw not His spiritual blessings, His grace, His patience,—if I can call my suffering His doing, my passion His action, all this that is temporal is but a caterpillar got into one corner of my garden, but a mildew fallen upon one acre of my corn; the body of all, the substance of all, is safe, as long as the soul is safe.

Donne, 1573-1631.

10. Afflictions endure but "for a moment."

(3705.) As an apprentice holds out in hard labour, and (it may be) bad usage, for seven years or more, and in all that time is serviceable to his master without repining, because he sees that his bondage will not last always: thus should every one that groaneth under the burden of any affliction whatsoever bridle his affections, possess his soul in patience, and cease from all murmuring, considering well with himself, that the rod of the wicked shall not always rest upon the lot of the righteous; that weeping may abide at evening, but joy cometh in the morning; and that troubles will have an end, and not continue for ever.

—Webb, 1658.

(3706.) The cloud of trial while it drops, Christian, is rolling over thy head, and then comes fair weather with eternal sunshine of glory. "Canst thou not watch with Christ one hour?"

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

V. ITS POWER.

1. Exemplified in Job.

(3707.) The enemy, full of rage, and striving to conquer the firm breast of that holy man, set up against him the engines of temptation, spoiled his substance, slew his children, smote his body, instigated his wife, and while he brought his friends to console him, urged them to the harshest upbraiding. One friend too, who was more cruel in his reproaches, he reserved with the last and bitterest invective; that by the frequency of the stroke, if not otherwise, the heart might be reached by that which was ever being repeated with a fresh wound. For because he saw that he had power in the world, he thought to move him by the loss of his substance, and finding him unshaken, he smote him by the death of his children. But seeing that from that wound which made him childless he even gained strength to the greater magnifying of God's praise; he asked leave to smite the health of his body. Seeing, moreover, that by the pain of the body he could not compass the affecting of the mind, he instigated his wife, for he saw that the city which he desired to storm was too strong; therefore by bringing upon him so many external plagues, he led an army as it were on the outside against him, but, when he kindled the feelings of his wife into words of mischievous persuasion, it was as though he corrupted the hearts of the citizens within. For so from external wars we are instructed how to think of those within. For an enraged enemy, that holds a city encircled by his surrounding armies, upon perceiving its fortifications to remain unshaken, betakes himself to other methods of attack, with this object, that he may corrupt the hearts of some of the citizens also within; so that, when he has led on the assailants from without, he may also have co-operation within, and that when the heat of the battle increases outside, the city being left without succour by the treachery of those within, of whose faith no doubt is felt, may become his prey.

And thus a battering-ram having been planted on the outside, as it were, he smote the walls of this city with blows many in number, as the several times that he brought tidings of calamities; while on the inside, he, as it were, corrupted the hearts of citizens, when he set himself to undermine the strong bulwarks of this city by the persuasions of the wife. In this manner he brought to bear, from without, an hostile assault from within, baneful counsels, that he might capture the city the sooner, in proportion as he troubled it both from within and from without. But because there are times when words are more poignant than wounds, he armed himself, as we have said, with the tongue; of his friends. Those indeed that were of graver years, might perchance give the less pain by their words. The younger is made to take their place, to deal that holy bosom a wound so much the sharper, the meaner was the aim that he impelled to strike blows against it. Behold the enemy mad to strike down his indomitable strength, how many darts of temptation that he devised, see what numberless beleaguering engines he set about him! See how many weapons of assault he let fly, but in all his mind continued undaunted, the city stood unshaken.

It is the aim of enemies, when they come up face to face, to send off some in secret, who may be so much the more free to strike a blow in the flank of the hostile force, in proportion as he that is fighting is more eagerly intent upon the enemy advancing in front. Job, therefore, being caught in the warfare of this conflict, received the losses which befell him like foes in his front; he took the words of comforters like enemies on his flank, and in all turning round the shield of his steadfastness, he stood defended at all points, and ever on the watch, parried on all sides the swords directed against him. By his silence he marks his unconcern for the loss of his substance; the flesh, dead in his children, he bewails with composure; the flesh in his own person stricken, he endures with fortitude; the flesh in his wife suggesting mischievous persuasions, he instructs with wisdom. In addition to all this his friends start forth into the bitterness of upbraiding, and coming to appease his grief, increase its force. Thus all the engines of temptation are turned by this holy man to the augmentation of his virtues; for by the wounds his patience is tried, and by the words his wisdom is exercised. Everywhere he meets the enemy with undaunted mien, for the scourges he overcame by resolution, and the words by reasoning.

—Gregory, 545-604.

2. Exemplified in our Lord.

(3708.) There was in Christ regnum patientia, a kingdom of patience, as well as regnum potentia, a kingdom of power and glory. There was a kingdom of patience; that is such a kingdom as Christ exercised in His greatest abasement, whereby He made all things, even the worst, to be serviceable to His own turn and the Church's. So in every member of His, there is a kingdom of patience set up, whereby He subjects all things to Him. To make it yet clearer.

When Christ died, which was the lowest degree of abasement, there was a kingdom of patience then. What! when He was subdued by death and Satan, was there a kingdom then? Yes, a kingdom, for though visibly He was overcome and nailed to the cross, yet invisibly He triumphed over principalities and powers. Christ never conquered more than on the cross. When He died He killed death, and Satan, and all. And did not Christ reign on the cross when He converted the thief?

when the sun was astonished, and the earth shook and moved, and the light was eclipsed? Who cares for Cæsar when he is dead? But what more efficacious than Christ when He died? He was most practical when He seemed to do nothing. In patience He reigned and triumphed; He subjected the greatest enemies to Himself, Satan, and death, and the wrath of God, and all. In the same manner all things are ours, the worst things that befall God's children, death, and afflictions, and persecutions. There is a kingdom of patience set up in them. The Spirit of God subdues all base fears in us, and a child of God never more triumphs than in his greatest troubles. This is that that the Apostle says, "In all these things we are more than conquerors." How is that, that in those great troubles we should be "conquerors and more"? Thus the spirit of a Christian, take him as a Christian, reigns and triumphs at that time. For the devil and the world labour to subdue the spirit of God's children and their cause. Now to take them at the worst, the cause they stand for, and will stand for it; and the spirit they are led with is undaunted. So that the Spirit of Christ is victorious and conquering in them, and most of all at such times.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

VI. MUST HAVE ITS PERFECT WORK.

(3709.) As it is not sufficient for a good pilot to take pains in breaking one dangerous billow, or in passing one storm, but he must show the like care and diligence in well governing the ship, till he arrive safely at the wished haven; and as it is not enough for a good soldier to show great valour in the first brunt of the battle, if afterwards he shamefully flee, or fight faintly and cowardly, but he must courageously continue fighting, till he have vanquished the enemy and obtained victory: so it is not sufficient to the being of Christian patience, that we brook and bear well one storm of misery, and through our slackness and negligence sink or be wrecked in the next; but after one billow of affliction and tempest of trouble is past, we must expect and prepare ourselves to endure another, until we safely arrive in the haven of happiness. It is not enough for a Christian soldier that he demean himself well in the first conflict with afflictions, if he afterwards grow weary of fighting, and flee out of the field by using unlawful means of escape; or fight faintly and not without grudging and murmuring against his commander for bringing him into the troubles and dangers; but he must constantly continue his courage, after one encounter expecting and preparing himself to sustain another, and never cease showing his unwearied magnanimity till he have obtained a full and final victory.

—Deuoname, 1644.

(3710.) Patience must not be an inch shorter than affliction. If the bridge reach but half-way over the brook, we shall have but an ill-favoured passage.

—Adams, 1653.

(3711.) Patience is seen in waiting as well as suffering. To bear a little while is but the imperfect work of patience, some lesser degree of it; as to know a letter or two in the book is but an imperfect kind of reading. But to bear much and long, that is the perfect work. To lift up some heavy thing from the ground argues some strength; but to carry it for an hour, or all day, is a more perfect thing.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3712.) When the husbandman has laboured in his field and sown his seed, he cannot at once raise bread. What avails his haste? What avails his fretting? He may fret because the frost sets in; he may fret because there seems to him to be too much rain; but how will his fretting benefit him? Will his impatience alter the state of the ground? will it change the weather? will it forward the harvest? His impatience can do no good; but his patience can: his trusting of God, and quieting of himself to wait the appointed seasons, sleeping and rising, and rising and sleeping, while the corn is growing he knows not how. Thus "the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain;" that is, he comes into the order of God: he has patience with God: he goes on, trusting that, in God's way, he shall obtain the promised harvest. "Now, therefore," as if the Apostle had said—"Look at him. You must hope for success in the same way. Does he use means? So must you; and you must have patience like him."

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(3713.) You are tender-hearted, and you want to be true, and are trying to be; learn these two things from our text,—never to be discouraged because good things get on so slowly here, and never to fail to do daily that good which lies next to your hand. Do not be in a hurry, but be diligent. Enter into the sublime patience of the Lord. Be charitable in view of it. God can afford to wait; why cannot we, since we have Him to fall back upon? Let patience have her perfect work, and bring forth her celestial fruits. Trust God to weave in your little thread into the great web, though the pattern shows it not yet. When God's people are able and willing thus to labour and wait, remember that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day; the grand harvest of the ages shall come to its reaping, and the day shall broaden itself to a thousand years, and the thousand years shall show themselves as a perfect and finished day!

—George Macdonald.

PRAYER.

I. ITS NATURE.

(3714.) Prayer may be supplication, or thanksgiving, or confession. Or it may be simple intercourse. He that *mus*es toward God prays. If you can conceive of a child in the presence of a parent most beloved that speaks, that is silent, that speaks again, that is again silent; now thought, now fancy, now feeling, in turn, as it were, wheeling the orb of its little mind round completely, so that on every side it receives light or gives forth light to the parent, the intercourse of that child with the parent is the fittest symbol of true prayer. PRAYER IS THE SOUL OF A MAN MOVING IN THE PRESENCE OF GOD, for the purpose of communicating its joy, or sorrow, or fear, or hope, or any other conscious experience that it may have, to the bosom of a parent.

—Becher.

II. IS THE NATURAL EXPRESSION OF NEED.

(3715.) A company of men say they cannot pray privately, their spirits are barren. They intimate much pride of spirit, for if a man be sensible of his wants you need not supply him with words. If a poor tenant come to a landlord, and find he has a hard bargain, let him alone for telling his tale. I warrant you he will lay open the state of his wife and children, and the ill year he has had ; he will be eloquent enough. Take any man that is sensible of his wants, and you shall not need to dictate words to him. There is no man that has a humble and broken heart, though he be never so illiterate, but he will have a large heart to God in this kind.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(3716.) Praying is the same to the new creature as crying is to the natural. The child is not learned by art or example to cry, but instructed by nature ; it comes into the world crying. Praying is not a lesson got by forms and rules of art, but flowing from principles of new life itself.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3717.) Prayer is not a bondage to a heart that is full of holy feeling, and a head that is full of divine knowledge ; but it is the language which the promptings of the thoughts within us send rushing to our tongue, which it were the cruellest bondage of nature to stifle. Why, it were to muzzle reason, and knowledge, and piety, and purpose, and gratitude, and devotion,—to doom to deep dungeons of silence the spirit which boundeth for the liberty of utterance and enterprise. And who could endure that confinement ? It were death, and worse than death, to be first charged with so much elastic, buoyant, resolute animation, and then bound down to rest and quietude by the same power which filled us. Have ye seen a dumb man under strong mental excitement ? How he distorts his countenance with fearful expression, and his body with frightful gesture, and opens wide the portals of speech, and strives to give motion to his fastened tongue, while hollow workings of ineffectual sound are heard deep in his breast, and his whole body, hands, and feet, and writhing frame, labour and are in distress,—so that the very soul of every beholder is touched with pity and deep regret to see a fellow-creature so frustrated of the glorious faculty of expressing thought ! Even such unspeakable pain, such severe amputation of the religious man's nature, would you cause were ye to deprive him of prayer, which is the utterance of strong desire, and purpose, and feeling unto his Maker.

—Irving, 1792-1834.

(3718.) There is a sense in which it may be said that prayer is natural to man. Go to what country you will, and you will find men performing religious rites, and foremost among these is prayer. It is an exercise natural to the human race. "But so many people do not pray," you say. True ; and so many people do not work. And yet we all admit that we are created with a view to work ; the hands are designed on purpose that they might work ; many, nevertheless, violate the law of their nature and refuse to work. But labour is natural to man for all that. In like manner we are constituted with a view to prayer ; it is the free, spontaneous outgush of our deeper being. Sometimes we are thrown into circumstances in which it is not only natural, but imperative on us to cry to Him who is able to save us. That was the case now with Jacob. He was reduced to a dread extremity ; his possessions were in imminent peril ; the "mother with the children" was in extreme danger ; his own life might be snatched away at any moment. In such narrow straits humanity is always compelled to pray ; it cannot help it. When in health and prosperity you may frame elaborate theories to demonstrate the absurdity of prayer ; but let death stare you in the face, let a heavy sorrow or bereavement overtake you, and you cannot help praying. Job asks concerning the hypocrite, "Will he always call upon God ?" The question implies that the godly calls upon God at all times ; but even the hypocrite, the ungodly, calls sometimes, when deep troubles encompass his path and darken his soul with their dense shadows. Tom Paine has spent his days in ridiculing religion, he makes merry at the expense of those that believe in another world ; but watch him one day as he crosses the Atlantic. The sea rises, the sky lowers, the wind howls, the vessel tosses restlessly to and fro. The tempest grows in fury ; the huge waves threaten to engulf the ship ; the wild wind madly yells in the sails and fills the air with clack and clamour ; the crew and passengers are fully persuaded that the vessel cannot live long in such a sea. Where is Tom Paine, the boastful, vaunting infidel ? On his knees, beseeching the Almighty with tears and supplications to have mercy on his soul. I do not say that to censure the man or to taunt him with inconsistency, but rather to vindicate his character. He was not so bad as he seemed to be, not quite as heartless as he tried to persuade the world he was. All honour to the inconsistencies of infidels ; they only prove that their hearts are better than their theories, that their lives are nobler than their faith.

—J. C. Jones.

(3719.) Sinking times are praying times with the Lord's servants. Peter neglected prayer at starting upon his venturous journey, but when he began to sink his danger made him a suppliant, and his cry, though late, was not too late. In our hours of bodily pain and mental anguish, we find ourselves as naturally driven to prayer as the wreck is driven upon the shore by the waves. The fox hies to its hole for protection ; the bird flies to the wood for shelter ; and even so the tried believer hastens to the mercy-seat for safety. Heaven's great harbour of refuge is All-prayer ; thousands of weather-beaten vessels have found a haven there, and the moment a storm comes on, it is wise for us to make for it with all sail.

—Spurgeon.

III. IT IS A RESOURCE AVAILABLE FOR ALL GOD'S PEOPLE IN ALL THE EMERGENCIES OF LIFE.

(3720.) I once saw a grand procession, in which an oriental monarch, surrounded by a thousand life-guards, moved to the sound of all kinds of music. Some unknown subject had a request to urge. He knew the utter impossibility of one breaking through the guards that day and night surround his majesty. That humble person, perhaps, had some dear friend in prison, who, according to oriental custom, could never be tried or freed while the prosecutor's malice or purse held out. They have no Habeas Corpus law among nations without the Bible.

This poor creature took the only possible way known to one unable to bribe the officers, and flung his petition over the heads of the guards, and it fell at the feet of the sovereign. In a moment one of the life-guards pierced it with his bayonet, and flung it back into the crowd. Alas! the proud, pleasure-loving monarch, amid the luxuriant splendours of his court, palace, army, and plans of reaping renown, never so much as dreamed of noticing the prayer of that broken heart and crushed spirit. Not thus does the King of kings treat the humblest suppliant who seeks His help!

—Van Doren.

(3721.) The communion table is but occasionally spread, and the doors of the church may be thrown open only once a week; but the pages of the Bible are always open, and the gates of prayer, like those of heaven, are never shut. Prayer is like a private postern, through which, as well by night as by day, we have the privilege of constant access to the palace and presence of the King. In the words we learned from a mother's lips, and lisped at her knee, prayer is the first door that is open; and it is the last that is shut. There, where a man is tossing on the bed of death, and the Bible lies shut on his pillow, for he cannot read it, and to the promises of the gospel, which we pour into his ear, he gives no sign of a-sent, for he cannot hear us. Mark these moving lips; listen to these broken sentences! Behold he prayeth! and his spirit, breathed out in a groan or sigh, flies heavenward on the wings of prayer.

—Guthrie.

(3722.) A little boy once went with his father to see a telegraph office. He had an uncle in a far-off city, and he asked his father to send him some message. He did so. After waiting about half an hour the answer came. It was, "I will come to see you at Christmas, and bring you some pretty toys." The little boy thought this very wonderful indeed. As they walked homewards he could talk of nothing else but the telegraph wires. "Father," said he, "did you ever hear of a message being sent so far, and an answer returned in so short a time?" "Oh! yes, my son; I know a way by which messages are sent, and answers brought back, in a much less time than by the telegraph wires."—"Do tell me," said the little boy, "what it is, and how it can be quicker and better than that?" The father then said to him, "You remember that it was some time before you could get a chance to send your message. You had to wait until others were attended to. But in the way I speak of, you are not hindered by others. Thousands can send their messages at the same moment, and answers can be sent back to them all. Then there are the wires, and the machinery, and the electricity, and the man who works it. These must all be kept in good order; and they take a good deal of care and attention. Besides, there are only certain hours in the day when your messages can be sent. Now, by the plan I tell you of, you need none of these things. You need no man to tell the message to, no wires to carry it, no machine to keep in order, and you can send your message at midnight, or at day-dawn, or any moment you please." "What, father," said the little boy, "and get an answer to your message as soon as by the telegraph?"—"Yes, and a great deal sooner," said the father, "even before you tell with your lips what you want, the answer may come back. Besides, the office of the telegraph is always in some town or city, and you must go to it before you can send your message. But the way I speak of does not require this. You may be in your chamber, or lying on your bed, or hunting in the woods, or in the fields, or at school, or anywhere else, and you can send your message, and get an answer immediately. Then you always have to write down your message by the telegraph. But the other way you need not write it down at all. The little boy who has not learned his letters, and the poor servant who cannot read, can send their messages as well, and get the answers as soon, as the wisest and greatest men in the world. However simple and ignorant, they may be attended to just as soon and as kindly as the king on his throne." "Well, well," said the little boy, "that is, indeed, a wonderful thing. Why have I never heard of that before? Do tell me where I shall find an account of it." "I will," said the father; "you will find the fullest and best account of it in the Bible." By this time they had reached home, and the little boy ran and brought the Bible. The father told him where to open, and he read the following passages (Isa. lxxv. 24; lvi. 9; Dan. ix. 21-23).

—Maude.

(3723.) "Pull the night-bell." This is the inscription we often see written on the doorpost of the shop in which medicines are sold. Some of us have had our experiences with night-bells when sudden illness has overtaken some member of our households, or when the sick have rapidly grown worse. How have we hurried through the silent streets, when only here and there a light glimmered from some chamber window! How eagerly have we pulled the night-bell at our physician's door; and then, with prescription in hand, have sounded the alarm at the place where the remedy was to be procured. Those of us who have had these lonely midnight walks, and have given the summons for quick relief, know the meaning of that Bible-text, "Arise! I cry out in the night!"

Seasons of trouble and distress are often spoken of in God's Word under the simile of night. The word vividly pictures those times when the skies are darkened, and the lights that gladden the soul have gone out, and it is not easy to find one's way. Enemies may be stealing on us in the darkness. Apprehensions gather like fancied spectres, to make us uneasy or afraid. If prosperity be likened to the noonday, the seasons of perplexity or distress may be likened to the "night." Perhaps some of the readers of this paragraph may be in a gloomy night-season of poverty, or bereavement, or of spiritual doubt and depression. Each heart knoweth its own bitterness. Friend, arise, and pull the night-bell of prayer! God your Father says to you, "Call upon me in the time of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify Me."

—Cuyler.

(3724.) But whatever may be the fortune of our lives, one great extremity at least, the hour of approaching death, is certainly to be passed through. What ought then to occupy us? What can then support us? Prayer. Prayer with our blessed Lord was a refuge from the storm: almost every word He uttered during that tremendous scene was prayer—prayer the most earnest, the most urgent ; repeated, continued, proceeding from the recesses of the soul ; private, solitary ; prayer for deliverance ; prayer for strength ; above everything, prayer for resignation.

—Paley, 1743-1805.

IV. IS INDISPENSABLE TO THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

1. To its existence.

(3725.) Prayer is to be regarded not only as a distinct exercise of religion, for which its own time must be set apart, but as a process woven into the texture of the Christian's mind, and extending through the length and breadth of his life. Like the golden thread in a tissue, it frequently disappears beneath the common thread. It disappears, and is hidden from the eye ; yet nevertheless, it is substantially there, like a stream running under ground for a certain period of its course. Suddenly, the thread emerges into sight again on the upper surface of the tissue, and suddenly again disappears ; and thus it penetrates the whole texture, although occasionally hidden. This is a very just illustration of the matter in hand. Look from without upon the Christian's life, and you will see divers occupations and employments, many of which, it may be, call for the exercise of his mind. But beneath the mind's surface there is an under current, a golden thread of prayer, always there, though often latent, and frequently comes up to view not only in stated acts of worship, but in holy ejaculations.
—Goulburn.

2. To its sustenance.

(3726.) A godly man will seek God's face evermore (Ps. cv. 4, and cxvi. 2) ; he calleth upon God as long as he liveth. Breathing heavenward in prayer is the beginning and ending of his spiritual life upon earth, as we see in Paul (Acts ix. 6) and Stephen (Acts vii. 60). Paul begins his life with prayer, and Stephen ends his with it.

He never taketh his leave of prayer till he is entering into the place of praise. Prayer is his element ; he cannot live without it, and communion with God in it. Prayer is the vessel by which he is continually trading into the Holy Land ; he sendeth it out fraught with precious graces,—faith, hope, desire, love, godly sorrow, and the like, and it cometh home many times richly laden with peace, joy, and increase of faith.
—Swinnoek, 1673.

(3727.) Many are the lawful amusements of the Christian, but that which gives the highest zest to his life is the spirit of prayer. He should be careful not to step aside, but dwell in the atmosphere of prayer. Like the ambient air, which yields, yet fills all space, and wide interused embraces the whole earth as the principle which supports life, quickening, and invigorating wherever it comes—such should be the spirit of prayer, till through every space of life it be interused with all your employments, and wherever you are, and whatever you do, embrace you on every side. Like a pleasure ever omnipresent, never impeding, but gently leaving room for, and indescribably animating, and giving pleasure to, every other enjoyment.
—Salter.

(3728.) The first true sign of spiritual life, prayer is also the means of maintaining it. Man can as well live physically without breathing, as spiritually without praying. There is a class of animals—the cetaceous, neither fish nor sea-fowl, that inhabit the deep. It is their home ; they never leave it for the shore ; yet, though swimming beneath its waves and sounding its darkest depths, they have ever and anon to rise to the surface that they may breathe the air. Without that these monarchs of the deep could not exist in the dense element in which they live, and move, and have their being. And something like what is imposed on them by a physical necessity, the Christian has to do by a spiritual one. It is by ever and anon ascending up to God, by rising through prayer into a loftier, purer region for supplies of Divine grace, that he maintains his spiritual life. Prevent these animals from rising to the surface, and they die for want of breath ; prevent him from rising to God, and he dies for want of prayer. "Give me children," cried Rachel, "or else I die." Let me breathe, says a man ga-ping, or else I die. Let me pray, says the Christian, or else I die.

—Guthrie.

V. IS A TEST OF CHARACTER.

1. In regard to the objects for which men pray.

(3729.) It has been a subject of common observation and remark that among a very large proportion of the peoples of the world there has been almost wholly wanting an ethical element in prayers. Material benefits, not spiritual gifts, are generally desired. Of the forms of word-prayer, perhaps the rudest is that of the Zulu. He worships the spirits of deceased relatives, and his full ritual is given as "People of our house—children ! " People of our house, rain, or cattle, or whatever else he wants. When he sneezes, he supposes "the spirits" close at hand, and he only "wishes a wish" by saying what he wants, as "cattle," "good luck."

In Central Africa, the fetish man prays for blessings on the medicine he uses. The Polynesian prays to his "Compassionate Father," or some other god, for a blessing, or to "let food grow."

The red Indian prays for "good luck in hunting," or that he may be able to "take scalps—to take horses ;" that he may find "the enemy asleep ;" or, on the great lakes, that the waters may be calm while he passes over.

The Karen, in Burmah, prays that his fields may be guarded, and that the spirit of any one entering to destroy the crops may be bound with two strings which he puts in the paddy-fields for the purpose.

Men do not always hold a remarkable moderation in these earthly wishes. The wild tribes of Central India not only pray for preservation from "snakes, tigers, and stumbling blocks," but one of the Khond prayers is to the effect that the harvest may be so great that so much of the seed shall fall as it is being gathered, that when he comes next season he may find it already growing in such quantity as that it shall "look like a young corn-field."

A few prayers, however, are discoverable for moral character. The Aztec prays for specific virtues to be imparted to his rulers ; and the ancient Aryan, of Vedic times, though he mostly prayed for sheep and cows and other comforts, yet sometimes said : "Through want of strength, thou strong one, have I gone astray. Have mercy," &c. The Parsee prays for forgiveness for deceit, idol-worship, and other faults.

Classical heathendom would swell our illustrations beyond proportion. Pericles, Cornelius Scipio, Plato and others, commenced important affairs with prayer. Prayer was made to preface transactions in the Senate and in military affairs; while orations, the beginning of the year, meals, and even games and wagers, were accompanied with prayer.

—Gracy.

2. In regard to the temper in which men pray.

(3730.) A gracious man is never weary of spiritual things, as men are never weary of the sun, but though it is enjoyed every day, yet long for the rising of it again.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3731.) Among the wonders which science has achieved, it has succeeded in bringing things which are invisible, and impalpable to our senses, within the reach of our most accurate observations. Thus the barometer makes us acquainted with the actual state of the atmosphere. It takes cognisance of the slightest variation, and every change is pointed out by its elevation or depression, so that we are accurately acquainted with the actual state of the air, and at any given time. In like manner the Christian has within him an index by which he may take cognisance, and by which he may measure the elevation and degrees of his spirituality—it is the spirit of inward devotion. However difficult it may seem to be to pronounce on the invisibilities of our spirituality, yet there is a barometer to determine the elevation or depression of the spiritual principle. It marks the changes of the soul in its aspect towards God. As the spirit of prayer mounts up, there is true spiritual elevation, and as it is restrained, and falls low, there is a depression of the spiritual principle within us. As is the spirit of devotion and communion with God, such is the man.

—Salter.

3. In the regularity with which men pray.

(3732.) Grace works uniformly, and discovers a comely proportion in its actings. Happily you may see the son of a prince on some high day, in richer and more glorious apparel than on another day that is ordinary; but you shall never find him in sordid, ragged, and beggarly clothes, still he will be clad as becomes a king's son. Possibly, yea, it is likely, that you may see the Christian come forth in an extraordinary day and duty, with more enlargement of affections in prayer, and all his graces raised to a higher glory in their actings than ordinary; but you shall never find him with his robe of grace laid aside; still the true saint will ~~declaim~~ ^{display} his high birth by his every-day course; he will not live in the neglect of ordinary duties, and cast off communion with God in his daily walking. Oh, 'tis the brand of an hypocrite to have his devotion come by fits, and like a drift of snow, to lie thick in one place and none in another; to seem for zeal like angels at a time, and live like atheists many weeks after.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3733.) The Christian is enjoined to "pray without ceasing:" not that he can be always engaged in the positive act, but he ought to have what I call a holy aptitude of prayer. The bird is not always on the wing, but is ready to fly in an instant; so the believer is not always on the wing of prayer, but he has such a gracious aptitude for this service, that he is prepared in an instant, when in danger or need, to fly for refuge to God.

—Salter.

4. In regard to the period during which men pray.

(3734.) "Will the hypocrite pray always?" No as the wheel wears with turning, till it breaks at last, so doth the hypocrite. He prays himself weary of praying; something or other will in time make him quarrel with that duty, which he never inwardly liked; whereas the sincere believer hath that in him, which makes it impossible he should quite give over praying, except he should also cease believing. Prayer is the very breath of faith; stop a man's breath, and where is he then? 'Tis true the believer, through his own negligence, may find some more difficulty of fetching his praying breath at one time than at another, as a man in a cold doth for his natural breath. Alas! who is so careful of his soul's health, that needs not bewail this? But for faith to live, and this breath of prayer to be quite cut off is impossible. We see David did but hold his breath a little longer than ordinary, and what a distemper it put him into, till he gave himself ease again by venting his soul in prayer: "I held my peace, and my sorrow stirred, my heart was hot within me; while I was musing, the fire burned, then spake I with my tongue, Lord, make me to know my end." Dost thou, O man, find thyself under a necessity of praying, as the little babe who cannot choose but cry, when it ails or wants anything, because he hath no other way to help itself, than by crying to hasten its mother or nurse to its help? The Christian's wants, sins, and temptations continuing to return upon him, he cannot but continue also to pray against them. "From the end of the earth will I cry unto Thee," saith David: "wherever I am, I'll find Thee out; prison me, banish me, or do with me what Thou wilt, Thou shalt never be rid of me," "I will abide in Thy tabernacle for ever."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

VI. WHAT PROFIT SHOULD WE HAVE, IF WE PRAY UNTO HIM?

1. The protection of God's providence will be extended to us.

(3735.) In the beginning of the contest with Britain, when we were sensible of danger, we had daily prayers in this room for the Divine protection. Our prayers, sir, were heard, and they were graciously answered. All of us who were engaged in the struggle must have observed frequent instances of a superintending Providence in our favour. To that kind Providence we owe this happy opportunity of consulting in peace on the means of establishing our future national felicity. And have we now forgotten this powerful Friend? or do we imagine we no longer need His assistance? I have lived for a long time [81 years]; and the longer I live the more convincing proofs I see of this truth, that God governs in the affairs of man. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid? We have been assured, sir, in the sacred writings, that "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it." I firmly believe this; and I also believe that without His concurring aid we shall proceed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel: we shall be divided by our little, partial, local interests; our prospects will be confounded; and we ourselves shall become a reproach and a by-word down to future ages. And what is worse, mankind may hereafter, from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing government by human wisdom, and leave it to chance, war, or conquest. I therefore beg leave to move that henceforth prayers, imploring the assistance of Heaven and its blessing on our deliberations, be held in this assembly every morning before we proceed to business; and that one or more of the clergy of this city be requested to officiate in that service.

—Benjamin Franklin: Speech in Convention for forming a Constitution for the United States, 1787.

2. The promises of God's Word will be fulfilled to us.

(3736.) Prayer is the gold key that opens heaven. The tree of the promise will not drop its fruit, unless shaken by the hand of prayer.

—Watson, 1696.

(3737.) We are sometimes told that prayer is very useful in its influence on ourselves, though it cannot be supposed to influence God; and that we ought to pray, therefore, to produce in ourselves pious feelings, without expecting any direct answer from Him whom we invoke. But who would pray if deprived of all hope of any answer to prayer? Without faith it is impossible to pray; for "he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." Not only must we have faith in His existence, but in the fact that He does answer prayer. Both are needed for this exercise. The secondary benefit is dependent on the possibility of receiving a primary and direct benefit. In the very act of seeking the latter we secure also the former, but the expectation of the objective boon prompts the act which produces the subjective benefit. As well might a physician advise a patient to walk every morning to drink of a certain spring, the real benefit being the walk, but the inducement being the water, which at the same time he stated would not be found, as the spring was dry. The exercise of prayer—this walk of faith—is incalculably beneficial to the soul; but it is essential to prayer that there should be the expectation of obtaining that for which we pray.

—Newman Hall.

3. We shall be reminded of our dependence on God.

(3738.) If the bounties of Heaven were given to man without prayer, they would be received without acknowledgment. Prayer, administering the perpetual lesson of humility, of hope, and of love, makes us feel our connection with heaven through every touch of our necessities; it binds us to Providence by a chain of daily benefits; it impresses the hearts of all with a perpetual remembrance of the God of all.

—Croly.

4. The burden of our soul will be relieved by the very act of prayer.

(3739.) It is a mercy to pray, though I never have the mercy prayed for.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(3740.) Did you ever see a little child rushing home from school in hot haste, with glowing cheeks and tearful eyes, burning and smarting under some fancied or real injustice or injury in his school life? He runs through the street; he rushes into the house; he puts off every one who tries to comfort him. "No, no! he doesn't want them; he wants mother; he's going to tell mother." And when he finds her he throws himself into her arms and sobs out to tell her all the tumult of his feelings, right or wrong, reasonable or unreasonable. "The school is hateful; the teacher is hard, and the lessons are too long; he can't learn them, and the boys laugh at him, and won't she say he needn't go any more?"

Now, though the mother does not grant his foolish petitions, she soothes him by sympathy; she calms him; she reasons with him; she inspires him with courage to meet the necessary trials of school-life—in short, her grace is sufficient for her boy; her strength perfects his weakness. He comes out tranquillised, calm and happy—not that he is going to get his own foolish wishes, but that his mother has taken the matter in hand and is going to look into it, and the right thing is going to be done.

Now this is an exact illustration of the kind of help it is for us, "in every thing by prayer to make known our requests to God." The very act of confidence is in itself tranquillising, and the Divine sympathy meets and sustains us.

—Mrs. Beecher Stowe.

5. We shall be calmed in, and strengthened for, life's conflicts.

(3741.) Prayer does not directly take away a trial or its pain, any more than a sense of duty directly takes away the danger of infection, but it preserves the strength of the whole spiritual fibre, so that the trial does not pass into the temptation to sin. A sorrow comes upon you. Omit prayer and you fall out of God's testing into the devil's temptation; you get angry, hard of heart, reckless. But meet the dreadful hour with prayer, cast your care on God, claim Him as your Father though He seem cruel—and the degrading, paralysing, embittering effects of pain and sorrow pass away, streams of sanctifying and softening thought pour into the soul, and that which might have wrought your fall but works in you the peaceable fruits of righteousness. You pass from bitterness into the courage of endurance, and from endurance into battle, and from battle into victory, till at last the trial dignifies and blesses your life. The force of prayer is not altogether effective at once. Its action is cumulative. At first there seems no answer to your exceeding bitter cry. But there has been an answer. God has heard. A little grain of strength, not enough to be conscious of, has been given in one way or another. A friend has come in and grasped your hand—you have heard the lark sprinkle his notes like raindrops on the earth—a text has stolen into your mind, you know not how. Next morning you awake with the old aching at the heart, but the grain of strength has kept you alive—and so it goes on; hour by hour, day by day, prayer brings its tiny sparks of light till they orb into a star; its grains of strength till they grow into an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast. The answer to prayer is slow; the force of prayer is cumulative. Not till life is over is the whole answer given, the whole strength it has brought understood.

—Stopford Brooks.

6. Our characters will be ennobled.

(3742.) Would you measure in some sort the gains of this communion with God to which we are admitted and invited, consider only what we may gain by communion with good and holy men, and then conclude from this less to the greater. Consider, I say, the elevating, ennobling influences which it exercises on the character to live in habitual intercourse with the excellent of the earth, with those whose conversation is in heaven, the tones of whose minds are high and lofty and pure. Almost without being aware of it, we derive some of their spirit into ourselves; it is like an atmosphere of health which we unconsciously inhale. But how much more must this be the case, how far mightier the reactive influence for good, when we continually set before us, when we live in fellowship with Him, who is the highest, the purest, and the best, in whom all perfections meet, from whom all true nobleness proceeds; when thus, I say, our fellowship is not with men, who have caught a few glimpses of the glory of God, but with God Himself, from whom all greatness and glory proceed?

—Trench.

(3743.) We know those who have been used to kings' courts or educated society from others. By their voice, accent, and language, and not only so, by their gestures and gait, by their usages, by their mode of conducting themselves and their principles of conduct, we know well what a vast difference there is between those who have lived in good society, and those who have not. What indeed is called "good society" is often very worthless society. I am not speaking of it to praise it; I only mean, that, as the manners which men call refined or courtly are gained only by intercourse with courts and polished circles, and as the influence of the words there used (that is, of the ideas which those words, striking again and again on the ear, convey to the mind), extends in a most subtle way over all that men do; over the turn of their sentences and the tone of their questions and replies, and their general bearing, and the spontaneous flow of their thoughts, and their mode of viewing things, and the general maxims or heads to which they refer them, and the motives which determine them, and their likings and dislikings, hopes and fears, and their relative estimate of persons, and the intensity of their perceptions towards particular objects; so a habit of prayer, the practice of turning to God and the unseen world, in every season, in every place, in every emergency (let alone its supernatural effect of prevailing with God),—prayer, I say, has what may be called a natural effect, in spiritualising and elevating the soul. A man is no longer what he was before; gradually, imperceptibly to himself, he has imbibed a new set of ideas, and become imbued with fresh principles. He is as one coming from kings' courts, with a grace, a delicacy, a dignity, a propriety, a justness of thought and taste, a clearness and firmness of principle, all his own. Such is the power of God's secret grace acting through those ordinances which He has enjoined us; such the evident fitness of those ordinances to produce the results which they set before us. As speech is the organ of human society, and the means of human civilisation, so is prayer the instrument of divine fellowship and divine training.

—Newman.

7. Our souls will be enriched.

(3744.) Prayer chiefly is the soul's communion with God. It is chiefly translation. It is chiefly transfiguration. It was worth more to Peter,

James, and John, to stand for an hour and see the spirits dawn through the heaven, and talk with Christ, whose face shone as the sun, and whose raiment was white as the light, than if the three tabernacles which they craved had been built of diamonds and rubies on the mountain-top. It is what we get by the soul that makes us rich.

—Becher.

(3745.) In praying we are blessed. It is with prayer as with study. When a youth is at college, he is apt to fancy that the chief reward of his industry will be the prize, the scholarship, or the degree for which he is contending; but in after years he finds that the most coveted scholastic prize is not to be compared in value with that clearness, strength, and discipline of the understanding which in his studies he is unconsciously acquiring. So in prayer, we are apt to imagine that the chief benefit of our supplications will be the obtaining of the blessing for which we make request; and yet nothing outside of us that can be secured by prayer is comparable in preciousness with the changes wrought in us by heartfelt and prolonged communion with God.

—R. A. Bertram.

8. We shall be prepared for heaven.

(3746.) It is plain to common sense that the man who has not accustomed himself to the language of heaven will be no fit inhabitant of it when, in the Last Day, it is perceptibly revealed. The case is like that of a language or style of speaking of this world; we know well a foreigner from a native.

—Newman.

VII. THE METAPHYSICS OF PRAYER.

1. The secret of its usefulness and power.

(3747.) Prayer is useful,—1. As an act of obedience to God's command.

2. As the performance of a condition, without which He hath not promised us His mercy, and to which He hath promised it.

3. As a means to actuate, and express, and increase our own humility, dependence, desire, trust, and hope in God, and so to make us capable and fit for mercy, who else should be incapable and unfit.

4. And so, though God be not changed by it in Himself, yet the real change that is made by it on ourselves, doth infer a change in God by mere relation or extrinsic denomination; He being, according to the tenor of His own covenant, engaged to punish the unbelieving, prayerless, and disobedient, and to pardon them that are faithfully desirous and obedient. So that in prayer, faith and fervency are so far from being useless, that they as much prevail for the thing desired by qualifying ourselves for it, as if indeed they moved the mind of God to a real change; even as he that is in a boat, and by his hook layeth hold of the bank, doth as truly by his labour get nearer the bank, as if he drew the bank to him.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3748.) Prayer procures deliverance from trouble, just as Naaman's dipping himself seven times in Jordan procured him a deliverance from his leprosy; not by any virtue in itself adequate to so great an effect, you may be sure, but from this, that it was appointed by God as the condition of his recovery; and so obliged the power of Him who appointed it to give force and virtue to His own institutions.

beyond what the nature of the thing itself could otherwise have raised it to. —South, 1633-1716.

2. Is not rendered unnecessary by God's faithfulness to His promises.

(3749.) "God's promises, by reason of His unchangeableness, may be relied on; what occasion, then, of prayer, seeing the thing promised will come round of its own steady accord, whether you open your lips or no?" The answer is short and simple. These promises are made only to those who expect, and desire, and ask for them. They are not promised indifferently, and come out of their own accord to all, but to such only who have meditated them, and who value them, and desire them, and earnestly seek them; being, in truth, too valuable to be thrown about to a scrambling mob; being the high and holy attractions by which God intended to work upon the nature of man, and lead it out of its present low and sunken estate into glorious liberty and unwearied ambition of every noble excellence. They are prizes in the hand of God to stimulate the soul's activities,—more glorious prizes than laurel wreaths, or the trumpetings of fame, or principalities and thrones,—and they are yielded only to an application of faculties, at the least, as intense and ardent as is put forth in pursuit of human ambition. God doth not cheapen His promises down to a glance at them with the eye, or a mouthing of them with the tongue, but He requireth of those that would have them an admiration equal to that of lovers, an estimation equal to that of royal diadema, and a pursuit equal to that of Olympic prizes. —Irving, 1792-1834.

3. It is not rendered unnecessary by God's unchangeableness.

(3750.) Another cavil against prayer is drawn from the unchangeableness of God. This objection is another instance of the ease with which men find objections to religion, and you have only to apply it to another subject in order to discern its fallacy. In the administration of justice, its inflexibility or unchangeableness is that very quality which makes all men bold in offering their petitions in its courts. If it were at the call of power, or party, or selfishness, or favouritism, or even of mercy, it would be unheeded, instead of awfully respected, and surely calculated on. So far from hindering men from addressing prayers which are consistent with the laws promulgated, its steadiness of purpose is the very life of all such petitions. A man has no sooner claim for redress than he expects it and sues it out. A man is no sooner defrauded in an inferior court, than he expects and petitions for justice in a superior. The flocking of all the injured in the kingdom to the judges as they go their rounds, and to the magistrates where they reside, is the clearest proof of the effect of an unchangeable mood of operations in begetting confidence, and calling forth active and urgent requests.

Now, it is so not only in matters of justice, but in every other department of our affairs. A father that is constant in his procedure is sure to beget expectation, and desire, and confidence in his children; who, knowing where to find his will and pleasure, look for it, and converse of it, and calculate on it as a thing secure. A friend that is constant in his friendship, a counsellor that is constant in his wisdom, a master that is constant in his requirements, a man that is consistent in his public or private behaviour,—each one of these begets expectation and anticipation, which are the very food of desire and of prayer. For there is little or no desire of a thing which we have no hope of obtaining. It is the expectation begotten which turns chance or indifference into desire, and the desire to possess is the only thing which can justify the request to obtain. So that without expectation there is no prayer properly so-called, and without constancy of procedure no expectation will be generated; so that constancy is the soul of prayer.

On the other hand, I am willing to allow that while constancy, either in the laws of nature, or the ways of men, or the promises of God, begets expectation and desire and prayer in that direction to which they constantly tend, it never fails to destroy expectation, and along with it desire and prayer, in the opposite direction. If justice be inflexible, it is vain to petition against it; if a father be unbending from the rules of his household, his children soon learn to confine their wishes and prayers within the given bounds. And a friend who is known to be staunch is not bored with undermining surmises; nor a counsellor that is always wise, with fallacious sophisms; nor a master that is firm, with vain suits for relaxation.

While steadiness of purpose and character is the life of expectation and prayer within the bounds of its fixed procedure, it is the death of all without them.

Now, though these illustrations bring out by example the truth of that doctrine, that the unchangeableness of God, instead of begetting torpor, is like the loadstone, which, though restful itself, draws all things towards it, that it is all the ground upon which rests that anticipation which is both wind and sails to the movements of the mind; yet these same illustrations, especially that from justice and an unchangeable father, have in them a hardness and sternness which may have engendered a wrong conception of God, which it is necessary to remove before advancing further. If God's promises did embrace nothing but abstract justice, and measure out nice and strict desert, then their unchangeableness were the death-blow to all expectation of future weal; but seeing they contain mercy, and forgiveness, and peace, and everlasting blessedness to all who receive His oracles and walk thereby,—being a rule not to equity only, but a rule to mercy and to bounty, and to whatever else is amiable and attractive to the soul of man,—it comes to pass that their stability and unchangeableness is the stability and unchangeableness of that wise and wide and lovely administration which sufficeth to comfort and upbraid the fallen, as well as to strike down and discomfit the refractory and rebellious. —Irving, 1792-1834.

(3751.) Prayer is not designed, as some have mischievously construed it, to alter the purpose of God. Some have said, "God is omniscient, and knows all things. God has His sovereign purposes, and has declared all things. Is it therefore," they say, "possible that your prayers can alter the purpose of Heaven; or that He whose plans have been chalked out from everlasting can be moved to turn aside from it by the earnestness or eloquence of your entreaties?" The objection that has been often made to prayer, is practically such as this—

"God is omniscient, therefore He knows what you want. What is the use of telling Him?" The answer is plain. God is omnipotent. He can give you harvest without sowing. What is the use of sowing? But nevertheless you sow, and nevertheless we pray; and your common-sense will tell you that it is truer and more scriptural than the metaphysics of the schools. It will be told us, God is immutable in all His plans and purposes and acts; therefore why try to make Him change? God is immutable in the principles of His government, but He is not immutable in His acts. For instance, God did not create once, God did create once, and now He has ceased from creating. Here are three distinct and different acts; yet God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. God therefore may be immutable in the principles of His government, but not in the modes in which He carries those principles in development.

But, you say, "We see that God governs the world by second causes. If there be a frost, fruits will be nipped; if there be no rain, the earth will be parched; and we shall find this law always and everywhere." We see a little into God's great plans, and then we pronounce upon them; just as some geologists see a few feet down through the rind of the earth, and then pronounce upon its inner contents. It may be and is true, that God does commonly work the world by second causes; only these second causes that we see are the results of our discovery; and you know a discovery made by man can be corrected and improved; the fact that God hears prayer is not our discovery, but His revelation of His own will, which we know absolutely to be true. But grant that "God works by second causes, therefore," we reply, "it is not needless to implore Him, or necessary to suppose He will alter these and disturb nature to suit us." Suppose a chain stretching from the throne down to the very footstool. Of course each link is dependent on the previous link, or each third cause upon the second, and each second upon the first, and all upon the staple that fixes it to the throne of God. Very well, you answer, how can He do anything that you ask without dislocating the chain; removing one link, and substituting another at our prayer; which would be disorganisation and confusion. The solution is plain. May not the power of God be transmitted down that chain as the electric fluid is transmitted along the wire; not injuring the medium by which it travels, and yet achieving stupendous results at the end at which it arrives? May not God, therefore, without dislocating a single link, without ceasing to act by second cause, send an influence through the whole series of causes that will be an answer to your prayer, and yet in full conformity with all the fixed arrangements of His own mighty and glorious universe? And if God has decrees—as we admit He has—may not His decree include in its execution our desire? And may it not be that the necessity of our desire is just as fixed as the fact of God's everlasting, unchangeable decree?

But the fact is, the man that wants does not discuss metaphysics; he prays. There is something in our hearts that tell us, like an echo of what God has uttered in heaven, "Seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened; ask, and ye shall obtain." The moment that a person begins to discuss the possibilities of prayer, the philosophy of prayer, the metaphysics of prayer, that moment, depend upon it, he does not feel his deep wants as he should, nor know what are the blessings that can supply them. You never find a hungry child begin first to discuss metaphysical difficulties with his mother when he wants bread; and you will not find a man, who really and in his inmost soul feels that he needs saving blessings, pause or arrest his petitions for a single moment in discussing how it is possible that God can answer prayer; or how, without disturbing His fixed arrangements, He can bow His ear and listen to my petition. The text that upsets all objections is that God will have man everywhere to pray. Make the experiment; "seek, and you shall find—pray without ceasing—knock, and it shall be opened—ask, and you shall obtain."

—Cumming.

(3752.) Some persons, setting themselves to speculate upon the subject, and not submitting their speculations to the guidance of the Bible, find themselves unable to see how prayer can be of any use. "It cannot change the purpose of God," they say. "It cannot alter that course of events which He has appointed." "He is too great to be moved,—too high to be reached,—too firm to be influenced by our poor petitions." And so they "restrain prayer" in themselves, and chill into prayerlessness all who give up their minds to the guidance of their philosophy.

It is perhaps a sufficient answer to such speculations, to ask their authors whether it is any more reasonable for us to expect that, on condition of our digging and mellowing the ground and putting seeds into it, the Creator will open those little seeds, and fetch an abundant harvest out of them; or that on condition of our putting certain kinds of food into our mouths, He will put forth His energy to change it into blood, and muscle, and bones, for the upbuilding of these bodies; or that on condition of our stretching a wire across the continent, and adjusting certain metals and fluids, according to an arrangement which He has appointed, we may write our message, and He will, in the twinkling of an eye, by an instantaneous, imperceptible thrill along that wire, cause the message to be faithfully written at the other end of it, on the other side of the continent;—whether it is any more reasonable to believe that God will put forth His almighty power for us, to do such things, on such conditions, than that He will put forth the same power to help us and to bless us, on condition of our asking Him to do so.

I say, this might be a sufficient answer to such speculations. Certainly it would show that there really is no less difficulty in harmonising the unchangeableness of God's purposes with the utility of man's labour, than with the efficacy of man's prayers.

It will generally be found that there is in the same minds really as much scepticism in the one respect as in the other. Those who think it absurd to pray to God do not really see His hand and His working in those wonders by which He seeks to make Himself known. They do not recognise the living God—but only a blind mechanical thing which they call nature—in those wonderful and mysterious processes to which I alluded. It is not far from Deism to Atheism. It is not much better to believe in a God who will not hear our prayers, than not to believe in any God at all. Not much.

better in its effect upon us and not much more philosophical.
—Nelson.

(3753.) We are told that prayer is unphilosophical, inasmuch as the success of prayer would involve a change of operation in Him who is immutable. "Has not God arranged all events from eternity? Is not everything foreknown, predetermined by Him, and can our feeble cries change His all-wise decrees?" But the same objection applies to our exertions as much as to your prayers. If it is absurd to suppose we can gain anything by asking the help of God, it is surely no less absurd to expect advantage from efforts of our own. Those who urge this plea contradict it in daily life. Let them act upon it and they will be at least consistent in their folly. Are you in business? Be not diligent—take no precautions—in special circumstances make no special efforts to secure success. God foreknows and has foreordained to the uttermost farthing how much you will gain or lose. Be not so presumptuous as to suppose that your efforts can disarrange His purposes. If you break a limb, ask no surgeon to set it. If you are in pain, adopt no methods to mitigate it. If a dangerous malady seize you, call in no physician to cure it. How can you presume to suppose you can alter the divine plan—or the irreversible decrees of necessity and fate? Fools and blind! If you work to bring about what you deem desirable, in spite of eternal purposes and irrevocable destiny, why not pray? If your own exertions may possibly benefit you, why may not God's exertions in answer to your prayer, when He Himself has commanded us to pray, and commanded it as a means of securing assistance from Him? We pretend not to explain the mystery of the divine purposes in connection with the efficacy of prayer. Neither can our opponents explain the equal mystery of those purposes in connection with the value of their own exertions. Yet, with the problem unsolved, they persist in working. So we persist in praying; but how will their efforts for their own well-being rise up at the last day to condemn those who neglected prayer under a pretext which their every action in daily life disowned!
—Neuman Hall.

4. In view of the experience and testimony of God's people, speculative objections against prayer are futile and absurd.

(3754.) You believe in the existence of lately discovered planets, and in other astronomical facts which you yourself have never observed, and you would think it absurd scepticism in any man to doubt them. Why? Because all who have used the proper glasses, and carefully made the proper observations, concur in affirming the truth. Now you will find no sincere Christian of long standing and observation but will tell you he has had many and decisive proofs in their number and coincidence that his prayer was heard, and practically answered in the occurrences of his life. However widely devout men disagree in other points, in this they are well agreed; and very many have declared that things have never gone well with them when their morning prayers have been distracted, cold, and languid. To suppose it is with all these witnesses the dream of superstition, is not less irrational than it would be to suppose that all the observers of the Georgium Sidus, of Pallas, and Ceres, have been deceived by meteors, or some defect in their glasses.

To say that the majority of persons have no such evidence, who do not pray aright, and live right, in order to secure answers to their prayers, would be as idle an objection as that the planets just mentioned have not been seen by those who never looked for them in a proper direction, and by the aid of a proper telescope.

—Hannah More's Life.

(3755.) We cannot tell why it should be so, or how it is that our prayers are followed by divine performances. But we need not the less, on that account, joyfully accept the fact, as revealed to us by God. Some, indeed, have tried to discourage from all prayer on this ground. They have said, What possible effect can our prayers have on the Omnipotent? and hence they have concluded that it is vain for us to pray. Now, the meaning of this objection is simply that they cannot tell how our prayers can affect the divine actings; in other words, that they cannot trace the connection between our act in prayer and God's act in answering it. This is all that the objection to prayer implied in such a question can mean. Well, we would reply, What of that? This is not peculiar to prayer; it is true of everything that is the result of any other thing. People are apt to imagine that what they are familiar with as a phenomenon they understand as a speculation. But no man understands causation. In the commonest instances of cause and effect there is a mystery which none can penetrate; for no man can tell how it is that the cause produces the effect. If a match be applied to a quantity of gunpowder, for instance, there is an explosion, and we say the explosion has been caused by the application of the match. True; the one followed instantly on the other; but why it did so, or what is the connection between the two, we cannot tell. All we know in any such case is, that the fact which we call the effect follows invariably the fact which we call the cause. Now, we know as much as this in regard to the connection between prayer and its effect. We know, from God's Word, that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." We know by experience that the utterance of prayer is followed by a divinely-produced result; and knowing this, we know as much about the connection between prayer and its answer, as we know of the connection between any cause and its effect.
—W. L. Alexander.

VIII. ITS RANGE.

1. Nothing is too little to be made a subject of prayer.

(3756.) Many of our troubles, indeed, are in His sight no more than the breaking of a toy would be to a child; yet as the loving father, while knowing how small the thing is that has given his child its pain, does not therefore turn the child away,—does not say, "Silly child, it is but a toy," but soothes the distress of his little one, tenderly wiping its tears, and removing the sorrow by more than repairing the loss,—so and much more does God. The greatest loss of earthly things is in His eyes but as the breaking of a toy; yet does He no more stand aloof from His children's sorrow because He is God, than does the father because he is a grown man. He does not sit above the clouds, as the heathen thought that their gods sat, wrapped in the selfishness of His superiority, and despising the littleness of the creatures that crawl below. "He knoweth our frame," for He made it. "He understandeth our thoughts," for the mind, from whence they rise, is His workmanship. And there is nothing which is a source of pain or uneasiness, of doubt or difficulty, of grief or anguish to His children, which He is not only willing to hear of but desirous that they should tell Him.

—Chamneys.

2. We may pray for secular blessings.

(3757.) Question. Is it proper to go to God with secular troubles, and make them subject-matter of prayer? Would you, for instance, encourage men who are in debt to pray that God would help them to means with which to discharge their indebtedness?

I would. Any trouble that a man would go to his earthly father about, he may go to his God about. People say, "Do you believe that, contrary to all the great laws of nature and political economy, God will provide a sum of money for a man in answer to his prayer? Do you believe that God contravenes natural laws to assist a man in paying his debts?" I do not. But when a man has used his means to the uttermost, and trusts in God, then God uses His means to control natural laws for that man's benefit. I know that, if I succeed, I must succeed, not by having my father's name, but by putting forth my own exertions. I know that I must make my own way in life, and I undertake to do it. But if I come to a point where I am shut up, held back, so that I cannot go forward, and I do not know what to do, I may go to my father for help. It is not for the sake of throwing off burdens, it is not with the expectation that he will contravene natural laws, that I go to him. I go to him because I have used up my stock of knowledge of natural laws; and I say to him, "You are older and larger than I am; cannot you use your knowledge of those laws so as to help me?" And he says, "Yes, I can." And he does. And nobody thinks there is anything strange in it. Everybody understands that a father can use his knowledge of natural laws for his child without violating those laws. But when you speak of God's helping men in their secular affairs, people are aghast, and say, "Do you suppose God is going to stop the laws of nature for the sake of enabling men to keep their bank account running?" I understand that God helps men, not by stopping natural laws, but by using them better for us than we can use them for ourselves. And if there is anything justified, it is prayer for help in secular matters by those that love God. And the oftener you go to God for help, the more welcome you are. When a man comes to you for counsel concerning things that are important as affecting his welfare, it not only does not impoverish you to give him the benefit of your knowledge and wisdom, but you are gratified at his consulting you, and you take pleasure in lending yourself to him to that extent. I cannot conceive of a man who, having a store of discreet knowledge, should be unwilling to use it for the succour of his fellow-men. If ducats were as plenty with me as thoughts, I should be most happy to lend to everybody!

Now, when we go to God, we ask Him to do things that please Him. It is more blessed for Him to give to you and to help you than not to do it. And when a man is in trouble, and goes to God, and says, "I have done all I can. I do not know what to do more. I am willing to suffer or to be relieved. Thy will be done,"—I believe that then God hears and answers prayer, even though the trouble be of a secular nature. And I do not believe that in doing it He violates natural laws. I believe, on the contrary, that He controls natural laws, and makes them perform errands of mercy. I should feel almost as though I were an orphan if that doctrine were taken out of the world.

I recollect hearing my father say that once, when he came home from a journey on a Saturday night in the dead of winter, mother met him at the door, and said, "We have just enough fuel for this evening, but none for to-morrow." Anybody that ever lived on Litchfield Hill in winter knows that a Sunday there and then would not suggest summer. Father used to be run very close for money in those days, and in this instance he had none, and did not know where to get any. And, in telling of it, he said, "I felt like a child, and I inwardly prayed God to help me." And he said he had hardly finished praying before an old farmer, who had never been particularly friendly, and who did not come to church very often, drove up to the door with a load of wood, which he said he "took it into his head he would like to give to the parson."

Do you ask me if that was an answer to prayer? Well, although I would not attempt a philosophical explanation of it, it is so pleasant to think it was an answer to prayer, and the circumstances point so strongly in that direction, that I prefer to think it was. I do not believe it will do anybody any hurt to believe that God loves us, that His ear is ever open to our cry, and that, while we use all lawful and known means in our own behalf, He stands ready to succour us in the day of trouble. I would not for anything have my mouth stopped so that I could not go to Him in my extremity, and say, "I am poor and wretched; oh, help, help!"

—Becher.

2. Yet there are limitations to its range, such as:—

(1.) The real good of the suppliant.

(3758.) Immense as is the power of prayer, it is a mistake to suppose that good men will get anything they choose to ask for. On the men of the world God may bestow those gratifications of their lusts for which they clamour to Him, as He showered quails on the gluttonous Israelites whom even "angels'" food did not satisfy, and in the same day smote them with a great plague (Numb. xi., Ps. cvi. 15); but no fervour or persistency in supplication will ever induce Him to give to His people what would be to their injury. Our Lord marks it as distinctive of a father, that, notwithstanding the evil that cleaves to our nature, he will not give his children what would be hurtful to them. "What man is there of you," He says, "whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent?" Mark the argument that our Lord founds upon this fact. "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven give good things"—and only good things—"to them that ask Him!"

The promise is: "They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing:"—not what they may think good, but what is good; and not everything that is good in itself, but what is good for them. Things that are good in themselves may be to certain individuals bad and hurtful things. The physician says to one of his patients: "Be very careful not to touch animal food." "Why, doctor," the patient answers, "I did not know you were a vegetarian." "Nor am I," is the doctor's reply; "animal food is in itself a good thing, but to you, in your present condition, it is poison." In effect, the Heavenly Physician often says the same thing. To the supplicants at His throne He says, "The things you ask are in themselves good and desirable, but to you they would be hurtful, and therefore you shall not have them."

—R. A. Bertram.

(2.) God's appointments respecting the future life.

(3759.) Look but upon one that plays a game at bowls, how, no sooner than he hath delivered his bowl, what a screwing of his body this way and that way, what calling duth he make after it that it may be neither short nor over, nor wide on either side; but all in vain: the bowl keepeth on its course and reacheth to the place, not where the mind but the strength of the bowler sent it. Thus it is with those that pray for the dead: they pray and call unto God, and sing requiems and dirges for the souls of men departed, that they may be sent into purgatory, not hell—a course altogether unwarrantable, unavailable; for, as the body is laid down in the dust, so the soul is gone to God that gave it, there to receive according to the deeds done here in the flesh, whether it be to life or death eternal.

—Wincop, 1627.

4. These limitations are wisely and mercifully ordained.

(3760.) Had God made prayer absolute in power, He would practically have resigned the government of the universe into the hands of men, and sank into the position of a mere servant of His creatures; and those who remember how wicked most men are, and how unwise often are the best men, will tremble at the very thought of the consequences of such a revolution. To have made prayer absolute would have involved most contradictory procedures. What strange contests of supplication would have occurred! The heir, for example, praying that the man from whom he has large expectations may be speedily removed to a better world, and the man himself praying that he may be permitted to continue in the world many years! And the prayers of each alike absolute in power! On such an arrangement as this, the world could not have gone on for a single day. Nay, it would have been a fearful curse had every prudent and right prayer been made all powerful. All men would then have been in danger of becoming atheists. The uniformity of the power of prayer would have operated in the same manner as the regularity of the processes of nature does now, but far more mightily. Now, because the forces of nature operate with undeviating regularity, many students of science maintain that the great machine of the universe moves on by its own momentum, and laugh at us who worship God as the great First Cause and Primal Force; and then, had every wise word of prayer been followed by blessing as surely and manifestly as every fall of the hammer of a well-loaded revolver is followed by an explosion, men would have lost all sense of their dependence on a Divine Being. Prayers, in fact, would cease to be offered; they would be instanta- tions. For these reasons, in the greatness of His mercy, God has reserved to Himself the right of answering as well as of hearing prayer, and of dispensing the blessings of Providence, even as He does the "gifts of the Holy Ghost," "according to His own will."

—R. A. Bertram.

5. These limitations should be reverently respected by us.

(3761.) When, by one way or another, from the Bible or from the world around us, we have discovered God's purpose and will, then we do not ask Him to change it, but to help us to bear or to fulfil it. "If we ask anything according to His will He heareth us." No one thinks of praying that the sun may rise in the west instead of the east. And why? Not because it is impossible with God, but that long-continued experience has clearly revealed His will. No one thinks of praying, that one who has just breathed his last may wake up to life once more. And why? Not because it is impossible with God, but that He has willed it otherwise. And so no one thinks it right to pray that those who have advanced to extreme old age should be granted a new lease of life, and blush again into youth, and the blooms of early promise. Whenever we clearly and decidedly recognise the will of God, we submit to it as inevitable and unalterable.

—W. Page Roberts.

IX. IS A DUTY BINDING ON ALL MEN.

(3762.) Though an unbeliever sin in praying, yet it is not a sin for him to pray. There is sin in the manner of his praying; but prayer, as to the act and substance of it, is his duty. He sins, not because he prays, that is required of him, but because he prays amiss, not in that manner that is required of him. There are abominations in the prayers of a wicked man, but for him to pray is not an abomination, it is the good and acceptable will of God, that which He commands. He commands him to pray, and he sins not in complying with the command, so far it is obedience; but he prays not as he ought to do, there is his sin. Now he should leave his sin, not his duty. He should pray better in another manner, that is all which can be inferred, not that he should not pray at all. For so he leaves not his sin, but his duty. A boy is learning to write; he scribbles at first untowardly, makes, it may be, more blots than letters. It is his fault that he blots, not that he writes, that is his duty; in this case you would have him leave blotting, not leave writing. So here, the act of prayer is a duty, but the manner of performing this act, therein is the fault; this should be corrected, but the act should not be omitted. —Clarkson, 1622-1687.

X. IS A PRIVILEGE.

(3763.) There is great evil in regarding prayer as mere duty. The moment we so regard it, as a duty we begin to perform it. Very justly, and not oftener than true, is it said—"Service was performed." Yes, it was performed; it was a performance from beginning to end; and so the consequence of regarding prayer as a duty is, that we go forth to perform our duty, and having expressed our wants in prayer, we conclude our duty has been done. But this is a great mistake; this is accepting the means as the end. You go to the throne of grace—to a fountain deeper than Jacob's well; you draw water—living water, but, instead of drinking the water as you should, you are satisfied with having raised the bucket to the ground, and you retire, having done your duty. The end of drawing living water is to drink it; the meaning of praying is to reach something beyond it. Prayer is not a religious duty, but the means of attaining religious blessings. By its very nature it is the instrument of religious progress, comfort, and peace.

—Cumming.

(3764.) Our hearts should open themselves in prayer to God for their many wants, as the infant openeth its hungry mouth, and lifteth up the cry into the ear of its mother; and as that infant, being filled and satisfied, smiles in the face of its mother, and spreads its little hands to embrace her in token of the gladness of its heart, so ought our spirits, being filled with the answers of their prayers, to feel an inward joy and thankfulness to the Father of spirits, and call upon the lips and hands, and every other obedient member, to express with songs and attitudes of praise the emotions with which they overflow.

—Irving, 1792-1834.

XI. KINDS OF PRAYER.

1. Ejaculatory prayer.

(1.) Its power.

(3765.) Ejaculatory prayer is prayer darted up from the heart to God, not at stated intervals, but in the course of our daily occupations and amusements. The word "ejaculatory" is derived from the Latin word for a dart or arrow, and there is an idea in it which one would be loath indeed to forfeit.

Imagine an English archer, strolling through a forest in the old times of Crecy and Agincourt, when the yeomen of this island were trained to deliver their arrows with the same unflinching precision as "a left-handed Gibeonite" discharging a stone bullet from his sling. A bird rises in the brushwood under his feet, a bird of gorgeous plumage or savoury flesh. He takes an arrow from his quiver, draws his bow to its full stretch, and sends the shaft after the bird with the speed of lightning. Scarcely an instant elapses before his prey is at his feet. It has been struck with unerring aim in the critical part and drops on the instant.

Very similar in the spiritual world is the force of what is called ejaculatory prayer. The Christian catches suddenly a glimpse of some blessing, deliverance, relief, a longing after which is induced by the circumstances into which he is thrown. Presently it shall be his. As the archer first draws the bow in towards himself, so the Christian retires, by a momentary act of recollection, into his own mind, and there realises the presence of God. Then he launches one short, fervent petition into the ear of that Awful Presence, throwing his whole soul into the request. And, lo! it is done! The blessing descends, prosecuted, overtaken, pierced, fetched down from the vault of heaven by the winged arrow of prayer.

—Goulburn.

(2.) Is even more essential than stated prayer.

(3766.) A Christian that is frequent in ejaculatory prayer, when he goes to pray more solemnly, does not go from the world to God, but from God to God. What you fill the vessel with, that you must expect to draw from it; if you put in water, you cannot bring out wine. What dost thou fill thy heart with all day? Is it the earth? Then how canst thou expect to find heaven there at night?

If you would have fire for your evening sacrifice, do not expect a new flame to be dropped from heaven, but keep what is already on thy altar from going out, which thou canst not better do than by feeding it with the fuel of ejaculatory prayer all the day.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3767.) Service and prayer are the web and woof of the Christian life, of which every part of it is composed. Both are in the groundwork of the stuff. Not even in point of time must they be too rigidly sundered from one another. Prayer at stated seasons is good and necessary; but a man aiming at sanctity in ever so low a degree, will find it impossible to confine his prayers to stated seasons. He will soon discover that prayer is literally, and not merely in a figure, "the Christian's breath of life;" and that to attempt to carry on the spiritual life without more prayer than the recital of a form on rising, and retiring to rest, is about the same absurdity as it would be for a man to open his casement morning and evening, and inhale the fresh air for a few minutes, and then say to himself on closing it, that that amount of breathing must suffice him for the rest of the day. The analogy suggested by this image is, I believe, a perfectly true one, and will hold good if examined. The air from the casement is very delicious, very healthful, very refreshing, very invigorating; it is a good thing to stand at the casement and inhale it; but there must be air in the shop, in the factory, in the office, as well as at the casement, if the man, as he works, is to survive. Under this view of it, ejaculatory prayer is seen to be even a more essential thing than stated prayer. Both are necessary to the well-being of Christian life; but the momentary lifting the heart to God,—the momentary realisation of His presence amidst business or under temptation,—is necessary to its very being. The life is no more when the work is suspended. For which reason probably it is that the great apostolic prayer-precept is given with a breadth which excludes all in limitations of time and place,— "Pray without ceasing."

—Goulburn.

(3768.) The mind wants steadying and setting right many times a day. It resembles a compass placed on a rickety table; the least stir of the table makes the needle swing round and point untrue. Let it settle, then, till it points aright. Be perfectly silent for a few moments, thinking of Jesus; there is an almost divine force in silence. Drop the thing that worries, that excites, that interests, that thwarts you; let it fall, like a sediment, to the bottom, until the soul is no longer turbid; and say secretly, "Grant, I beseech Thee, merciful Lord, to thy faithful servant pardon and peace; that I may be cleansed from all my sins, and serve Thee with a quiet mind." Yes! with a quiet mind. We cannot serve Him with a turbid one; it is a mere impossibility. Thus composing ourselves from time to time, thus praying and setting the mind's needle true, we shall little by little approximate towards that devout frame, which binds the soul to its true centre, even while it travels through worldly business, worldly excitements, worldly cares.

—Goulburn.

(3.) Is always practicable.

(3769.) Ejaculations take not up any room in the soul. They give liberty of calling, so that at the same instant one may follow his proper vocation. The husbandman may dart forth an ejaculation, and not make a balk the more. The seaman, nevertheless, steers his ship right in the darkest night. Yea, the soldier at the same time may shoot out his prayer to God, and aim his pistol at his enemy, the one better hitting the mark for the other.

The field wherein bees feed is no whit the barer for their biting; when they have taken their full repast on flower or grass, the ox may feed, the sheep fatten on their reversons. The reason is, because those little chemists distil only the refined part of the flower, leaving the grosser substance thereof. So ejaculations bind not men to any bodily observance, only busy the spiritual half, which makes them consistent with the prosecution of any other employment. —Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3770.) In hard havens, so choked up with the envious sands that great ships drawing many feet of water cannot come near, lighter and lesser pinnaces may freely and safely arrive. When we are time-bound, place-bound, so that we cannot compose ourselves to make a large solemn prayer, this is the right instant for ejaculations, whether orally uttered, or only poured forth inwardly in the heart. —Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3771.) Accustom thyself to secret ejaculations and converse with God. Lovers cast many a glance at each other, when they are at a distance and are deprived of set meetings. A little boat may do us some considerable service, when we have not time to make ready a great vessel. —Swinnock, 1673.

(3772.) "Pray that you enter not into temptation." Now when thou canst not draw out the long sword of a solemn prayer, then go to the short dagger of ejaculatory prayer; and with this, if in the hand of faith, thou mayest stab thy enemy to the heart. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3773.) Nehemiah, on the occasion of Artaxerxes' speech to him, interposeth a short prayer to God between the king's question and his answer to it. "Then the king said unto me, For what dost thou make request? So I prayed unto the God of heaven, and I said unto the king," &c. (Neh. ii. 4, 5). So soon was this holy man at heaven, and back again, without any breach of manners in making the king wait for his answer. "Pray always." —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Secret prayer.

(3774.) As the tender dew that falls in the silent night makes the grass and herbs and flowers to flourish and grow more abundantly than great showers of rain that fall in the day, so secret prayer will more abundantly cause the sweet herbs of grace and holiness to grow and flourish in the soul, than all those more open, public and visible duties of religion, which too, too often are mingled and mixed with the sun and wind of pride and hypocrisy. —Brooks, 1608-1680.

(3775.) A Christian should shut both the door of his closet and the door of his lips so close, that none should hear without what he says within.

"Enter into thy closet," says Christ, "and when thou hast shut thy door, pray." But what need a man shut his closet door, if he may pray with a clamorous voice, if he make such a noise as all in the street or all in the house may hear him? The hen, when she lays her eggs, gets into a hole, a corner; but then she makes such a noise with her cackling, that she tells all in the house where she is. Such Christians that in their closets do imitate the hen, do rather pray to be seen, heard, and observed by men, than out of any noble design to glorify God, or to pour out their souls before Him that seeth in secret. Sometimes children, when they are vexed, or afraid of the rod, will run behind the door, or get into a dark hole, and there they will lie crying and sighing and sobbing, that all the house may know where they are. Oh, it is a childish thing so to cry and sigh and sob in our closets, as to tell all in the house where we are, and about what work we are.

—Brooks, 1608-1680.

(3776.) We are more or less disposed for our respective duties according as our diligence, constancy, and seriousness in secret prayer is more or less. The root that produces the beautiful and flourishing tree, with all its spreading branches, verdant leaves, and refreshing fruit, that which gains for it sap, life, vigour, and fruitfulness, is all unseen; and the farther and deeper the roots spread beneath, the more the tree expands above. Christians! if you wish to prosper, if you long to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, strike your roots wide in private prayer. —Saller.

(3777.) A pious young lady, speaking one day of the preciousness of secret prayer, was asked by her pastor how, as a member of a large family of irreligious people, who were seemingly always about her, and with two room-mates to share her chamber, she managed to find either place or time for private devotion.

"As regards time," was the answer, "I secure that by rising an hour before the rest of the family; and the large drawing-room is my closet."

"The large drawing-room!" exclaimed the pastor in surprise. "I should have thought that such a theatre for worldly amusements, and sometimes of profanity as well as dissipation, would have been the last place to select as a sanctuary for prayer."

"It was selected at first," said the young lady, "with considerable reluctance, and not until I had failed in several other attempts to secure quiet and privacy for prayer and meditation; for I feared that the associations connected with that room would hinder my devotions. But I have not found it so. On the contrary, the fact of my having there erected an altar to the all-seeing and sin-hating God, has transformed that room into a very Bethel in my eyes; while the memory of the prayers I have offered there in the early morning, and the sweet seasons of communion enjoyed with my Saviour, furnish the best antidote to the temptations that beset my path. I no sooner enter that room than I feel conscious of the presence of Jesus; and knowing Him to be there, I dare not say or do anything to grieve or drive Him from me. If enticed by any of the gay company my aunt assembles in that room, to engage in sinful pastimes, I hear the pleading voice of my Saviour, saying, 'My daughter, consent thou not.' If for a moment tempted to walk in the broad road of fashionable folly, there falls on my ear, in gentlest accents, the timely warning, 'Be not conformed to the world;' and redolent as is the very atmosphere with my Saviour's presence, I can have no fellowship with the works of darkness."

"A blessed experience is yours, my daughter," was the minister's response. It is even so. Wherever we seek our God He is found; and every place may become hallowed ground. Would that more of the fashionable parlours of our land were used as Bethels!

3. Intercessory prayer.

(3778.) Though the unconverted have not hearts to desire it at your hands; pray over their stupid souls before the Lord. When a friend is sick, and his senses are gone, you do not stay to send for the physician till he comes to himself, and is able to do it for him. You had need make the more haste to God for such as these, lest they go away in this apoplexy of conscience, and so be past praying for.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. Family prayer.

(3779.) Robert Hall, hearing that some worldly-minded persons objected to family prayer as taking up too much time, said that what might seem a loss will be more than compensated by the spirit of order and regularity which the stated observance of this duty tends to produce. It serves as an edge and border, to preserve the web of life from unravelling. "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked; but He blesseth the habitation of the just."

(3780.) Now, one word as to prayer in the family. I mean, not simply the prayer of father or mother, as the case may be, but prayer where you are called, in the family, under any circumstances, to lead in prayer in behalf of others. Never refuse to take up your cross in this regard. I have known parents who, as they were about to come into the church, felt that they must "set up the family altar," as the phrase is; and they knelt down to pray, and, never having heard their own voice in prayer before, they trembled and broke down and could not go on. And then the devil said to them, "Pretty business you are making of it! I advise you to attend to something that you can do better than this." And they got up in disgust, and said, "I am making a fool of myself."

Now, a child that, when it commences walking, totters and falls, does not make a fool of itself. A boy in school that forgets his French, and cannot recite his lesson, does not make a fool of himself. And you do not make a fool of yourself, if, when you first attempt to pray in your family, you do not succeed. You rather excite gentle compassion in God. Do you suppose you have a scoffing God and sneering angels as listeners, when you make a halting, broken prayer? Suppose you do break down, that is only an argument for your trying again. What kind of a life have you been living, what sort of habits have you formed, that the first time you undertake to gratefully recognise in your household the providence and kindness of God, you should give up because you stumble and fall down? It ought to be an argument not of discouragement, but of persistence. You ought to say, "By the help of God, I will persevere, and do my duty."

—Beecher.

(3781.) A Scottish labourer went to work for a wealthy farmer. It was regarded as something of a favour to be employed by him, as he was a prompt and liberal paymaster, and was regarded by his neighbours as a very superior farmer. The Scotchman remained with him only a few days.

"I'm told you've left farmer R.," said a neighbour.

"Yes, I have," was the reply.

"Was the work too hard for you?"

"There was nothing to complain of on that score."

"What then? Were the wages too low?"

"No."

"Why did you leave?"

"There was no roof on the house!" And he went on his way, leaving his questioner to ponder on the strange answer he had given.

The Scotchman's meaning may be found in the saying of an old writer, who affirms that a dwelling in which prayer is not offered up to God daily is like a house without a roof, in which there cannot be either peace, safety, or comfort.

XII. MODES OF PRAYER.

1. Mechanical prayers.

(3782.) The Thibetan puts his written prayers in a cylinder, which revolves on a handle, and which he twirls by the aid of a ball and chain, each revolution of the instrument counting for an offering of the enclosed petition. Sometimes he encloses these in a great drum or cylinder, which he attaches to running water as he constructs his rude flour-mills, thus "praying without ceasing" by water-power; or, in other instances, constructs great prayer windmills.

In Burmah, the Buddhist punches his prayers in long, pennant-like slips of gilt paper, which he ties to a slight bamboo stick and waves before his idol-god, each oscillation being a repetition of the prayer, of which he keeps count by a rosary numbering one hundred and eight balls.

In Timbuctoo (Africa), the priest, or wizard, or medicine-man, writes prayers on a piece of board, washes it off, and, catching the water in a calabash, gives sick people to drink of it for their recovery, or sells it that it may be sprinkled over objects to improve or protect them.

Mohammedans wear Koran prayers about their persons as amulets or charms, though some of the African Mohammedans think they are ineffectual against firearms, which have been invented since Mohammed's day. Ward saw a Mohammedan woman dropping slips of paper on which prayers were written into a river, to obtain from the river-goddess immunity from sickness.

In China, the Taoist, in case of sickness, after performance of certain ceremonies, writes a statement of the fact and a prayer for assistance on a piece of paper, which is burned by the officiating priest, who determines whether it will be answered favourably. And in another process, a message is "sent to heaven" by writing it on paper and performing a ceremony, which enables the soul of the petitioner to leave the body, and "carry the message to heaven and bring back an answer."

In India, Mohammedans sometimes pray by proxy, wealthy persons hiring a sufficient number of men to alternate and ceaselessly read Koran prayers in the Imānebārā in their stead, the merit accruing to the employer. The Mohammedan also uses a rosary, as does the Hindoo ascetic. That of the Mohammedan contains thirty-three beads, that being the number of the times which certain parts of his formula, such as "God is most great: there is no God but He," &c., must be repeated.

—Gracey.

2. Extempore prayers.

(3783.) Some lay it to the charge of extempore prayers, as if it were a diminution to God's majesty to offer them unto Him, because (alluding to David's expression to Ornan the Jebusite) they cost nothing, but come without any pains or industry to provide them (2 Sam. xxiv. 24). A most false aspersion.

Surely preparation of the heart (though not premeditation of every word) is required thereunto. And grant the party, praying at that very instant, forestudies not every expression, yet surely he has formerly laboured with his heart and tongue too, before he attained that dexterity of utterance, properly and readily to express himself. Many hours in the night no doubt he is waking, and was, by himself, practising Scripture phrase and the language of Canaan, whilst such as censure him for his laziness were fast asleep in their beds.

Suppose one should make an entertainment for strangers with flesh, fish, fowl, venison, and fruit, all out of his own fold, field, ponds, park, and orchard, will any say that this feast cost him nothing who makes it? Surely, although all grew on the same, and for the present he bought nothing by the penny, yet he, or his ancestors for him, did at first dearly purchase home accommodations from whence this entertainment did arise.

So the party who has attained the faculty and facility of extempore prayer (the easy act of a laborious habit), though at the instant not appearing to take pains, has been formerly industrious with himself, or his parents with him, in giving pious education, or else he had never acquired so great perfection, seeing only long practice makes the pen of a ready writer.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3784.) Let them that yet deride this as uncertain and inconsiderate praying, but mark themselves, whether they cannot if they be hungry beg for bread, or ask help of their physician or lawyer, or landlord, or any other, as well without a learned or studied form, as with it.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. Written prayers.

(1.) Are lawful.

(3785.) Set prayers are prescript forms of our own or others' composing; such are lawful for any, and needful for some, to use.

Lawful for any. Otherwise God would not have appointed the priests (presumed of themselves best able to pray) a form of blessing the people. Nor would the Saviour have set His prayer, which (as the town-bushel is the standard both to measure corn and other bushels by) is both a prayer in itself and a pattern or platform of prayer. Such as accuse set forms to be pinioning the wings of the dove, will by the next return affirm that girdles and garters, made to strengthen and adorn, are so many shackles and fetters which hurt and hinder men's free motion.

Needful for some. Namely, for such who as yet have not attained (what all should endeavour) to pray extempore by the spirit. But as little children (to whom the plainest and evenest room at first is a labyrinth) are so ambitious of going alone, that they scorn to take the guidance of a form or bench to direct them, but will adventure by themselves, though often to the cost of a knock and a fall; so many confess their weakness, in denying to confess it, who, refusing to be beholden to a set form of prayer, prefer to say nonsense, rather than nothing, in their extempore expressions. More modesty, and no less piety, it had been for such men to have prayed longer with set forms that they might pray better without them.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(3786.) "Is it lawful to pray in a set form of words?" Nothing but very great ignorance can make you really doubt of it. Hath God anywhere forbid it? You will say that it is enough that He hath not commanded it. I answer, That in general He hath commanded it to all whose edification it tendeth to, when He commandeth you that all be done to edification; but He hath given to you no particular command or prohibition. No more hath He commanded you to pray in English, French, or Latin; nor to sing psalms in this tune or that; nor after this or that version or translation; nor to preach in this method particularly or that; nor always to preach upon a text; nor to use written notes; nor to compose a form of words, and learn them, and preach them after they are composed, with a hundred suchlike, which are undoubtedly lawful; yea, and needful to some, though not to others. If you make up all your prayer of Scripture sentences, this is to pray in a form of prescribed words, and yet as lawful and fit as any of your own. The psalms are most of them forms of prayer or praise, which the Spirit of God indited for the use of the Church, and of particular persons.

But are those forms lawful which are prescribed by others and not by God?

Yea; or else it would be unlawful for a child or scholar to use a form prescribed by his parents or master. And to think that a thing lawful doth presently become unlawful, because a parent, master, pastor, or prince doth prescribe it, is a conceit that I will not wrong my reader so far as to suppose him guilty of. Indeed if a usurper, that hath no authority over us in such matters, do prescribe it, we are not bound to formal obedience, that is, to do it therefore because he commandeth it; but yet I may be bound to it on some other accounts; and though his command do not bind me, yet it maketh not the thing itself unlawful.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2.) To many are necessary.

(3787.) One man is so unused to prayer (being ignorantly bred), or of such unready memory or expression, that he cannot remember the tenth part so much of his particular wants, without the help of a form as with it; nor can he express it so affectingly for himself or others; nay, perhaps not in tolerable words; and a form to such a man may be a duty; as to a dim-sighted man to read by spectacles, or to an unready preacher to use prepared words and notes.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3788.) In the family many cannot do without a form. True Christians who truly pray, cannot pray with two or three without a form. If so, let them use it. If a man cannot walk without a crutch, let him use a crutch. If you cannot pray without a form, then by all means adopt the form. Many a spiritual prayer is breathed from a form; many a formal prayer has been uttered extemporaneously. But the essence of prayer does not lie in these things. We may say prayers all day, and yet we may never pray at all; and the heart often prays most fervently when the lips are dumb or wholly inaudible. It is not the eloquent tongue that we want, but the humble and anxious heart. We do not care about a praying place, nor do we care much about a praying book. If we have deep wants felt within, the heart will speak should the lips be dumb. And God hears heart-prayer; He is not dependent upon its outward and eloquent expression. In His ear the Publican's first cry, the Magdalene's first tear, the Thief's word, rose with infinite and perfect acceptance, and brought down an answer exceeding abundant above all that they could ask or think.

—Cumming.

(3.) Efforts should be made to outgrow the need of them.

(3789.) Men may, by sloth, and other vicious dispositions of mind, especially by a negligence in getting their hearts and consciences duly affected with the matter and object of prayer, keep themselves under a real or supposed disability in this matter; but whereas prayer in this sort of persons is an effect of common illumination and grace, which are also from the Spirit of God, if persons do really and sincerely endeavour a due sense of what they pray for and about, He will not be wanting to help them to express themselves so far as is necessary for them, either privately or in their families. But those who will never enter the water but with flags or bladders under them will scarce ever learn to swim; and it cannot be denied but that the constant and unvaried use of set forms of prayer may become a great occasion of quenching the Spirit, and hindering all progress or growth in gifts or graces.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(4.) Are often felt to be inadequate.

(3790.) At certain times of strong emotion our religious feelings outrun any form of words. In such cases, not only is there no need of forms of prayer, but it is perhaps impossible to write forms of prayer for Christians agitated by such feelings. For each man feels in his own way,—perhaps no two men exactly alike;—and we can no more write down how men ought to pray at such times than we can give rules how they should weep or be merry. The better men they are, of course the better they will pray in such a trying time; but you cannot make them better; they must be left to themselves. And, though good men have before now set down in writing forms of prayer for persons so circumstanced, these were doubtless meant rather as patterns and helps, or as admonitions and (if so be) quietings of the agitated mind, than as prayers which it was expected would be used literally and entirely in their detail.

—Newman.

(3791.) No written prayer, unaided by devotional exercises drawn from the heart, can suit the ever-varying circumstances in the divine life. Its plans and designs against its spiritual enemies must be formed, like the plans of a general upon the field of battle, from an actual observation; he regulates his movements from actual inspection, and makes his arrangements on the spot according to the existing circumstances in which he is placed; for there are dangers which cannot be foreseen, and positions taken up by the enemy, as well as calamities of war to be met and encountered with on the spot. Such is the actual state of every soul which is actively fighting the good fight of faith—the soul is a little world where nothing is at rest, but all its powers and faculties are continually exercised in the war between the flesh and the spirit. The soul which really lives to God is engaged in a perpetual warfare. Look at a general. His plans and designs cannot be fixed and stationary, but are ever varying. As he regulates his movements, so must the believer. His plans and designs as to his spiritual enemies can only arise from the actual circumstances in which he is placed. To mortify sins, and keep down the risings of corruption—to resist the encroachments of a worldly spirit, and the temptations of Satan—to be making fresh advances in faith, love, and hope, is the daily business in hand; but our losses, trials, temptations, enemies to be resisted, are always presenting new and various aspects, and prayer must be suited to the special wants and temptations of the day.

—Goulburn.

(3792.) Life is not usually a procession of emergencies. Men ought always to pray. And they ought to pray, not only in the language which will be found extremely precious in an emergency, but they ought to pray during the healthful monotony of an industrious life.

Here is where venerable manuals of prayer usually fail us. No doubt he that is familiar with all their pages can find something in them specially suited to each and every day of still life; but as there is very little to characterise or distinguish one day from another, so there is very little by which to judge and select the prayers that are fit. A well-phrased prayer covers an average day, as a snow-fall hides the little ruts and hoof-marks of a common road. It makes all days and all roads seem alike. And while each day, however insignificant, is made up of details which, one by one, absorb the attention, tax the industry, fill the life, and mould the character, the prayer for that day articulates no detail, but blankets the whole. Thus it comes to pass that daily duty means something definite, while daily prayer has little or no articulation of detail. Under such conditions prayer must necessarily become uninteresting, powerless.

—T. K. Beecher.

4. The mode is non-essential, the spirit all in all.

(3793.) Over-value not therefore the manner of your own worship, and over-vilify not other men's of a different mode. And make not men believe that God is of your childish humour, and valueth or vilifieth words, and orders, and forms, and ceremonies, as much as self-conceited people do.

If one man hear another pray only from the habits of his mind, and present desires, he reproacheth him as a rash, presumptuous speaker, that talketh that to God which he never foreconsidered. As if a beggar did rashly ask an alms, or a corrected child or a malefactor did inconsiderately ask for pardon, unless they learn first the words by rote; or, as if all men's converse, or the words of judges on the bench were all rash; or, the counsel of a physician to his patient, because they use not books and forms, or set not down their words long before.

And if another man hear a form of prayer, especially if it be read out of a book; and especially if it have any disorder or defect, he sticketh not to revile it, and call it false worship, and man's inventions and perhaps idolatry, and to fly from it, and make the world believe that it is an odious thing which God disalloweth. And why so? Are your words so much more excellent than the words of others? Or, are all words bad which are resolved on beforehand? Are the Lord's Prayer and Psalms all odious because they are book-forms? Or, doth the commandment of other men make God hate them? Let parents take heed then of commanding their children prescribed words. (Nay, rather let them take heed lest they neglect such prescripts.) Or, is it the disorder or defects that makes them odious? Such are not to be justified indeed wherever we find them; but woe to us all, if God will not pardon disorders and defects, and accept the prayers that are guilty of them.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

XIII. HINTS AS TO THE CONDUCT OF PRAYER.

1. Close the eyes.

(3794.) If you would keep your mind fixed in prayer, keep your eye fixed. "Unto Thee lift I up mine eyes, O Thou that dwellest in the heavens." Much vanity comes in at the eye. When the eyes wander in prayer, the heart wanders. To think to keep the heart fixed in prayer, and yet let the eyes gaze, is as if one should think to keep his house safe, yet let the windows be open.

—Watson, 1696.

2. Calm the mind.

(3795.) When kneeling down to pray, if for a few minutes you would be still and not attempt either to pray or think, but yield up your mind to God, it prepares the soul for the Holy Spirit to move upon its waters, and I find that words are poured into my mind without effort of my own, and real prayer is more the result. —Maria Hare.

3. Be more careful about the spirit than the order of prayer.

(3796.) Several books have been written to assist in the exercise of prayer, and many useful hints may be borrowed from them; but a too close attention to the method and transitions therein recommended, gives an air of study and formality, and offends against that simplicity which is so essentially necessary to a good prayer, that no degree of acquired abilities can compensate for the want of it. It is possible to learn to pray by rule; but it is hardly possible to do so with benefit to others. When the several parts of invocation, adoration, confession, petition, &c., follow each other in a stated order, the hearer's mind generally goes before the speaker's voice, and we can form a tolerable conjecture what is to come next. On this account we often find that unlettered people, who have had little or no help from books, or rather have not been fettered by them, can pray with an unction and savour in an unpremeditated way, while the prayers of persons of much superior abilities, perhaps even of ministers themselves, are, though accurate and regular, so dry and starched, that they afford little either of pleasure or profit to a spiritual mind. The spirit of prayer is the truth and token of the spirit of adoption. The studied addresses with which some approach the throne of grace remind us of a stranger's coming to a great man's door; he knocks and waits, sends in his name, and goes through a course of ceremony before he gains admittance; while a child of the family uses no ceremony at all, but enters freely when he pleases, because he knows he is at home. It is true we ought always to draw near the Lord with great humiliation of spirit, and a sense of our unworthiness; but this spirit is not always best expressed or promoted by a pompous enumeration of the names and titles of the God with whom we have to do, or by fixing in our minds beforehand the exact order in which we propose to arrange the several parts of our prayer.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

4. Be natural.

(3797.) There may be many reasons why you do not like to pray. One may be that you really are not a Christian, and cannot speak the language of Canaan. Another reason may be that you have not learned to pray in a manner that is adapted to you. It may be that you undertake to employ forms of speech which to you are unbefitting. You remember how David attempted to fight the battle with Goliath in Saul's armour, how he found it too large and too heavy for him, and how he went back and got his simple sling, with which he slew the giant. Many of you make a similar mistake in praying. You try to pray as the minister does, or as some elder or class-leader does, or as some fluent brother does, and you do not succeed. You try to walk in the prayer of another person who has had more experience than you have, and it rattles about you as Saul's armour did about David. It is a world too big for you. It does not fit you anywhere. I do not wonder that you do not want to pray under such circumstances. If, imitating David, who went back to the sling, the simplest of all weapons, you would be content to pray as a little child, if you would go back to lisping monosyllabic prayers, you would have less difficulty and would like prayer better.

If a man is in trouble, and he says, "Oh, help me!" that is a prayer. One single sentence is a prayer from a burdened heart. Even interjections are prayers. Sighing may be praying. If you are in distress, if you are tempted, if you have a special grief, if you are in any way carrying a yoke or a burden, just put your prayer on that spot; and do not try to make a good prayer, but be willing to make a poor one, as you consider it, and you will experience much more comfort in your devotions. Never mind how your prayer begins, or how it ends. Most of our prayers would be a great deal better if we were not so particular about the beginning and ending. Let your prayer be the upspringing and bursting forth of your real feelings. Prayer, at the beginning of the Christian life, and all the way through, is more or less interjectional. And such prayer is more apt to be sincere, and to strike at the centre of real want, and to be free from sham, than almost any other.

—Becker.

5. Be reverent.

(3798.) No man shakes his prince by the hand, or accosts him with an "Hail fellow, well met!" And if the laws and customs of nations will by no means endure such boldness to sovereign princes, for fear of debasing majesty, and so by degrees diminishing the commanding force of government, surely there ought to be more care used in managing our deportment toward God; since the impressions we have of things not seen by us are more easily worn off than those that are continually renewed upon the mind by a converse with visible objects. And that which will bring us into a contempt of our earthly prince whom we see, is much more likely to bring us into a light esteem of our heavenly King whom we have not seen. We are to use such words as may not only manifest, but also increase our reverence; we are (as I may so say) to keep our distance from God, in our very approaches to Him.

—South, 1633-1716.

(3799.) Still more offensive is a custom that some have of talking to the Lord in prayer. It is their natural voice, indeed, but it is that expression of it which they use upon the most familiar and trivial occasions. The human voice is capable of so many inflexions and variations, that it can adapt itself to the different sensations of our mind, as joy, sorrow, fear, desire, &c. If a man was pleading for his life, or expressing his thanks to the king for a pardon, common sense and decency would teach him a suitableness of manner; and any one who could not understand his language, might know, by the sound of his words, that he was not making a bargain, or telling a story. How much more, when we speak to the King of kings, should the consideration of His glory, and our own vileness, and of the important concerns we are engaged in before Him, impress us with an air of seriousness and reverence, and prevent us from speaking to Him as if He was altogether such an one as ourselves. The liberty to which we are called by the gospel, does not at all encourage such a pertness and familiarity as would be unbecoming to use towards a fellow-worm who was a little advanced above us in worldly dignity.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

6. Be simple.

(3800.) As prayer is not to be made, to be seen of men, neither is it meant to inform God. Very beautifully it is said, "He knoweth what we have need of before we ask." And hence long prayers, that tell God in most eloquent language what He is, and in very picturesque language what we are, seem altogether inappropriate, and in fact are mis-called prayer. True prayer is the deep expression of our deepest wants in the simplest and the tersest Saxon, and in the hearing of Him who knows all our deepest wants before we tell Him the uppermost of all. Of all things truly shocking, grandiloquent language in prayer is not the least so. Watch a person who loses his temper in the streets; when he speaks we hear no fine phrases, no beautifully rounded sentences; he takes the nearest, shortest, tersest words; and he makes them the vehicle of his deep feeling. Read the greatest of dramatists, and you will find the very same thing. Study our Lord's Prayer—how simple! "Our Father which art in heaven." Or, take the nearest to it, some parts of that magnificent composition, the English Liturgy—how beautiful its opening confession! all monosyllables, no fine language. "We—have—done—those—things—we—ought—not—to—have—done." How very simple, and yet how expressive of deep want, how appropriate as the vehicle of it! Would that such a model were universally followed; it is the nearest approximation to the beautiful and perfect model set by Him that spake, and prayed, and lived, and died, as man never did.

—Cumming.

7. Be thoughtful and deliberate.

(3801.) It was said of John Bradford that he had a peculiar art in prayer, and when asked his secret he said, "When I know what I want I always stop on that prayer until I feel that I have pleaded it with God, and until God and I have had dealings with each other upon it. I never go on to another petition till I have gone through the first." Alas! for some men who begin, "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name," and before they have realised the adoring thought—"hallowed be Thy name"—they have begun to repeat the next words, "Thy kingdom come;" then perhaps something strikes their mind, "Do I really wish His kingdom to come? If it were to come now, where should I be?" And while they are thinking of that, their voice is going on with, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven;" so they jumble up their prayers, and run the sentences together. Oh! stop at each one till you have really prayed it. Do not try to put two arrows on the string at once—they will both miss. He that would load his gun with two charges cannot expect to be successful. Discharge one shot first, and then load again. Plead once with God and prevail, and then plead again. Get the first mercy, and then go again for the second. Do not be satisfied with running the colours of your prayers into one another, till there is no picture to look at but just a huge daub, a smear of colours badly laid on. Look at the Lord's Prayer itself. What sharp, clear outlines there are in it. There are certain definite mercies, and they do not run into one another. There it stands; as you look at the whole it is a magnificent picture; not confusion, but beautiful order. Be it so with your prayers.

—Spurgeon.

8. Be specific.

(3802.) Life is made up of single particulars, both of doing and suffering, both of sin and duty; and the prayer which has respect to it must be not vague and general, but particular and even minute. The great enemy will assail me to-day, not in some grand sweeping charge, which every energy of my soul will be forewarned and forearmed to encounter—but in detail; in a multitude of light skirmishings and small ambushes, the very meaning of which will be often doubtful, and their result apparently indecisive. Yet is it in these things that the course of the life shapes itself, and the destiny of the life is at last determined. A succession of little defeatings makes up at last a rout and a ruin. If I wait to defend myself, till the Imperial Foe, in person and presence, places himself at the head of his guards and stakes all upon one last effort—the battle is decided before it is waged, and the soul which would not arm must pay the price in discomfiture. So then, prayer, which is the arming of the soul, must have respect to the items of the conflict even more than to the sum. A vague petition for grace—a general entreaty for God's strength and protection through the day that is dawning—a summary view of duty and temptation, and an indiscriminating invocation of the enabling and preserving Spirit—will not be found to have brought God (so to speak) into the very heart and body of the day's life: superficial prayer can look only for a superficial answer; and the intentions and resolutions of the slight asker are but as tow when it toucheth the fire, in face of the wily stratagems or fiery onslaughts of spiritual wickedness in high places. The Prayer which would affect Action must be minute and detailed as well as earnest.

—C. J. Vaughan.

9. Be importunate.

(3803.) How often have I seen a little child throw its arms around its father's neck, and win, by kisses, and importunities, and tears, what had been refused? Who has not yielded to importunity, even when a dumb animal looked up with suppliant eyes in our face for food? Is God less pitiful than we?

—Guthrie.

10. Be short.

(3804.) Pray often rather than very long at a time. It is hard to be very long in prayer, and not slacken in our affections. Those watches which are made to go longer than ordinary at one winding, do commonly lose towards the end. The flesh is weak, and if the spirits of the body tire, the soul that rideth on this beast must needs be cast behind. Our Saviour when He prayed for His life, we find Him praying rather often than long at once. He who in a long journey lights often to let his beast take breath, and then mounts upon him again, will get to his journey's end may be sooner than he that puts him beyond his strength. Especially observe this in social prayers, for when we pray in company, we must consider them that travail with us in the duty; as Jacob said, "I will lead on softly as the children are able to endure."

—Gurnall, 1617-1619.

(3805.) The third argument for brevity, or contractedness of speech in prayer, shall be taken from the very nature and condition of the person who prays, which makes it impossible for him to keep up the same fervour and attention in a long prayer that he may in a short. For as I first observed, that the mind of man cannot with the same force and vigour attend to several objects at the same time, so neither can it with the same force and earnestness exert itself upon one and the same object for any long time; great intension of mind spending the spirits too fast to continue its first freshness and agility long. For while the soul is a retainer to the elements, and a sojourner in the body, it must be content to submit its own quickness and spirituality to the dulness of its vehicle, and to comply with a pace of its inferior companion; just like a man shut up in a coach, who, while he is so, must be willing to go no faster than the motion of the coach will carry him. He who does all by the help of those subtle refined parts of matter, called spirits, must not think to preserve at the same pitch of acting while those principles of activity flag. No man begins and ends a long journey at the same pace.

But now, when prayer has lost its due fervour and attention (which indeed are the very vials of it), it is but the carcass of a prayer, and consequently must needs be loathsome and offensive to God; nay, though the greatest part of it should be enlivened and carried on with an actual attention, yet if that attention fails to enliven any one part of it, the whole is but a joining of the living and the dead together, for which conjunction the dead is not at all the better, but the living very much the worse. It is not length, nor copiousness of language that is devotion, any more than bulk and bigness is valour, or flesh the measure of the spirit. A short sentence may be oftentimes a large and a mighty prayer—devotion so managed being like water in a well, where you have fulness in a little compass, which surely is much nobler than the same carried out into many petit, creeping rivulets, with length and shallowness together. Let him who prays bestow all that strength, fervour, and attention upon shortness and significance, that would otherwise run out and lose itself in length and luxuriancy of speech to no purpose. Let not his tongue outstrip his heart, nor presume to carry a message to the throne of grace while that stays behind. Let him not think to support so hard and weighty a duty with a tried, languishing, and bejaded devotion; to avoid which, let a man contract his expression where he cannot enlarge his affection, still remembering that nothing can be more absurd in itself, nor more unacceptable to God, than for one engaged in the great work of prayer to hold on speaking after he has left off praying, and to keep the lips at work when the spirit can do no more.

—South, 1633-1716.

(3806.) Suppose a man should reason in the physiology of the body, as many persons reason in spiritual physiology. Suppose a man should attempt fidelity to his physical constitution in the same way that many attempt fidelity to their souls? Suppose a man should say to himself, "Life is the duty of the body, and eating is an indispensable condition of growth;" and should eat, and, having satisfied his hunger, should say, "I have eaten for nearly an hour, and I no longer crave food, but I feel it to be my duty to go on eating, that I may build up the body. I do not see how I can eat any more: and yet, it seems to me that it would be a delinquency to cease eating?" Stop one moment. What is eating, but a process of taking in materials for the building of the body? As far, therefore, as the body can use these materials, it is right to eat; but further than that it is not right. What is thinking? It is eating. Then, as long as you can think with good results, think, but no longer. What is prayer? It is soul-eating. As long as the food of prayer does you good, pray; but when it ceases to do you good, stop praying. It is no more a sin to stop praying under such circumstances than it is to stop eating when you cease to be hungry. But men seem to have a superstitious notion that they must keep their religious nature eating all the time.

—Becher.

(3807.) Some people attempt to bring down blessings by much praying. They go to the throne of grace, as it were, without any definite object in their mind. They pray without knowing exactly what they are praying for. This is not wise. In my own experience I have found that, when my thoughts have been withdrawn to other things, and being brought back to God, my mind is not eager to hold converse with Him, it is not well to plead with Him in measured prayers, as though I were bound to say so much to Him every day, and as though He would not be satisfied with anything less. My father and mother and friends never required me to talk with them a given amount. If I came where they were, and did not feel inclined to talk, they bore with my silence. And when we go to God, He will not blame us for talking only a little. So that, when I go to God, if I do not try to make long prayers, I make short ones. I do it, first, because I have not much to say, and it is not truthful to go on praying when you have nothing to say; and, secondly, because short prayers, under such circumstances, are positively more beneficial than long ones. —Becher.

(3808.) Short prayers are long enough. There were but three words in the petition which Peter gasped out (Matt. xiv. 30), but they were sufficient for his purpose. Not length, but strength, is desirable. A sense of need is a mighty teacher of brevity. If our prayers had less of the tail-feathers of pride and more wing, they would be all the better. Verbiage is to devotion as chaff to the wheat. Precious things lie in small compass, and all that is real prayer in many a long address might have been uttered in a petition as short as that of Peter. —Spurgeon.

(3809.) The worth of prayer is not gauged by its dimensions. Long supplications may be possibly formal and heartless. A mere cry, if prompted by earnest desire, is more to God than the most elaborate petition. Have you noticed the figure used in respect of prayer by St. John? He tells us in the book of the Revelation of "golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of saints." Mark the phrase. A vial is not a large vessel. Usually urns and pitchers are larger. But a vial made of gold is more precious than a brazen urn or an earthenware pitcher. In like manner, a brief but energetic prayer possesses higher worth in the sight of God than protracted but lukewarm ones. What quantity of electric fluid is requisite in order to send a telegraphic message from England to the United States? Very little: less than a silver thimblefull. Even so, a limited yet fervent entreaty will reach heaven and secure an answer. The Pharisee in the temple had plenty to say: words flowed apace: he stood and delivered quite an elaborate address. Meanwhile, all the poor Publican could do was to cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Albeit, we know which of the two "went down to his house justified rather than the other." —T. R. Stevenson.

11. Let it begin, continue, and end in humble dependence on the merits of Christ.

(3810.) We are to pray to God not only as a Father, but also evermore in the name, and through the merits, and relying on the intercession of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The name of Christ is not, as some seem to regard it, a musical close to a beautiful collect; nor, as others view it, the signal of the congregation that the prayer is done. That is not the meaning of praying in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ. It is no decent peroration; it is no accustomed finale to our prayer. His name is the very ground on which we kneel, it is the very right of our approach, it is the very channel through which we address God, and by which God can send down blessings upon us. —Cumming.

XIV. CHARACTERISTICS OF ACCEPTABLE PRAYER.

1. It is spontaneous.

(3811.) A little girl went out to play one day in the fresh new snow, and when she came in she said: "Mamma, I couldn't help praying when I was out at play." "What did you pray, my dear?" "I prayed the snow-prayer, mamma, that I learned once in Sunday-school: 'Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.'" What a beautiful prayer! And here is a sweet promise to go with it! "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." And what can wash them white—clean from every stain of sin? The Bible answers: "They have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." —Becher.

2. It is simple and sincere.

(3812.) As a father is more delighted with the imperfect talk of his own little child when it first begins to speak, than with the exactest eloquence of the most famous orator upon earth: so assuredly our Heavenly Father is infinitely better pleased with the broken, interrupted passages and periods of prayer in thee, an upright heart, heartily grieved that thou canst do no better, than with the excellently composed, fine-phrased, and most methodical petitions of the most learned pharisee. Nay, His soul extremely loathes the one, and graciously accepts the other in Jesus Christ. —Bolton, 1572-1631.

(3813.) Our prayers are our bills of exchange, and they are allowed in heaven, when they come from pious and humble hearts; but if we be broken in our religion, and bankrupts of grace, God will protest our bills; He will not be won with our prayers. —Adams, 1653.

(3814.) When thou prayest before others, observe on what thou bestowest thy chief care and zeal, whether in the externals or internals of prayer, that which is exposed to the eye and ear of men, or that which should be prepared for the eye and ear of God; the devout posture of thy body, or the inward devotion of thy soul; the pomp of thy words, or the power of thy faith; the agitation of thy bodily spirits in the vehemency of thy voice, or the fervency of thy spirit in heart-breaking affections. These inward workings of the soul in prayer, are the very soul of prayer, and all the care about the other without this, is like the trimming bestowed upon a dead body, that will not make the carcase sweet, nor these thy prayer to God's nostrils. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3815.) Prayer must be sincere. Sincerity is the silver thread which must run through the whole duties of religion. —Watson, 1696.

(3816.) "I can't make a very smooth prayer, but Jesus hears me," were among the dying words of a dear friend of mine.

Two or three days before his death some one was talking to him about prayer—the expression, “gifted in prayer,” being used. F—— looked up and said the words with which I have begun, “I can’t make a very smooth prayer, but Jesus hears me!” They are suggestive. The child, coming to his father for bread, asks in the simplest way, “My father, I am hungry; please feed me!” The blind beggar by the wayside went with no set petition to the Healer when the noise of tramping feet and the sound of many voices told him that Jesus of Nazareth was passing by. The publican said only, “God be merciful to me a sinner.” It is not the prayer of sonorous length, or of the most melodious phrase, that soonest reaches the throne; it is the heart-cry for peace and pardon that, sent up in faith, reaches the ear of Jesus.

3. It is joyful.

(3817.) Many prayers may be put up by persons in necessity without any spiritual delight in them: as infirm persons take more physic than those that are healthful, yet they delight not in that physic.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(3818.) There must be delight on our parts. Joy is the tuning the soul. The command to rejoice precedes the command to pray: “Rejoice evermore; pray without ceasing.” Delight makes the melody; prayer else will be but a harsh sound. God accepts the heart only when it is a gift given, not forced. Delight is the marrow of religion.

Dulness is not suitable to the great things we are chiefly to beg for. Gospel discoveries are “a feast.” Dulness becomes not such a solemnity. Manna must not be sought for with a dumpish heart. With joy we are to draw water out of the wells of salvation. Faith is the bucket, but joy and love are the hands that move it. They are the Huz and Aaron that hold up the hands of this Moses. God does not value that man’s service who accounts not his service a privilege and a pleasure.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

4. It is adoring.

(3819.) Not what is told a child profits him, but what the child tells the teacher. Not that which entereth into a man defiles or sanctifies, but that which cometh forth out of the heart. Hence, a department of prayer sometimes derided, and oftentimes neglected, namely, the contemplation of God Himself, ascriptions of praise, or statements as to His purposes. It is often said, as if the mere saying revealed the absurdity of it, men make theological statements to God, describe Him to Himself, and make polite speeches. Such an objector shows himself little versed in the spiritual necessities and laws of his own education.

The multiplication table is stated a thousand times to teachers, who knew it before ad nauseam. Yet, every statement is a profit to the children, who are to learn the facts stated.

Is a child upon its mother’s lap, stroking her hair, or patting her cheek, and saying, “Pretty mamma!” unprofited by that act of filial love? If, taught by some unwise teacher, he comes home loaded to the muzzle, and climbing up to the same resting-place, says, “Oh, most accomplished among women! Provider of all my necessities, and satisfier of my wants! My heart’s best affection

I lay at your feet!” I doubt whether child or parent would be profited.

If God deals with us as with children, let us deal with God as with a father. —T. K. Beecher.

5. It is thankful.

(3820.) “Let your requests be made known with thanksgiving.” As God hath an open hand to give, so He hath an open eye to see who comes to His door, and to discern between the thankful beggar and the unthankful.

—Gurnall, 1617–1679.

6. It is thoughtful.

(3821.) The speech of the mouth must not go before, but always follow after the conception of the mind. Many times as a musician’s fingers will run over a song which he has been used to play, although his mind is otherwise occupied; so many in prayer will run over that form of words they have been used to utter, though their minds are roving about other matters. Oh, let the absurdity of the fault breed in us a loathing of it!

—Ambrose, 1664.

(3822.) There is a story, how that one offered to give his horse to his fellow, upon condition he would but say the Lord’s Prayer, and think upon nothing but God. The proffer was accepted, and he began: “Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy name. But I must have the bridle too,” said he. “No, nor the horse neither,” said the other; “for thou hast lost both already.” And thus it is that too many in their both private and public addresses unto God by prayer are, by the suggestions of Satan, walking with St. Jerome in the galleries of Rome, having their hearts roving after pleasures of sin, their thoughts taken up with the things of this world, and their whole man set upon vanity; whereas they should rather mind that which they are about, keep close to God and be so watchful over their souls, that their hearts and tongues may go comfortably together; for the outward work only is but like the loathsome smoke of Sodom, whereas the inward devotion of the heart is not unfitly compared to the pleasant perfume of the sweetest frankincense.

—Spencer, 1658.

7. It is submissive.

(3823.) Many times Jesus and His people puff against one another in prayer. You bend your knee in prayer and say, “Father, I will that Thy saints be with me where I am;” Christ says, “Father, I will that they also whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am.” Thus the disciple is at cross-purposes with his Lord. The soul cannot be in both places; the beloved one cannot be with Christ and with you too. Now, which pleader shall win the day? If you had your choice, if the King should step from His throne, and say, “Here are two supplicants praying in opposition to one another; which shall be answered?” Oh, I am sure, though it were agony, you would start from your feet, and say, “Jesus, not my will, but Thine, be done.” You would give up your prayer for your loved one’s life, if you could realise the thought that Christ is praying in the opposite direction, “Father, I will that they also whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am.” Lord, Thou shalt have them. By faith we let them go.

—Spurgeon.

8. It is trustful.

(3824.) We have "boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus." It is the boldness of the little child that, unbanished by one's presence, climbs his father's knee, and throws his arms around his neck—or bursting into his room, breaks in on his busiest hours, to have a bleeding bound, or some childish tears kissed away, that says if any threaten to hurt him, "I will tell my father," and, however he might tremble to sleep alone, fears neither ghosts, nor man, nor darkness, nor devils, if he lies couched at his father's side. Such confidence, bold as it seems, springs from trust in a father's love; and pleases rather than offends us.

—Guthrie.

(3825.) Prayer is the expression of our wants to God, as our Father. Too many pray as criminals deprecating the wrath of a judge, instead of praying as children asking the blessing of our Father who is in heaven. When we draw near to God in prayer, we are not to feel as criminals in the dock, but as children around our Father's knee; and the saddest sinner laden with the greatest sin exhibits the truest grace when he draws near to God, and in the name of Jesus says, My Father! "If any man sin, we have an advocate with"—the judge? No. "If any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." Our creed begins, "I believe in God the Father." The first model prayer taught us is, "Our Father which art in heaven;" and the less of criminal deprecation, and the more filial confidence in our prayers, the more we exhibit the characteristic spirit of the gospel of Christ. But when all is deep and earnest deprecation of wrath, without one single expression of filial trust, such a litany or prayer sounds more like the wild wail of despair, than the hopeful cry of the still beloved, though long a prodigal son, seeking bread from his father's stores, and a shelter under his father's roof-tree. For what did the prodigal say, at his greatest distance from home, in the depth and bitterness of his worst estrangement? "I will arise and go to my father." That was the last lingering tie or link within him, and that thought thrilled, in blessed vibrations, through his soul, awakened in his lonely heart all the music of the blessed, and made him arise, and with delighted hopes go to his father, and seek—what he found there—a blessing, and bread, and a joyous welcome.

—Cumming.

(3826.) The pleading prayers of many Christians—the whole tone of them is that of a suppliant beggar. Many prayers have what is called "the holy tone." I call it the whining tone of mendicancy. A man speaks in a manly way to his fellow-men, to his companions; but the moment he comes to address God his manner is all changed, and he goes from the depths of doleful solemnity to the heights of deliquescent piety in a tone of abject pleading, pleading, pleading. I do not think God ever enjoys seeing an unmanly humility.

I have a hound on my place which I think well off except when he comes to me, and lies down on his back, and rolls over, and querls up his legs in most distressing humility and obsequiousness. I certainly do not like this in a dog; and if I had a child that came to me so, I would send him off with a different thought very quick.

Now do you suppose it is agreeable to the grandeur, the honour, the sensibility or the love of the All-Father, that men should come creeping up to His feet, and plead in such an abject state of mind as implies that He needs to be placated; that He needs to be coaxed, that He needs to be persuaded?

—Beecher.

9. It is believing.

(3827.) Prayer is the key of heaven, and faith is the hand that turns it.

—Watson, 1696.

(3828.) Prayer is the gun we shoot with, fervency is the fire that dischargeth it, and faith is the bullet which pierceth the throne of grace.

—Watson, 1696.

(3829.) Faith is to prayer as the feather is to the arrow; faith feathers the arrow of prayer, and makes it fly swifter, and pierce the throne of grace. Prayer that is faithless is fruitless.

—Watson, 1696.

(3830.) Some prayers are not heard because men do not believe that God will grant them. Were one writing a note to a friend, and saying, "I would be much the better for such a thing,"—naming it. "You can easily spare it; but I have little expectation that you will do me such a favour;" would this be a likely way to compass his object? Though he had wished to fail, could he have worded his application otherwise? And so, when a man kneels down and prays for pardon of his sins, or for the teaching of the Holy Spirit, or for assurance of salvation, but prays for them as if the Lord would grudge to give them, can he wonder that he is not heard? Whatsoever the Lord has promised, that He is willing to bestow, and, "whatsoever things we ask in prayer, believing that we have them, we receive them."

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

10. It is fervent.

(3831.) Pray fervently, or thou dost nothing. Cold prayer is no more prayer than painted fire is fire. The promise is only to fervent prayer. A still-born child is no heir, neither is a prayer that wants life heir to any promise. Fervency is to prayer what fire was to the spices in the censer, without this it cannot ascend as incense before God. Some have attempted a shorter cut to the Indies by the North, but were ever frozen up in their way; and so will all sluggish prayers be served.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3832.) Observe whether thy fervency in prayer be uniform; a false heart may seem very hot in praying against one sin, but he can skip over another, and either leave it out of his confession, or handles it very gently, as a partial witness, that would fain save the prisoner's life he comes against, will not speak all he knows, but minceth his evidence; thus doth the hypocrite deal with his darling lust. He is like one that mows grass with a gapped scythe, some he cuts down, and others he leaves standing; vehement against this, and favourable to that lust; whereas sincerity makes clear work as it goes. "Order my steps in Thy word, and let no iniquity have dominion over me."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3833.) Cold prayers bespeak a denial, but fervent prayers offer a sacred violence both to heaven and earth. As a body without a spirit, much wood without a fire, a bullet in a gun without powder; so are all prayers without fervency of spirit.

—Brooks, 1680.

(3834.) "Effectual fervent prayer prevails much." Cold prayers, like cold suitors, never speed. Prayer, without fervency, is like a sacrifice without fire. Fervency is to prayer as fire to the incense; it makes it ascend to heaven as a sweet perfume. Prayer without fervency is no prayer; it is speaking, not praying: lifeless prayer is no more prayer than the picture of a man is a man. Christ prayed with strong cries (Heb. v. 7) Clamor iste penetrat nubes (Luther.) Fervent prayer, like a petard set against heaven's gates, makes them fly open.

—Watson, 1696.

(3835.) The arrow which is shot from a loose cord drops powerless to the ground; but from the tightly drawn bow string it springs forward, soars upward, and reaches the object to which it is directed. So, it is not the loose utterance of attempted prayer that is effectual, but the strong earnestness of the heart sending its pointed petitions to heaven, that reaches the Divine ear and obtains the desired blessing.

—Brouden.

(3836.) When the spirit pleads at the throne of God, when guilt, flying from justice, is knocking loud and long at the door of mercy, one not in earnest himself may wonder at the language which earnestness ventures to employ. Why should they wonder? Her loyal subjects, standing at respectful distance, address their sovereign in respectful terms; using courtly language to a courtly ear. But let a royal cortege pass the procession that conducts a felon to the scaffold, as a drowning man who sees a plank float by grasps at life, he, bursting from his guards, springs to her side; clings to her robe, to cry, Oh, pardon, save me! and when to her order, Unhand me, let me pass—he answers, No; I will not let thee go—who so hardhearted as to beat the wretch away; or so blind as not to see that this is not insolence, but earnestness?

—Guthrie.

(3837.) Earnestness does not express itself in long, inflated, pompous sentences. It is brief; it is simple. The moment has arrived when victory, long doubtful as the tide of success ebbcd and flowed, may be won by one splendid, dashing, daring attack—the order is given in one brief word, Charge! On the distant waves a flag is seen now sinking in the trough and again rising on the crest of the foaming billows; and beneath that signal, clinging to the fragment of a vessel that lies many fathoms down in the depths of ocean, are two human forms—and all the cry that sounds from stem to stern is, A wreck, a wreck! and all the order, Lower the boat!—words hardly uttered when she drops on the water, and pulled by stout rowers, is leaping over the waves to the rescue. One late in the deserted streets sees the smoke creep, and the flames begin to flash and flicker from a house whose tenants are buried in sleep; he bounds to the door and thunders on it—all his cry, Fire, fire! Peter sinks amid the boisterous waves of Galilee, and all the prayer of lips the cold water kisses is, as he stretches out his hand to Jesus, Save me, I perish! And with the brief, urgent earnestness of one who seeing his danger knows that there is no time, and believing in God's great mercy, feels that there is no need for long prayers, the publican, like a man who in falling over a crag catches the arm of a friendly tree, throws his whole soul into this cry, these few, blessed, accepted words, "God be merciful to me, a sinner!"

—Guthrie.

(3838.) Prayer pulls the rope below and the great bell rings above in the ears of God. Some scarcely stir the bell, for they pray so languidly; others give but an occasional pluck at the rope; but he who wins with heaven is the man who grasps the rope boldly and pulls continuously, with all his might.

—Spurgeon.

11. It is persevering.

(3839.) I saw the other day a man attempting to split a rock with a sledge-hammer. Down came the sledge upon the stone as if it would crush it, but it merely rebounded, leaving the rock as sound as before. Again the ponderous hammer was swung, and again it came down, but with the same result. Nothing was accomplished. The rock was still without a crack. I might have asked (as so many are disposed to ask concerning prayer) what good could result from such a waste of time and strength. But that man had faith. He believed in the power of that sledge. He believed that repeated blows had a tendency to split that rock. And so he kept at it. Blow after blow came down all apparently in vain. But still he kept on without a thought of discouragement. He believed that a vigorously swung sledge "has great power." And at last came one more blow and the work was done.

That is the way in which we ought to use prayer. God has told us that "the earnest prayer of the righteous man has great power." We ought to believe it, just as that man believed that his sledge had power. And believing it, we ought to use prayer for the attainment of spiritual results with just such confidence of success as that man used his sledge. We may not secure our answer at once. That rock was not split at the first blow or the second. But that man believed that if he continued his blows, he was more likely to succeed every blow he struck. So we are to believe that there is a spiritual power in prayer, just as there was a physical power in that sledge. And that the more perseveringly and earnestly we use it, the more certain are we to accomplish something by it.

XV. PRE-REQUISITES TO ACCEPTABLE PRAYER.

1. Meditation.

(3840.) Before the tradesman goes to the fair, he looks over his shop, that he may know what commodity he most lacks. Thou goest to this duty to furnish thyself with the graces and mercies thou needest; is it not necessary, then, to see what thy present store is? what thy personal and what thy relational needs are? not forgetting the public, in whose peace and happiness thou art so much concerned; for if this ship sink, thou canst not be safe in thy private cabin. To leave all these to occur and overtake thee, without charging thy thoughts with them by previous meditation, is too high a presumption for a sober Christian to take up.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3841.) Meditation before prayer matures out conceptions and quickens our desires. Our heart is like a watch that is soon run down, and needs constant winding up. It is an instrument that is easily put out of tune. And meditation is like the tuning of an instrument, and setting it for the harmony of prayer. What is the reason that in prayer there is such an easy discurrency in our thoughts—that our thoughts are like dust in the wind, carried to and fro; but only for want of meditation? What is the reason that our desires, like an arrow shot from a weak bow, do not reach the mark, but only this, we do not meditate before prayer? He that would but consider, before he comes to pray to the pure majesty of God, the thing that he is to pray for, pardon of sin, and the life of glory, how would this cause his prayers to ascend like incense towards God! The great reason why our prayers are ineffectual is, because we do not meditate before them. David expresseth prayer by meditation: "Give ear to my words, O Lord; consider my meditation." —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3842.) The Spirit measures out His assistance to men in the use of the means proper for the effecting of any work, but suspends and denies that assistance where the use of those means is neglected; for He co-operates with men according to the established courses of working proper to their natures; and no man prays and preaches more by the Spirit than he that bestows time and study in the orderly disposing of what he is to say, and so employs and exerts those faculties of mind which the Spirit of God endowed him with, for the better and more exact management of those holy services that he stands engaged in. Were a man to petition his prince, or to plead at the bar for his life, I believe none could persuade him to venture the issue of so great an action upon his extempore gift. But admit that a man be never so well furnished with an ability of speaking suddenly and without premeditation, yet, certainly premeditation and care would improve and heighten that ability, and give it a greater force and lustre in all performances. And if so, we are to remember that God calls for our best and our utmost; we are to bring the fairest and the choicest of our flock for an offering, and not to sacrifice a lame, unconcocted, wandering discourse to God, when our time and our parts are able to furnish us with one much more accurate and exact. When a Roman gentleman invited Augustus Cæsar to supper, and provided him but a mean entertainment, Cæsar very properly took him up with an, "Friend, pray how come you and I to be so familiar?" Great persons think themselves entertained with respect when they are entertained with splendour; and they think wisely and rightly. In like manner, God will reject such sons of presumption and impertinence with disdain; and though they took no time for the making of their prayers, yet He will take time enough before He will grant them. —South, 1633-1716.

(3843.) To make prayer of any value, there should be definite objects for which to plead. We often ramble in our prayers after this, that, and the other, and we get nothing, because in each we do not really desire anything. We chatter about many subjects, but the soul does not concentrate itself upon any object. Do you not sometimes fall on your knees without thinking beforehand what you mean to ask God for? you do, as a matter of habit, without any motion of your heart. You are like a man who would go to a shop and not know what articles he would procure. He may, perhaps, make a happy purchase when he is there, but certainly it is not a wise plan to adopt. And so the Christian in prayer may afterwards attain to a real desire, and get his end; but how much better would he speed if, having prepared his soul by consideration and self-examination, he came to God for an object at which he was about to aim with a real request. Did we ask an audience at Her Majesty's court, we should not be expected to go into the presence of royalty, and then to think of some petition after we came there. Even so with the child of God. He would be able to answer the great question: "What is thy petition, and what is thy request, and it shall be done unto thee?" Imagine an archer shooting with his bow, and not knowing where the mark is! would he be likely to have success? Conceive a ship, on a voyage of discovery, putting to sea without the captain having any idea of what he was looking for! would you expect that he would come back heavily laden either with the discoveries of science or with treasures of gold? In everything else you have a plan. You do not go to work without knowing that there is something that you designed to make; how is it that you go to God without knowing what blessing you design to have. —Spurgeon.

2. Familiarity with the promises.

(3844.) Furnish thyself with arguments from the promises to enforce thy prayers, and make them prevalent with God. The promises are the ground of faith, and faith, when strengthened, will make thee fervent, and such fervency ever speeds and returns with victory out of the field of prayer. "The effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much." Words in prayer are but as powder, the promise is the bullet that doth the execution, faith the grace that chargeth the soul with it, and fervency that gives fire and dischargeth it into God's bosom with such a force, that the Almighty cannot deny its entrance, because, indeed, He will not. Now, as he is an imprudent soldier that leaves his bullets to be cast, or fitted to the bore of his pieces, till he comes into the field; so he is an unwise Christian that doth not provide and sort promises suitable to his condition and request, before he engageth in so solemn a service. Daniel first searched out the promise, what God had engaged Himself to do for His people, as also when the date of this promise expired; and when, by meditation and study upon it he had raised his heart to a firm belief thereof, then he sets upon God with a holy violence in prayer, and presseth Him close, not only as a merciful God, but righteous also, to remember them now the bond of His promise was coming out, "O Lord, according to all Thy righteousness, I beseech Thee, let Thine anger and Thy fury be turned away from Thy city Jerusalem," &c. (Dan. ix. 16). The mightier any is in the Word, the more mighty he will be in prayer. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3845.) The scope and spirit of our prayers should be limited by the promises of God. This is to make prayer a matter of serious premeditation. And, to keep it progressive with an understanding of the Scriptures, a knowledge of the purposes of God must precede it; and without that knowledge

It is an empty form, or rather a sinful liberty taken with the ear of God. As if you would go to a judge and ask him to favour your case, or to a friend and ask him to do you a wrong; or it is as if, having received intelligence from a distant correspondent, you should presume to write back to him upon the subject without being at the pains to peruse what he had said. It is most lamentable to hear very often how this necessary rule of prayer is broken through, and with what rude, unprepared language the ear of God is vexed.

—Irving, 1792-1834.

3. Penitence.

(3846.) Take heed of carrying purposes of going on in sin with thee to the throne of grace; this were a horrible wickedness indeed. As if a traitor should put on the livery which the prince's servants wear, for no other end but to gain more easy access to his person that he might stab him with a dagger he hath under that cloak. Is it not enough to sin, but wouldst thou make God accessory to His own dishonour also?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. Divine assistance.

(3847.) There must be life in the soul before there can be life in the duty. All the rugs in the upholsterer's shop will not fetch a dead man to warmth, nor any arguments, though taken from the most moving topics in the Scripture, will make thee pray fervently while thy soul lies in a dead state. Go first to Christ that thou mayest have life, and having life, then there is hope to chafe thee into some heat.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3848.) Implore the help of God's Spirit to fix our minds, and make them intent and serious in prayer. The ship without a pilot rather floats than sails; that our thoughts do not float up and down in prayer, we need the Blessed Spirit to be our pilot to steer us: only God's Spirit can bound the thoughts. A shaking hand may as well write a line steadily, as we can keep our hearts fixed in prayer without the Spirit of God.

—Watson, 1696.

(3849.) As the sails of a ship carry it into the harbour, so prayer carries us to the throne and bosom of God. But as the sails cannot of themselves speed the progress of a vessel unless filled with a favourable breeze, so the Holy Spirit must breathe upon our hearts, or our prayers will be motionless and lifeless.

—Toptady, 1740-1778.

XVI. PROPER SEQUENCES TO PRAYER.

1. Effort.

(3850.) Be vigorous in the use of all appointed means to mortify the lust thou prayest against. Resolutions in the time of prayer are good, when backed with strenuous endeavours, else but a blind for a false heart to cover itself with. Samson did not only pray he might be avenged on his enemies, but set his hands to the pillars of the house.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3851.) The Christian's prayer may miscarry, when with his prayer he joins not a diligent use of the means. We must not think to lie upon God, as some lazy people do on their rich kindred; to be always begging of Him, but not put forth our hand to work in the use of means. God hath appointed prayer as a help to our diligence, not as a cloak for our sloth. Idle beggars are welcome neither to God's door nor man's.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3852.) We must join our endeavour in the use of all means with our prayers, whether they be put up for spiritual or temporal blessings. * Lazy beggars are not to be relieved at our door. "This we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat." And certainly God will not bid them welcome to His door, whom He would have us deny at ours. We must pray with our hand at the pump, or the ship will sink in sight of our prayers. Is it temporal subsistence thou prayest for? pray and work, or pray and starve. Dost thou think to set God at work, while thou sittest with thy hand in thy bosom?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3853.) Let no man think that he has prayed heartily against sin, who does not use his utmost diligence to undermine and weaken his inclination to that sin. To water an ill plant every day, and to pray against the power of it, would be preposterous. St. Paul, we know, complained of "a body of death," and of "a thorn in the flesh," and he prayed heartily against it. But was that all? No, he also "kept under his body, and brought it into subjection," being well assured, that unless the soul keeps under the body, the body will quickly get above the soul. If you would destroy a well intrenched enemy, cut off his provisions; and if you starve him in his strongholds, you conquer him as effectually as if you beat him in the field.

—South, 1633-1716.

(3854.) In securing answers to our requests, we must co-operate with the Lord. Some people ask Him to do their work. "Father," said a little boy, after he had heard him pray fervently for the poor at family worship—"Father, I wish I had your corn-crib." "Why, my son?" "Because then I would answer your prayer." I have heard professing Christians pray for the conversion of their children, while they were taking them night after night into scenes of frolic and dissipation. We may make fools of ourselves, but the Almighty will never let us make a fool of Him. God is not mocked; whatsoever we sow we shall also reap. Neither does God ever mock us.

—Cuyler.

2. Self-examination.

(3855.) Do not only observe thy thoughts in duty, but call them to a review after duty. Many go from prayer too much like boys from school, that think no more of their lesson till they return again—leave praying, and all thoughts how they have behaved themselves in prayer together: for shame do not thus.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

3. Watchfulness.

(3856.) He that prays and watcheth not, is like him that sows a field with precious seed, but leaves the gate open for hogs to come and root it up; or him that takes great pains to get money, but no care to lay it up safely when he hath it.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3857.) When a man prays against any sin or temptation, and yet ventures upon those occasions which usually induce men to it, he must not expect to find any success in his prayers. For would any man in his wits, who dreaded a catching distemper, converse freely with such as had it? that is, would he fly from the disease, and yet run into the infection? In like manner, do not occasions of sin generally end in the commission of sin? And if they generally end in it, must they not naturally tend to it? And if so, can men think that God ever designed prayer as an engine to counterwork or control nature, to reverse its laws, and alter the course of the universe, by suspending the natural efficiency of things, in compliance with some men's senseless and irrational petitions?

None trifle with God and make a sport of sin so much as those whose way of living interferes with their prayers; who pray for such or such a virtue, and then put themselves under circumstances which render the practice of it next to impossible: who pray perhaps for the grace of sobriety, and then wait daily for an answer to that prayer at a merry-meeting or the tavern. But the spirit of prayer is a spirit of prudence, a spirit of caution and conduct, and never pursues the thing it prays for in a way contrary to the nature of the thing itself.

—South, 1633-1716.

XVII. HINDRANCES TO PRAYER.

1. Indulgence in sin.

(3858.) A man that is wounded may call upon the surgeon to have some ease of his pain, but if he will not endure to have the splinter or the arrow-head pulled out that sticketh fast in the flesh and causeth the grief, he may cry long enough, but all in vain; and if people should pray to God to stay the fury of the burning, when a house is on fire, and themselves in the meantime pour on oil or throw on fuel, there will be but small hope of quenching the same. So there can be no comfortable return of our prayers unto God till sin be removed; it is but folly to seek unto God by prayer till the partition wall of sin that is betwixt us and Him be broken down. It is sin that crosseth and hindereth the effect and fruit of prayer: like those heathens of whom the cynic made this observation, that they prayed indeed to their gods for health, but at the very same time, when they prayed, they used such excess as could not but greatly impair their health, and so wilfully deprived themselves of that they prayed for.

—Spencer, 1658.

2. Guilt on the conscience.

(3859.) Guilt on the conscience is one great hindrance to prayer. When sin is recent—when, like Adam skulking among the trees, the bitter sweet of the forbidden fruit is still present to his taste, and his newly-opened eyes are aghast at his own deformity—it is not natural for the self-condemned transgressor to draw near to God. And it is not till the Spirit of God directs his view to the unnoticed sacrifice, and encourages him to put on the robe of God's providing, that the abashed and trembling criminal can venture back into God's presence.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

3. Dimness of spiritual perception.

(3860.) When a man of taste or science climbs a mountain on a bright, transparent day, he rejoices in its goodly prospect or curious spoils; but his dog feels no interest in them. He sees the philosopher peering through his telescope, or exploring for the little plants that grow near the summit, or splintering the rocks and putting fragments in the bag; but it never occurs to the spaniel so much, as to marvel what his master is finding there. He sits yawning and panting on a sunny knoll, or snaps at the mountain-bee as it comes sailing past him, or chases the conies back into their holes, and scampers down, with noisy glee, as soon as the hungry sojourn is ended. The disparity between the philosopher and his irrational friend is hardly greater than it is between the believer and the worldling when you bring them together into the domain of faith. "The natural man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit of God;" and on the Pisgah of the same revelation, whence the believer describes a goodly land, and where he is making the most interesting discoveries, the other sees nothing to arrest his attention. The Word of God and its promises, the throne of grace and its privileges, the things of faith in all their varieties, have no existence to worldly men; and when constrained to bear others company in outward ordinances, they are thankful when the prayer concluded, or the sanctuary closing, sends them back to the world again. But just as the same lover of nature might ascend his favourite eminence on a subsequent day, and find all his godly prospects intercepted by a baffling mist, so dense that, except a pebble here and there, he can alight on none of its rare productions, and without any opening vista by which he can catch a glimpse of the fair regions around; so the believer may ascend the hill of God—he may open his Bible or enter his closet—and find, alas! that it is a foggy day, the beauteous panorama blotted out, and himself left to grope chilling in the cold and perplexing gloom. But like a gale of summer wind, upspringing and lifting all the fog from the mountain-top, the breath of the Omnipotent Spirit can scatter every cloud, and leave the soul on a pinnacle of widest survey, rejoicing in the purest light of God.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

4. Inordinate cares and affections.

(3861.) As the sea that the wind hath lain sore upon is yet tossed and troubled after the wind is laid and the tempest gone: even so a man's mind, lately come out of the business and cares of the world, still casteth and studieth the same things, and panteth after them, and cannot after this come straight to itself, and so meditate on and exercise in spiritual matters.

—Candray, 1609.

(3862.) Oh, 'tis hard to converse with the world all day, and shake it off at night, so as to be free to enjoy privacy with God. The world does by the Christian, as the little child by the mother; if it cannot keep the mother from going out, then it will cry after her to go with her; if the world cannot keep us from going to religious duties, then it will cry to be taken along with us, and much ado to part it and the affections.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3863.) The smoke and sparks that rise from a furnace are carried that way where the wind lies; so if thy heart be to the world thou canst not prevent thy thoughts and meditations from driving thither. Then, and not till then, will prayer ascend like a pillar of incense from the altar, when there is a holy calmness on thy spirit, and boisterous winds of inordinate cares and affections to the world are laid.

—Salter.

3. Wandering thoughts.

(3864.) Many vain intruders tease me most at such seasons as I most desire to be freed from them; they follow me into the pulpit, and meet me at the Lord's table. I hope I do not love them, or wish to lodge them! Often in my prayers some idle fancy buzzes about me, and makes me forget where I am, and what I am doing. I compare myself to a man upon his knees before the king, pleading for his life, or returning thanks for some great favour; in the midst of his speech he sees a butterfly; he immediately breaks off, leaves his speech unfinished, and runs away to catch the butterfly. Such a man would be thought mad; and my vile thoughts prove that I am not free from spiritual insanity.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(3865.) When I first amused myself with going out to sea, when the winds arose and the waves became a little rough, I found a difficulty to keep my legs on the deck, but I tumbled and tossed about like a porpoise on the water: at last I caught hold of a rope that was floating about, and then I was enabled to stand upright. So when in prayer a multitude of troublous thoughts invade your peace, or when the winds and waves of temptations arise, look out for the rope, lay hold of it, and stay yourself on the faithfulness of God in His covenant with His people and in His promises. Hold fast by that rope, and you shall stand.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

XVIII. IS TO BE CONTINUALLY MAINTAINED.1. Even when a devotional spirit is lacking.

(3866.) If your hearts be cold, prayer is a more likely means to warm them than the omission of it. To ask whether you may pray while your hearts are cold and backward, is to ask whether you may labour or come to the fire before you are warm. God's Spirit is more likely to help you in duty than in the neglect of it.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. Because continual prayer keeps us in the love of God.

(3867.) It is frequency of devotion also which maintaineth that friendship with God, which is the soul of piety. As familiar conversation (wherein men do express their minds and affections mutually) breedeth acquaintance, and cherisheth good-will of men to one another; but long forbearance thereof dissolveth or slackeneth the bonds of amity, breaking their intimacy, and cooling their kindness; so is it in respect to God; it is frequent converse with Him which begetteth a particular acquaintance with Him, a mindful regard of Him, a hearty liking to Him, a delightful taste of His goodness, and consequently a sincere and solid good-will toward Him; but intermission thereof produceth estrangement or enmity toward Him. If we seldom come at God, we shall little know Him, not much care for Him, scarce remember Him, rest insensible of His love and regardless of His favour; a coldness, a shyness, a distaste, an antipathy toward Him will by degrees creep upon us. Abstinence from His company and presence will cast us into conversations destructive or prejudicial to our friendship with Him; wherein soon we shall contract familiarity and friendship with His enemies (the world and the flesh), which are inconsistent with love to Him, which will dispose us to forget Him, or to dislike and loathe Him. —Barrow, 1630-1677.

3. Because continual prayer is necessary to our stability.

(3868.) Prayers are the bulwarks of piety and good conscience, the which ought to be placed so as to flank and relieve one another, together with the inter-jacent spaces of our life; that the enemy (the sin which doth so easily beset us) may not come in between, or at any time assault us, without a force sufficiently near to reach and repel him.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

(3869.) When you have given over the practice of stated prayer, you gradually become weaker without knowing it. Samson did not know he had lost his strength till the Philistines came upon him; you will think yourselves the men you used to be, till suddenly your adversary will come furiously upon you, and you will as suddenly fall.

—Newman.

4. Because it promotes our growth in grace.

(3870.) The Christian is compared to a tree (Ps. 1.). And those trees flourish most and bear sweetest fruit which stand most in the sun. The praying Christian stands nigh to God, and hath God nigh to him in all that he calls upon Him for. And therefore you may expect his fruit to be sweet and ripe, when another that stands as it were in the shade, and at a distance from God (through neglect of, or infrequency in this duty) will have little fruit found on his branches, and that but green and sour. "Those that be planted in the house of the Lord, shall flourish in the courts of our God: they shall bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing." —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3871.) In their steadfastness in prayer (Acts ii. 42), they set us an example that we should follow their steps. Who does not know that to grow the same fruit as others—crops as fine in quality and abundant in quantity,—we must apply the same culture to ground or tree? I have seen, for example, two plants growing under the glass of the same conservatory; and while the one showed a mass of flowers that dazzled the eye with their beauty, and filled the whole house with their perfume, the other, fruitless and flowerless, hung its drooping leaves, and seemed pining into death, under a deep decline. Both stood in the same soil; enjoyed an equal temperature; and had been taken from one common parent stem. Whence the difference? The cause of that was neither obscure nor remote—this had been often, but that, neglected, had been seldom watered. Now, what water is to thirsty plants, prayer is to the graces of a man or a church. Do we admire, wonder, and sometimes, indeed, stand astonished at the love which animated, and the fruitfulness which distinguished, these first Christians? The riddle is read, the mystery solved, in these words: "They continued steadfast in prayer." —Guthrie.

5. The fitness and importance of daily prayer.

(3872.) Do not any day, upon any pretence, omit to offer up thy morning and evening sacrifices. Remember, so often as thou neglectest morning prayer, so often thou art all the day naked, destitute of thy spiritual guard, and exposed to all manner of evils and enemies, and dost forespeak thyself an evil day; and so often as thou omittest evening prayer thou presumest upon sleep, and rest, and safety, without God's leave, and forespeakest thyself an evil night. What did Thomas lose by one omission! Jesus appeared the first day of the week to His disciples, "but Thomas," saith the text, "was not there." But what is the issue of this omission? Truly, by his neglecting this opportunity of confirming his faith, he falls into a desperate fit of unbelief. When the apostles told him that they had seen the Lord, he presently answers, "Except I shall see in His hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe." Ah, what had become of Thomas if Infinite Majesty had not stooped to recover him? —Swinmock, 1673.

(3873.) He that closeth his eyes at night without prayer, lies down before his bed is made. He is like a foolish captain in a garrison, who betakes himself to his rest, before he hath set the watch for the city's safeguard. God is His people's keeper: but can he expect to be kept by Him that chargeth not the Divine Providence with his keeping? The angels, at His command, pitch their tents about His saints' dwellings. But as the drum calls the watch together, so God looks that by humble prayer, we should beg of Him their ministry and attendance about us. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3874.) It is related of a hero in Scottish history, that, when an overwhelming force was in full pursuit, and all his followers were urging him to more rapid flight, he coolly dismounted, in order to repair a flaw in his horse's harness. Whilst busied with the broken buckle, the distant cloud swept down in nearer thunder, but just as the prancing hoofs and eager spears were ready to dash down on him, the flaw was mended, the clasp was fastened, the steed was mounted, and like a sweeping falcon, he vanished from their view. The broken buckle would have left him in the field an inglorious prisoner, the timely delay sent him in safety to his huzzinga comrades. There is in daily life the same luckiness precipitancy, and the same profitable delay. The man who, from his prayerless waking, bounces off into the business of the day, however good his talents and great his diligence, is only galloping on a steed harnessed with a broken buckle, and must not be astonished if, in his hottest haste, his most hazardous leap, he be left inglorious in the dust.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(3875.) It is as impossible for the soul to live and thrive without daily prayer, as for the body to live and thrive without daily food. Our graces are like plants that need daily watering; watches that need daily winding; lamps that need daily filling; bodies that need daily feeding. It is as necessary for the graces of the inner, as for the strength, and health, and life of the outward man that we should wait on God to say, "Give me day by day my daily bread."

—Guthrie.

(3876.) A good day begins with God. A wise merchant would no more think of going to business without communion with Christ, than of going to the store without coat, or hat, or shoes. I used to have a very poor watch, and I had to set it every morning in order that I might make from it a guess about the time of day. Our souls are poor time-pieces, utterly disordered; and every morning we need to set them by the Sun of Righteousness. Before we start off to the store we need to pray for patience. We will be harassed and perplexed. Men will wrong us, and impose upon us, and cheat us; and before the day is past, if you have not laid in a large supply of patience, you will half swear with your lips, and perhaps make a whole swear with your hearts.

—Talmage.

6. Because of the baseness of seeking God in adversity only.

(3877.) Pray in prosperity, that thou mayest speed when thou prayest in adversity; own God now, that He may acknowledge thee then. Shall that friend be welcome to us, that never gives us a visit, but when he comes to borrow? This is a right beggar's trick, but not a friend's part.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3878.) The shark is said to have been the god that the Sandwich Islanders, in their savage state, chiefly worshipped, or sought to propitiate. In their present semi-civilised, semi-Christianised condition, it is said, they pray, and sing, and moralise, in fair weather; but when they get into trouble they call upon the shark-god of their fathers for help or deliverance.

—A. P. Russell.

(3879.) There are others who pray only in emergency; who pray only in circumstances of great affliction or peril; who first become prayerful in sickness or sorrow; who learn the way of prayer when under persecutions; who, when they find that there is no more help to be received from men, fall back upon God. It is very sad that men should pray only on such rare occasions as these. It is very blessed that they should be willing to pray then; that is better than nothing; but ah! how poor is prayer where men are driven to it by the whip, and where they resort to it only when they feel the lash of trouble and affliction on their back. What would you think of a son that never went home to his father except when he was in debt, and had the sheriff at his heels, and wanted help; and that, the moment he obtained the relief which he sought, forgot that father again, and cared nothing for him? It is better to go to God in prayer when troubles assail us than not to go to Him at all, yet, if we only go to Him then, our prayer comes far short of that which we owe, as children, to our Heavenly Father.

—Beecher.

XIX. ENCOURAGEMENT FOR DESPONDING SUPPLIANTS.

(3880.) Suppose the dearest son of the most loving father to lie grievously sick, and out of the extremity of anguish to cry out and complain to him that he is so full of pain in every part that he knows not which way to turn himself, or what to do; and thereupon entreats him by the love he bears him to touch him tenderly, to lay him softly, to mollify all he may his painful misery, and give him ease. How ready, think you, would such a father be with all tenderness and care to give his helping hand in such a rueful case! But yet if he should grow sicker and weaker, so that he could not speak at all, but only look his father in the face with watery eyes, and moan himself unto him, with sighs and groans, and other dumb expressions of his increased pain and desire to speak, would not this strike yet deeper into the father's tender heart, pierce and melt with more feeling pangs of compassion, and make his bowels yearn within him with an addition of extraordinary solicitude to do him good? Even just so will thy Heavenly Father be affected and deal with thee, in hearing, helping, and showing mercy, when all thy strength of prayer is gone, but only groans and sighs. Nay, with incomparably more affectionateness: for, look how far God is higher than man in majesty and greatness, which is by an infinite distance and disproportion, so far does He pass him in tenderheartedness and love. (See Isa. lv. 8, 9.)

—Bolton, 1572-1631.

(3881.) Haply thou shalt never have an ability with a flow of words to express thyself as some others; but let not that discourage thee. God looks not at the pomp of words and variety of expressions, but sincerity and devotion of the heart. The key opens not the door because gilt, but because fitted to the wards of the lock: Let but the matter of thy prayer be according to God's mind, holy and warrantable, and the temper of thy heart humble and fervent, and no fear but thou shalt speed. Yes, let the prayer be old, pray to-day what thou didst yesterday, be but sure to bring new affections with thy old prayer, and thou shalt be friendly received into God's presence, though thou canst not on a sudden put thy requests into a new shape. God will not shut His child out of doors, because he comes not every day in a new-fashioned suit.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3882.) "I fear," saith the poor soul, "I am an hypocrite, because I have such a divided heart in the duties I perform. I cannot for my life enjoy any privacy with God in duty, but some base lust will be crowding into my thoughts when I am at prayer, hearing of the Word, or meditating; now I am lift up with a self-applauding thought, anon cast down to the earth with a worldly thought; what with one and another, little respite have I from such company."

Answer. Woe were it to the best of saints, if the mere rising and stirring of such thoughts as these (or worse than these) did prove the heart unsound. Take heed thou concludest not thy state therefore from the presence of these in thee, but from the comportment and behaviour of thy heart towards them. Answer, therefore, to these few interrogatories, and possibly thou mayest see thy sincerity through the mist these have raised in the soul.

First, what friendly welcome have such thoughts with thee, when they present themselves to thee in duty? Are these the guests thou hast expected, and trimmed thy room for? Didst go to duty to meet those friends, or do they unmannerly break in upon thee, and forcibly carry thee (as Christ foretold of Peter in another case) whither thou wouldst not? If so, why shouldst thou bring thy sincerity into dispute? Dost thou not know the devil is a bold intruder, and dares come where he knows there is none will bid him sit down, and that soul alone he can call his own house, where he finds rest? (Luke xii. 24.) Suppose in your family, as you are kneeling down to prayer, a company of roysters should stand under your window, and all the while you are praying, they would be roaring and hollowing, this could not but much disturb you; but would you, from the disturbance they make, fall to question your sincerity in the duty? Truly 'tis all one, whether the disturbance be in the room or in the bosom, so the soul likes the one no more than he doth the other.

Secondly, Dost thou sit contented with this company, or use all the means thou canst to get rid of them, as soon as may be? Sincerity cannot sit still to see such doings in the soul, but as a faithful servant, when thieves break into his master's house, though overpowered with their strength and multitude that he cannot with his own hands thrust them out of doors, yet he will send out secretly for help, and raise the town upon them; prayer is the sincere soul's messenger, it posts to heaven with full speed in this case, counting itself to be no other than in the belly of hell with Jonah, while it is yoked with such thoughts, and as glad when aid comes to rescue him out of their hands, as Lot was when Abraham recovered him from the kings that had carried him away prisoner.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

XX. ANSWERS TO PRAYER.

1. How numerous they are.

(3883.) Answered prayers cover the field of providential history as flowers cover Western prairies.

—Cuyler.

2. Every true prayer is certain to be answered.

(3884.) When the season has been cold and backward, when rains fell and prices rose, and farmers desponded and the poor despaired, I have heard old people, whose hopes, resting on God's promise, did not rise and fall with the barometer, nor shifting winds, say, We shall have harvest after all; and this you can safely say of the labours and fruits of prayer. The answer may be long in coming—years may elapse before the bread we have cast on the waters comes back; but if the vision tarry, wait for it! Why not? We know that some seeds spring as soon almost as they are committed to the ground; but others lie buried for months; nor, in some cases, is it till years elapse that they germinate and rise, to teach us that what is dormant is not dead. Such it may be with our prayers. Ere that immortal seed has sprung, the hand that planted it may be mouldering in the dust—the seal of death on the lips that prayed. But though you are not spared to reap the harvest, your prayers are not lost. They bide their time, God's "set time." For in one form or another, in this world or in the next, who sows in tears shall reap in joy. The God who puts His people's tears into His bottle will certainly never forget their prayers.

—Guthrie.

(3885.) I can stand in the rooms of my office in New York, and communicate with the men in the fifth story. If I want to speak to the foreman of the printing-office, I go and blow the whistle, and talk through the tube. And I know that the message has got up there, and that he heard it. I do not see him, and he does not answer me back; but I have no doubt that, having received the message, he will attend to my wants. I say, for instance, "Send me down the proof of such and such an article," and by and by he sends it down to me. So, it seems to me that sometimes we speak to God in heaven, as it were through an invisible medium. He does not answer immediately ; but, nevertheless, we know that He is there, and that even if we do not conceive of Him, He conceives of us ; and we send our thought or prayer up, and let it alone, and do not fret or worry about it.

—Becher.

(3886.) Answering does not always stand next door to petition. Prayers, however, are never forgotten when they go up before the faithful One. Why, long after we have forgotten them, God remembers them. For prayers are seeds, many of them ; and as air-plants root themselves up in trees, and then grow by reaching down toward the earth, so prayers, methinks, root themselves up in heaven, and then grow down toward us. They sometimes have a long growth before they reach us and blossom, but they do it sooner or later.

—Becher.

8. Should be diligently looked for.

(3887.) To pray and not watch what becomes of our prayer is a great folly, and no little sin ; like children that throw stones into a river, which they never look to see more. What is this but to take the name of God in vain, and play with an ordinance that is holy and sacred ? Yet thus, alas, do many knock at God's door (as idle children at ours), and then run away to the world (as they to their play) and think no more of their prayers.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3888.) If, when thou hast sent up thy prayer, thou canst cast off the care and thoughts of the business, as if praying were only like children scribbling over pieces of paper, which, when they have done, they lay aside and think no more of them ; if thou canst take denials at God's hands for such things as these, and blank no more than a cold suitor doth, when he hears not from her whom he never really loved,—if it breaks not thy rest, embitters not thy joy, a false heart set thee on work.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3889.) When thou hast been with God, expect good from God. "I will direct my prayer to Thee, and will look up." For want of this, many a prayer is lost. If you do not believe, why do you pray ? And if you believe, why do you not expect ? By praying you seem to depend on God ; by not expecting, you again renounce your confidence, and ravel out your prayer. What is this, but to take His name in vain, and to play bo-peep with God ? As if one that knocks at your door should, before you can come to open it to him, go away, and not stay to be spoken with. Oh Christians, stand to your prayer in a holy expectation of what you have begged, upon the credit of the promise, and you cannot miss of the ruin of your lusts.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3890.) People say "What a wonderful thing it is that God hears George Müller's prayers !" But is it not a sad thing that we should think it wonderful for God to hear prayer ? We are come to a pretty pass certainly when we think it wonderful that God is true ! Much better faith was that of a little boy in one of the schools at Edinburgh, who had attended the prayer meetings, and at last said to his teacher who conducted the prayer meeting, "Teacher, I wish my sister could be got to read the Bible ; she never reads it." "Why, Johnny, should your sister read the Bible ?" "Because if she should once read it, I am sure it would do her good, and she would be converted and be saved." "Do you think so, Johnny ?" "Yes, I do, sir, and I wish the next time there's a prayer meeting you would ask the people to pray for my sister, that she may begin to read the Bible." "Well, well, it shall be done, John." So the teacher gave out that a little boy was very anxious that prayers should be offered that his sister might begin to read the Bible. John was observed to get up and go out. The teacher thought it very unkind of the boy to disturb the people in a crowded room and go out like that, and so the next day when the lad came, he said, "John, I thought that was very rude of you to get up in the prayer meeting and go out. You ought not to have done it." "Oh ! sir," said the boy, "I did not mean to be rude, but I thought I should just like to go home and see my sister reading her Bible for the first time." That is how we ought to believe, and wait with expectation to see the answer to prayer. The girl was reading the Bible when the boy went home. God had been pleased to hear the prayer ; and if we could but trust God after that fashion we should often see similar things accomplished.

—Spurgeon.

(3891.) In a time of great drought in Scotland, Dr. Guthrie had in his Sabbath morning service prayed for rain. As they went to church in the afternoon, little Mary, his daughter, said : "Here is the umbrella, papa," "What do we need it for ?" he asked. "You prayed for rain this morning, and don't you expect God will send it ?" They carried the umbrella, and when they came home they were glad to take shelter under it from the drenching storm.

(3892.) A poor widow had four little children, the eldest about eight years old. One evening, in the midst of winter, her children were hungry, and she had no food to give them. But she kneeled down to tell God of their wants, and ask Him to supply them. At the close of her prayer, the eldest said to her : "Mother, doesn't the Bible say that God once sent some ravens with bread to a man who was hungry ? Don't you think God can send us some ravens with bread now, just as well as He did then ? I'm going to open the door, or they can't get in." A few minutes after, the village magistrate passed, and glancing through the open door said : "My good friend, how does it happen that your door is standing open this cold winter's night ?" "It is my little boy who opened the door a moment ago, in order, as he said, 'that the ravens might come in and bring us some bread.'" Now, it so happened that this gentleman was actually dressed in black from head to foot.

"Ah ! indeed," said he, laughing ; "Richard is right. The raven is come, and he is a pretty big one, too. Come with me, my little man, and I will show you where the bread is."

4. Should be perseveringly sought.

(3893.) When we pray, but receive no answer, and putting our ear to the door where we have been knocking, as if the house were untenanted, we catch no approaching footstep, nor sound, nor sign of any one being within, what are we to do ? To cease praying ? Cease praying ! By no means. No more than I would cease swimming for dear life when the cruel wave had plucked my hands from the rock, or, after my feet had touched the blessed sands, bore me back again and out to sea. I am to knock and listen; to stand and wait; and, importunate as the widow, take no rest and give God none, till the door is opened. Do this, for what His word teaches you is agreeable to His will, and if the answer does not come when you are living, you shall get it when you are dead. In prayers, or curses, men sow what afterward grows above their graves. It is eighteen hundred years since Jesus prayed, "I will that those whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am," and that prayer is answered in every chamber from which a dying saint takes his flight to glory. It is eighteen hundred years since they cried, "His blood be on us and on our children;" and God is answering that curse now in a people scattered, and peeled; a hissing; a byword; and a proverb in all the earth.

Let faith and hope hold up the arms of prayer, till, paralysed by death, they drop powerless at your side. Many a pious parent has wrestled with God for an ungodly son; nor got his answer till he had left the earth and been years in heaven. One day its door is thrown open. He looks round to see who comes in—there is his son! The father leaves his throne to rush into his arms; they embrace; and Jesus, seeing of the travail of His soul, and rejoicing in this trophy of His cross, hears in heaven that outburst of paternal joy, "My son that was dead is alive again, that was lost is found."

—Guthrie.

5. Are to be patiently waited for.

(3894.) Yea, but we have waited a long time. Well, but yet know that you are at the right door. Suppose a man to be knocking at a door, and he has knocked a great while and nobody comes, he begins to think it is not the right door, but somebody tells him that it is, and thereon he stays: so we may assure our hearts thus much, we are at the right door certainly, and let us not think to go away, we shall find somebody within, God will appear at length. What! shall we lose all for want of waiting a little while longer?

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

6. Are frequently delayed.

(3895.) He hath engaged to answer the prayers of His people, and "fulfil the desires of those that fear Him." But it proves a long voyage sometimes before the praying saint hath the return of his adventure. There comes oft a long and sharp winter between the sowing-time of prayer, and the reaping. He hears us indeed as soon as we pray, but we oft do not hear of Him so soon. Prayers are not long on their journey to heaven, but long a coming thence in a full answer. Christ at this day in heaven hath not a full answer to some of those prayers which He put up on earth: therefore He is said to expect till His enemies be made His footstool.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3896.) Learn to distinguish betwixt God's hearing and His answering the saint's prayer. Every faithful prayer is heard, and makes an acceptable report in God's ear as soon as it is shot; but God doth not always thus speedily answer it. The father at the reading of his son's letter (which comes haply on some begging errand) likes the motion, his heart closeth with it, and a grant is there passed; but takes his own time to send his despatch, and let his son know this. Princes have their books of remembrance, wherein they write the names of their favourites whom they intend to prefer, haply some years before their gracious purpose opens itself to them. Mordecai's name stood in Ahasuerus' book some while before his honour was conferred. Thus God records the name of His saints and their prayers. "The Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before Him, of them that feared the Lord and thought upon His name." But they hear not of God in His providential answer haply a long time after. Abraham prays for a child, and is heard, but how many years interpose before he hath him in his arms?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

7. Why God sometimes delays to answer prayer.

(3897.) When God is slow in giving He only sets off His own gifts to advantage. He does not withhold them. Blessings long desired are sweeter when they come; if soon given, they lose much of their value. God reserves for you that which He is slow to give you, that you may learn to entertain a supreme desire and longing after it.

—Augustine, 353-430.

(3898.) Prayers which are not answered at once, nor, perhaps, for a long time afterwards, may nevertheless be accepted. Were He to speak, Christ's reply to a mother, earnest and urgent for a son's conversion, might be such as He gave His own mother at the marriage at Cana, "Woman, Mine hour is not yet come!" Now, God's people are apt to forget this; and that it is with prayer, to borrow an illustration from commercial transactions, as with a bill, which, though accepted, is often not paid till months or years elapse. Our Heavenly Father knows best what to give; and also how, and where, and when to give. Were its answer always to follow prayer, as the peal roars upon the flash, I suspect that we would be as ready in spiritual as we are in earthly matters to look only to secondary causes, and forget God's hand—coming to look on our prayers as being the cause of the answer, as much as we are in the habit of regarding the flash of lightning, without any reference to God, as the cause of the peal of thunder.

—Guthrie.

8. Why some prayers are not answered.

(3899.) It is pure mercy that negatives a particular request. A miser would pray very earnestly for gold, if he believed prayer would gain it; whereas, if Christ had any favour to him, He would take his gold away. A child walks in the garden in spring, and sees cherries; he knows they are good fruit, and therefore asks for them. "No, my dear," says the father, "they are not yet ripe: stay till the season."

—Newton, 1725-1807.

9. Recorded answers to prayer.

(3900.) A poor Christian woman in Buckinghamshire—I believe near Berkhamstead—was bereaved of her husband after a long illness, and left unprovided for, the only thing of value being a large chest of tools. The husband had only just been buried, when a neighbour, bearing no good character, called on the widow, and presented a bill for work done altogether beyond the widow's power to pay. The work, which had been done in the husband's lifetime, was paid for by him, and the bill receipted, of which the widow had a distinct recollection. It availed not for her to assert the fact. The payment of the bill was pressed again, and longing eyes cast at the chest of tools. In great distress, the widow retired upstairs to pray, for all effort to find the receipted bill was vain. While engaged in prayer, a butterfly flew in at the open window downstairs. The widow's little child chased it until it flew behind the chest of tools. Just then the mother came in, and the child begged her to remove the box, that he might get the butterfly. The neighbour offered at once to do so; and while he was removing it from the wall, a piece of paper fell down behind, which the widow, taking up, found to be the lost bill, receipted as she had said. She was overcome with praise and gratitude to God, who had answered her prayer by means of the butterfly; and even her enemy himself discovered the missing bill.

(3901.) On the coast of Scotland, one stormy night, a woman came to the house of her pastor, and said to the minister: "Rise, and pray for my husband, for he is on the sea in a storm." The Christian wife and her pastor knelt down and prayed for the salvation of the sea-captain. Sure enough, at that very hour the vessel was tossed upon the angry seas. The ship plunged in the wave, and it seemed as if it would never come up again; but it righted, and came to the top of the wave. It plunged again, and for a long while the captain thought it would never rise; but it began to shake itself again from the wave, and again bounded the sea. The third time it went down, and all hands on board gave up the last hope. But again it mounted. As it came out of the foaming billows, the captain said to his crew: "Lads, surely there was some God's soul on the land praying for us to-night, or we would never have come up out of that."

—Talmage.

(3902.) My father was a man of prayer, and in our home the family altar was never permitted to fall down, nor its fires to expire or grow dim. Around that altar our dependence on God was constantly acknowledged, and the Divine blessing continually invoked. Nor was that blessing sought in vain, but mercies new and fresh, from day to day, were granted in answer to a father's prayers.

One bright morning in the spring of 1850, after commending us to the Divine protection, my father put two bushels of rye into his waggon and started for the grist-mill, a few miles distant from our home. When more than half-way there he had to cross a bridge, along the sides of which there were no railings, but only some logs laid upon the end of the planks.

When on the middle of this bridge the horse stopped and began to back. My father leaped from the waggon, and the horse continued backing till the hind wheels went over the logs and off the edge of the bridge, and the waggon seat and grain bag tumbled out and fell into the stream. At this moment the horse stopped, the forward wheels caught on the log, and the hinder part of the waggon hung over the edge of the bridge, being held by the horse and by the forward wheels.

Four or five men soon came to the rescue, the waggon was lifted back, the grist fished up from the water, and in half an hour my father was on his way back home to dry his grist and get it ready for grinding again.

There was a mystery about this whole transaction. We could not imagine what had made the horse back when upon the bridge. He showed no signs of fright, and had never acted so before. My father was troubled. He had earnestly prayed that morning that the angel of the Lord might encamp around about us that day, and now to be subjected to such an accident and so much inconvenience, was something of a trial to his faith, though it did not shake his confidence in God.

He returned home, and we went to work to dry our grain and prepare it for grinding; but when we spread out the rye upon a cloth in the sun to dry, we noticed, scattered all through it, fragments of a fine glittering substance, which, on examination proved to be glass! Thousands and thousands of little fragments and splinters of broken glass were mingled with those two bushels of rye—enough to have caused the death of all our family, and a hundred others, if the grain had been ground, and baked and eaten.

We were amazed at this revelation; and with what grateful hearts we knelt around the family altar and thanked God for His wonderful providence which had so strangely preserved our lives!

But how came the glass thus mingled with the grain? It was all explained very soon. The rye had been kept in an open barrel, and over this barrel our neighbours had smoothed axe-handles, using pieces of glass to scrape and polish them. These pieces of glass were thus broken and splintered, and the fragments dropped unnoticed into the grain, and were measured up and placed in the bag to be carried to the mill.

No one suspected the danger, and if that grist had been ground no human power could have averted the calamity, or saved our family from the terrible influence of a poison so deadly as powdered glass. God, in His providence, interposed and preserved our lives—truly it is but right that they should be consecrated to His service.

PROFESSION.

I. IS A DUTY ABSOLUTELY BINDING ON ALL BELIEVERS.

1. Because of their past relations to God.

(3903.) In the Bible God has made faith indispensable, and has attached an unspeakable importance to it. Two or three remarks will show why God has selected this, and has made its exercise the indispensable condition of salvation.

One is, that the true source of all evil to man is want of confidence in his Creator—a want of confidence in His promise, His law, His claims, His threatenings, His qualifications for universal empire. This want of confidence in God has produced the same evils in His administration which it does anywhere. A want of confidence between a husband and wife annihilates their happiness, and turns their once peaceful dwelling into a hell; a want of confidence between parent and children is the end of order and government; a want of confidence in a friend, a physician, a lawyer, or a pastor, is the parent of distress and woe; a want of confidence in a commercial community is an end of prosperity.

And so it is in the government of God. Man is wretched only because he has no confidence in his Creator. He does not worship Him as God; he does not believe that He is wise; he does not go to Him in trouble, he does not rely on His promises; he does not seek Him in time of distress; he does not trust Him in death. Now the only thing needful to make this a happy world, with all its sickness and sadness, is to restore confidence in God. This would meet all the evils of the apostasy, and would compose the agitated human bosom to peace—like oil on troubled waves. It will have just the effect under the divine government which it will have in a family, if you restore confidence to the alienated affections of husband and wife; and in a community, if you restore universal confidence between man and man.

Another reason why this is required is, that God could require no less of man. In a plan of salvation intended to be adapted to all the race, that was the lowest possible demand, as it is the simplest and most easy. Could God admit alienated creatures to Himself on any other condition than that they should have confidence in Him? Could He admit those to heaven—to dwell with Him, to range the fields of glory, to encompass His throne—who had no reliance in His qualifications for universal empire? Can you admit the man who has been your professed friend, but who has slandered and injured you, again to your friendship, without evidence of returning confidence and regard? Can a parent admit a rebellious and ungrateful child again to the fulness of his affection and to his family, if he has no evidence of returning confidence? God, therefore, requires faith in Him, because He could require no less. It is the lowest possible condition.

And for a similar reason, He requires that that faith should be avowed. "With the mouth confession is made unto salvation." The want of confidence has been open. The injury has been public. And wherever there is returning confidence, it should be avowed, and the restored sinner should be desirous that his return to God should be as widely known as his apostasy has been. When a man has calumniated you publicly, it will not do for him to come and confess it to you alone, and in the dark. He has done you public wrong, and the confession should be public too. The sinner should be willing, therefore, that all worlds shall be apprised of his return, and seek that throughout the universe it shall be proclaimed that he has confidence in the Creator. Thus he will not only believe in his heart on the Lord Jesus, but will confess Him with his mouth, and desire that the universe shall be acquainted with his repentance and return.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

2. Because of their present relations to God.

(3904.) It is not sufficient to carry religion in our hearts as fire is carried in flint-stones; but we are outwardly, visibly, apparently, to serve and honour the living God. —Hooker, 1553-1600.

(3905.) What doth God require by a free profession of His truth, more than a master doth of his servant, when he bids him take his livery, and follow him in the streets? Or when a prince calls his subjects into the field, to declare their loyalty, by owning his quarrel against an invading enemy?

And is it reasonable, what man requires of these, and only hard from God's hands?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3906.) "Religion," it is said, "is a secret principle of the soul. It shrinks back from the public gaze, and seeks concealment, and should not seek publicity." But why is this said? There is nothing of it in the Bible; but everything there is just the contrary. Hypocrisy, and mere profession, and ostentation, and sounding a trumpet, are rebuked. But I ask a man to point me to a single passage in the Bible where the manifestation of pure religion is rebuked. Religion, in the Bible, is supposed to be prominent and manifest, if it exists at all (Matt. v. 16; Luke ix. 26). It is to constitute the character; it is to distinguish the man. I point you to the example of Christ. Religion is everything in His life. I point you to the example of Paul. You see nothing else in his life but his religion. Among Greeks, and Jews, and Barbarians, it is alike developed. I point you to David, and Isaiah, and John, and the holy martyrs, and ask what were their principles? The men were modest men; but their religion was open and bold. It constituted their very character; and is that, and that alone, by which they are known. And thus it is in all the works and doings of God. Is the sun that rides these heavens ashamed to shine; and does he hide his noontide beams under the plea that pure light should not be ostentatious? Is the moon—that, like the Christian, shines by reflected light—ashamed to emit its rays, and to sleep on the bank and the silver lake? Are the stars—the wandering or the fixed—ashamed to send their rays on a darkened world? No. Light, pure, rich, varied, dazzling, shines forth from these heavens by day and by night, just as the light of the Christian's example is to be poured on the darkness of the world. It shines not indeed for display, but for use; not for its own glory, but like the light that should radiate from the Christian's life, to illustrate the glory of the great Creator. And thus it is in all God's works. The ocean that He has made is not ashamed to roll; the lightning of heaven to play; the oak to spread out its boughs; the flower to bloom. The humblest violet on which we tread is not ashamed to exhibit its beauty, and display its Maker's praise; nor will the obscurest light in the true Christian's soul seek to be hid. Light is kindled there to shine on the darkness of a lost world. And if Christian light does not shine forth in the life, we have the highest evidence that it has never been enkindled in the bosom.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

3. Because of their obligations to Christ.

(3907.) If people are loud in the praise of the physician who has cured them of some deadly malady—recommending others to trust and seek his skill, why should not Christ's people crown Him with equal honours, commend Him to a dying world, and proclaim what He has done for them? Let them say with David, "Come, all ye that fear the Lord, and I will declare what He hath done for my soul;" and tread in the steps of the Samaritan who threw away her pitcher, and running to the city, brought them all out—crying, "Come, see a man who hath told me all things that I have ever done."

It is a bad thing ostentatiously to parade religion; but it is a base thing for a Christian man to be ashamed of it : not to stand by his colours ; by his silence, if not his speech, to deny his Master ; to sneak away, like a coward, out of the fight.

—Guthrie.

4. Because of the needs of their fellow-men.

(3908.) Is it meet for him that hath found the way to heaven to hold his tongue, and let others quietly post to hell? Should a man that has narrowly escaped damnation himself, be silent when he seeth others go in the same way that he had liked to have perished in? Who will not call to another to take heed, that hath escaped a quicksand himself? or set up a bush, that those that follow may see the danger?

—Baxter, 1617-1679.

(3909.) Love to Jesus Christ is the soul of true religion. And without their becoming loud talkers, or making a parade of piety, it will lead those that feel its power to "exhort one another daily ;" to try to bring sinners to the Saviour ; and—as many who have overcome a false modesty are now doing—to seize all opportunities of dealing faithfully with other men about their souls. Why should not we tell others the way to heaven if we ourselves have found it? Why should not we warn a man who, unconscious of his danger, is approaching the brink of ruin? Why should not we snatch the poisoned chalice from a brother's lips? Why should not we reach a hand down to the drowning, and pluck him from the jaws of death, and set him beside us on the rock where there is room for both?

—Guthrie.

5. No personal considerations should be allowed to deter them from it.

(3910.) I think I heard a conversation in the leaves this morning, as I came to church. The buds that had lain all winter in their wrappings, as under roofs and blankets, were beginning to say to each other, "Is it not March? Is it not time for us to unfold ourselves, and expand our leaves in fragrance to the air?"

But one tiny bud answered, "I can never unfold to the sun and the air these dear little leaves, that have lain so long in my bosom. I could not bear such publicity. I must keep their fragrance still." And the sun and the wind laughed ; for they knew that when they should shine and blow upon the bud, and fill up and swell those tiny leaves it would open from the necessity of its nature, and that when they were swimming in a bath of solar light, they would give out their odour unconsciously to every breeze.

So many a heart says, "I could not bear to have my sweet buds of feeling exposed, through profession of Christianity, to the gaze of the world. I will keep them safely hid in my bosom, and be a Christian in secret." But when the winds of heaven blow upon them, and the sun of God's love shines, they will become vocal, and must needs give themselves expression.

—Becher.

(3911.) There are a great many persons that fain would become Christians if they thought they should hold out. Oh, dear fool ! do you suppose that Christ called you into His kingdom saying, "I will help you in ; but when you are once in you must take care of yourself?" Why, you are not going to be consistent Christians. I do not care who you are, you are going to sin as long as you live. It is not a question of whether you will be consistent or not. If any man comes to me, and says, "Now, I am willing to be called a Christian, for I think I am in a state in which I can live a perfectly Christian life," I say to him, "Go away. We do not want you. We have no arrangement for such folks." God sent us to conduct an institution and economy which has in view the healing of people. If there is anybody that needs healing we have the means with which to heal him. I am, we will suppose, a physician, that has charge of an hospital. Here comes one man who has been struck by a bullet, and whose breast is terribly lacerated. I say, "Pass him into ward No. 6," and away he goes. Here comes another man, bandaged and limping. His arm is broken, and he has received a severe wound in the leg. I give directions for him to be taken to ward No. 7. Presently there comes up a brisk, fine-looking fellow, who says, "I wish you would let me go in here." "What is the matter with you?" I ask. "Oh, nothing," he says ; "I am fit to go in : I am all right in every respect." "Then you cannot go in," I say : "this is not the place for people with whom there is nothing the matter. It is not a tavern ; it is an hospital."

—Becher.

II. HOW IT IS TO BE MADE.

1. Humbly.

(3912.) The language of a man entering the Church is not, "I have become so good, that I will now join myself to the members of Christ, and henceforth be a pattern to all who know me, and an honour to God." It is, "I have discovered my lost and wretched condition, and that I am too weak to stand alone. I have cast my soul upon Christ's mercy, and I beseech His children, if there is any strength or safety in the Church, to take me in and watch over and help me."

—Becher.

2. Seriously.

(3913.) Awful, indeed, are the responsibilities of making a high religious profession ; and he who by such a profession lifts himself above the crowd, resembles Nelson, when appearing with all his orders at Trafalgar ;—he is only too likely to make himself a mark for the fiery darts of the great enemy.

—Goulburn.

3. Resolutely.

(3914.) Suppose a geometrician should be drawing of lines and figures, and there should come in some silly, ignorant fellow, who, seeing him, should laugh at him, would the artist, think you, leave off his employment because of his derision? Surely no ; for he knows that he laughs at him out of his ignorance, as not knowing his art and the grounds thereof. Thus, let no man be ashamed of his godly profession, because wicked men speak evil of it ; and why do they so but because they understand it not, it is strange to them. They see the actions of godly men, but the rules and principles that they go by they know not ; and hence is it that they throw dirt in the face of religious profession, but a wise man will soon wipe it off again.

—Preston, 1587-1628.

(3915.) Begin with resolution ; forecast the worst, and prepare for it. Both hope for the most even, and prepare thyself for the most uneven. Some professors are but like those that go to sea upon pleasure : they purpose to sail no further than they see the way clear before them : if the sea begin to work, or they to be sick, back again with all haste to the shore. But the right Christian is bound for heaven, as the merchant is for his port : storms and tempests cannot affright them : on they go, through fair or foul, till they arrive at the desire of their own hearts. Resolve to continue, or never begin.

—Adams, 1653.

(3916.) We must keep up our savour in a corrupt age, as Noah did : "Noah was a just man and perfect in his generation, and Noah walked with God." Lot lived more upright in Sodom, where he was besieged with temptations, that made him constantly to stand upon his watch, than he did in the cave, where he neglected it, and so grew secure. As fire burns hottest in the coldest weather, so a Christian's zeal, by a holy antiperistasis, should flame most in a corrupted, debauched age.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(3917.) All have a desire to be happy, but few have courage and resolution to grapple with the difficulties that meet them in their way to happiness. All Israel came joyfully out of Egypt under Moses's conduct ; yea, and a mixed multitude with them ; but when their bellies were a little pinched with hunger, and their greedy desires of a present Canaan deferred ; yea, instead of peace and plenty, war and penury ; they (like white-livered soldiers) are ready to fly from their colours, and make a dishonourable retreat into Egypt. Thus the greatest part of those who profess the gospel, when they come to push of pike, to be tried what they will do, deny, endure for Christ, grow sick of their enterprise ; alas ! their hearts fail them. They like the waters of Bethlehem ; but if they must dispute their passage with so many enemies, they will even content themselves with their own cistern, and leave heaven to others that will venture more for it. Oh ! how many part with Christ at this cross-way ! like Orpah, that go a furlong or two with Christ, till He goes to take them off from their worldly hopes, and bids them prepare for hardship, and then they fairly kiss and leave Him ; loth indeed to lose heaven, but more loth to buy it at so dear a rate. Like some green heads, that childishly make choice of some sweet trade (such as is the confectioner's) from a liquorish tooth they have to the junkets it affords ; but meeting with sour sauce of labour and toil that goes with them, they give in, and are weary of their service : the sweet bait of religion hath drawn many to nibble at it, who are offended with the hard service it calls to. It requires another spirit than the world can give or receive, to follow Christ fully.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3918.) Run from thy work, and thou engagest God's strength against thee. He'll send some storm or other after thee to bring home His runaway servant. How oft hath the coward been killed in a ditch, or under some hedge, when the valiant soldier that stood his ground and kept his place, got off with safety and honour ? Art thou called to suffer ? Flinch not because thou art afraid thou shalt never be able to bear the cross ; God can lay it so even, thou shalt not feel it. Though thou shouldst find no succour till thou comest to the prison door, yea, till thou hast one foot on the ladder, or thy neck on the block, despair not. "In the Mount will the Lord be seen." And in that hour He can give thee such a look of His sweet face, as shall make the blood come in the ghastly face of a cruel death, and appear lovely in thy eye for His sake. He can give thee so much comfort in hand, as thou shalt acknowledge God is aforehand with thee, for all the shame and pain thou canst endure for Him. And if it should not amount to this, yet so much as will bear all thy charges thou canst be put to in the way, lies ready told in that promise (1 Cor. x. 13). Thou shalt have it at sight, and this may satisfy a Christian, especially if he considers, though he doth not carry so much of heaven's joy about him to heaven as others, yet he shall meet it as soon as he comes to his Father's house where it is "reserved" for him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3919.) Many like religion for a summer-house, when all is fair abroad in the world ; but when winter comes, the doors are shut up, and there is no one to be seen in or about it.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3920.) The light of religion ought not to be carried in a dark lantern, and to be shown only when thy own interest will permit, and at other times hid (Matt. x. 33).

I wish that I may confess Christ, whatever it may cost me, and though not thrust myself into danger, yet never betray my cause, or break through any command, to avoid the cruelest death. It is common with the hypocrite, as with the snail, to look what weather is abroad, and if that be stormy, to pull in his horns and hide his head. The hedgehog alters his hole according to the wind ; the swallow changes his nest according to the season. The flies will abound in a sun-hiny day, but if once it be cloudy, they vanish. When Christ rides to Jerusalem in triumph, many cry, "Hosanna !" who, when He is taken and tried for His life, cry, "Crucify ! crucify !" The upright soul is constant in His profession, and changes not his behaviour according to his companions. Oh, that I might never through shame or fear disown Him who has already acknowledged me !

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(3921.) I have no notion of a timid, disingenuous profession of Christ. Such preachers and professors are like a rat playing at hide-and-seek behind a wainscot, who puts his head through a hole to see if the coast is clear, and ventures out if nobody is in the way ; but slinks back again when danger appears. We cannot be honest to Christ except we are bold for Him. He is either worth all we can lose for Him, or He is worth nothing.

—Salter.

III. WHAT IS DEMANDED IN THOSE WHO MAKE IT.

1. Sincerity.

(3922.) A musician is commended non tam multum, sed tam bene (not that he played so long, but that he played so well). And thus it is not the days of our life, but the goodness of our life ; not the length of our prayers, but the fervency of our prayers ; not the measure of our profession, but the sincerity of our profession,—that is acceptable unto God Almighty.

—Shute, 1623.

(3923.) God does not regard the rind of the lips, but the root of the heart.

—Adams, 1653.

(3924.) He would be deemed a most vain man, that would boast that he had been at the East Indies, conquered a great part of the country, and brought away much treasure and rich commodities from thence, who had yet never crossed the seas, or set foot once on shipboard, or come near the seashore. And no less vain are they that would have them believe that they have made conquest of the spiritual Canaan, and possessed themselves with much of the treasure of it; when as they never yet once stirred out of the mystical Egypt, never so much as inquired the way to it, much less ever travelled towards it. He would be deemed most ridiculous, that would profess to have rare skill in the mathematics, or some other abstruse science, when he had never spent an hour in the study thereof. And no less ridiculous are they that will seem to have gotten much in this spiritual kingdom (if I may so term it) and yet never busied their brains about it, never studied the gospel of the kingdom, the only book out of which it may be learned. Yea, in this regard is this spiritual treasure rather like learning than wealth; in that worldly wealth and honours may be had without labour or study by the donation of others, or by succession and descent; this, not so; each one must seek it for himself, and must seek and labour in it himself, or else the seeking of others, and their endeavours for him, will stand him in little stead.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

2. Christian practice.

(1.) Without this we demonstrate that our profession is false.

(3925.) Like a beautiful flower, full of colour, but without scent, are the fine but fruitless words of him who does not act accordingly.

—Buddha.

(3926.) Like as they who have learned the art of sewing, of cordwainery, or drapery, and so forth, yet are not reputed tailors, cordwainers, or drapers, unless they do in act execute those sciences, which is indeed the purpose of their apprenticeship: even so let us never look to be true and sound Christians, or God's children, notwithstanding we have learned the Word of God and the manner thereof, unless we also perform the works of Christians and of the children of God.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(3927.) When we see the effigy or portraiture of any king stand still without motion, exquisitely graven in metal or painted out in lively colours, we know that, for all the eyes and mouth and nose that it hath, it hath no life in it. So, when we see professors of religion without the powerful practice of godliness, and supreme officers of state without the administration of justice, we can safely conclude, that the life of God is not in them; that they are not actuated by any divine principle within, but are mere idols and images of vanity.

—Leslie, 1627.

(3928.) Many there are that have nothing to prove themselves Christians, but a naked profession, of whom we may say as they do of the cinnamon tree, that the bark is more worth than all they have besides.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3929.) When we see that men's lives do nullify their professions, and that while they look towards God, they row towards the world; and while they hope for heaven, their daily travel is towards hell; and while they plead for Christ, they work against Him; our hopes of them are turned to necessary lamentation.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(3930.) Those persons who practise devotion . . . and who fail to do works of faith and charity, are like trees in blossom. You think there will be as much fruit as flower, but there is a great difference.

—Vianney.

(2.) Without this we bring dishonour upon religion.

(3931.) As at the bar truth is often wronged by an ill pleader, so religion is scandalised by an ill professor.

—Adams, 1653.

(3932.) An eminently holy man puts life into a whole community; on the contrary, a loose professor endangers the entire body. A scab on the wolf's back is not so infectious to the sheep, because they will not be drawn away by such company; but when it gets into the flock that read, hear, and pray together, then there is fear it will spread. And oh, how Christians hang down their heads upon the scandal of any of their company! as all the patriarchs were troubled when the cup was found in one of their sacks.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3.) Without this we nullify our testimony for Christ.

(3933.) When we urge one whom we have been persuading to go to the physician who has benefited us, he must see for himself that we have been benefited. Though he may not have known us as we were, he must see what we are. It will be vain for us to tell him of a cure and of returning health, if the wasted form, and the pale cheek, and the hollow eye, and the bloodless lip, tell a different and a contradictory story. Our feelings will not weigh against the evidence of his senses and our own truth-telling looks. He must see for himself the proofs of at least returning health—the evidences of recruited strength—the witness of repaired energy. And if he does all this to confirm the witness of our lips, it gives a weight to our words and a power to our persuasions which nothing else can give, and which, while it makes our recommendation of the physician of double weight, makes his fault also double, and doubles his responsibility if he refuses to accept it and believe our word.

So must the Christian's character harmonise with his profession, if he would have his testimony to the power of Christ weighty and influential. The man who is known to have been sick, and to have been to the physician, speaks of the power of the physician without saying a word, simply by being seen to be in health. He is a living, walking witness, and cannot but testify to all who see him. So is the recovered sinner—the Christian convalescent. When the lame man was healed, who held Peter and John as if he would not let them go, watched their prison, and followed them into court, his very presence, the very sight of him, was evidence that no one could impugn. The persecuting judges, "beholding the man that was healed, standing with them, could say nothing against it." There was the man. Every one knew what he once had been—every one saw what he now was; and though he said nothing, the very sight of him spoke loudly and powerfully. And every recovered Christian, by his life, ought to speak as loudly.

—Champneys.

(4.) Without this we turn our very profession into a means of evil.

(3934.) Friend, beware how thou behavest thyself in the world. The snow makes a fair show to the eye, but being melted it makes a dangerous flood. They who "make a fair show in the flesh," by walking offensively may cause such a deluge as may drown the souls of others.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(3935.) My pattern may with some be very prevalent. If I shine with a virtuous life, I am as a lighthouse set by the seaside, whereby mariners sail aright and avoid dangers, but if I pretend high and walk loosely, as a false lantern I shipwreck those that trust me.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(3936.) Oh, professors, look to your steps—the devil desires to make use of you for evil purposes! The sins of others, who make no profession of godliness, will never so fit his purpose for the blinding of men's eyes, as the least slip or falling of yours will do. It is the living bird that makes the best snare to draw others into the net. The grossest wickedness of profane sinners passes away in silence, but all the neighbourhood shall ring with your miscarriages. "A righteous man falling down before the wicked is as a troubled fountain and a corrupt spring" (Prov. xxv. 26). The scandalous falls of good men are like a bag of poison cast by Satan into the spring from whence the whole town is supplied with water. You little know what mischief you may do, and how many blind sinners may fall into hell by your occasion.

—Flavel, 1630-1691.

(3937.) You all know that there are businesses where it is not possible for a young man to be honest in the shop, where, if he spoke the downright truth, he would be discharged. Why is it, think you, that the system of ticketing goods in the window differently from what they are sold indoors, or exhibiting one thing and then giving another article, the system of telling white lies across the counter with the intention of getting a better price, is maintained? Why, it would not stand an hour if it were not for the professing Christians who practise it. They have not the moral courage to say once for all, "We will have nothing to do with these things." If they did, if the Church renounced these unholy customs, business would alter within the next twelve months. The props of felony, and the supports of roguery are these professing Christian men, who bend their backs to do as other men do; who, instead of stemming the torrent, give up, and swim along with it—the dead fish in our churches, that flow with the stream, unlike the living fish which always go against it, and swim upward to the river's source.

—Spurgeon.

IV. HOW ITS REALITY IS TO BE TESTED.

1. Negative tests.

(1.) Not by fluency of speech.

(3938.) Saul was not a saint because he did once prophesy, nor is every one a believer that talks of faith.

—Adams, 1653.

(3939.) Some professors are like the eagle whose prey is on earth, when she is towering in the skies. Such a generation there ever was and will be that mix with the saints of God, who pretend heaven, and have their outward garb faced and fringed, as it were, with heavenly speeches, while their hearts are lined with hypocrisy.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2.) Not by outward show.

(3940.) The profession of many is like the mountebank's trunk, which his host seeing fairly bound with a gaudy cover, and weighty in poise, had his trust deceived with the rubbish and stones within.

—Adams, 1653.

(3941.) As a corpse may be clad in rich clothes, so a dead soul may be handsomely dressed in a religious profession. And the son of a beggar clad in the garments of a king's son, may as well hope to be heir of his kingdom, as thou, by a mere profession, to inherit the glory of God.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3942.) As the most florid people do not always enjoy the firmest state of health, so the most showy professors are not always the holiest and most substantial believers.

—Toptady, 1740-1778.

(3.) Not by regularity of attendance at public worship.

(3943.) If profession would serve the turn, and flocking after sermons, heaven would soon be full; but as you love your souls, do not bolt or try yourselves by this coarse sieve. "Strive to enter the strait gate, for many shall seek to enter, and not be able."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4.) Not by the blossom, but by the fruit.

(3944.) It is with professors of religion, especially such as become so in a time of an outpouring of the Spirit of God, as it is with the blossoms of the spring; there are vast numbers of blossoms upon the trees, which all look fair and promising; but yet very many of them never come to anything. Many, in a little time, wither, drop off, and rot under the trees. Indeed, for a while, they look as beautiful and gay as others; and not only so, but smell sweet, and send forth a pleasant odour; so that we cannot certainly distinguish those blossoms which have in them that secret virtue which will afterwards appear in the fruit. We cannot tell which of them have the inward solidity and strength which shall enable them to bear, and cause them to be perfected by the hot summer sun that will dry up the others. It is the mature fruit which comes afterwards, and not the bountiful colours and smell of the blossoms, that we must judge by. So new converts, professedly so, in their talk about religious things, may appear fair, and be very savoury, and the saints may think they talk feelingly. They may relish their talk, and imagine they perceive a divine savour in it; and yet all may come to nothing. It is strange how hardly men are brought to be contented with the rules and directions Christ has given them, but they must needs go by other rules of their own inventing that seem to them wiser and better. I know of no directions or counsels which Christ ever delivered more plainly, than the rules He has given to guide us in our judging of others' sincerity; viz., that we should judge of the tree chiefly by the fruit.

—Edwards, 1637-1716.

2. Positive tests :—

(1.) Spiritual life.

(3945.) How like to a Christian a man may be and yet possess no vital godliness ! Walk through the British Museum, and you will see all the orders of animals standing in their various places, and exhibiting themselves with the utmost possible propriety. The rhinoceros demurely retains the position in which he was set at first, the eagle soars not through the window, the wolf howls not at night ; every creature, whether bird, beast, or fish, remains in the particular glass case allotted to it ; but we all know that these are not the creatures, but only the outward semblances of them. Yet in what do they differ ? Certainly in nothing which you could readily see, for the well-stuffed animal is precisely like what the living animal would have been ; and that eye of glass even appears to have more of brightness in it than the natural eye of the creature itself ; there is a secret inward something lacking, which, when it has once departed, you cannot restore. So in the churches of Christ, many professors are not living believers, but stuffed Christians. They possess all the externals of religion, and every outward morality that you could desire ; they behave with great propriety, they keep their places, and there is no outward difference between them and the true believer, except upon the vital point, the life which no power on earth can possibly confer. There is this essential distinction, spiritual life is absent. —Spurgeon.

(3946.) "Do you not admire us?" said the artificial flower under the glass shade, to the bright ray of sunshine which chanced just then to come into the room.

"I love whatever is true and beautiful," answered the sunshine ; "but you are not really what you seem ; you have colour without fragrance, and form without life ; and though you appear of the same family with the flowers of nature, which I love to look on and so often visit, you are but imitations of the true, and therefore only a show and sham, however beautiful you appear unto the eye."

Artificial piety of a very beautiful form may sometimes present itself to view, and of so perfect resemblance to the true grace of God as to deceive all mankind.

But profession without spiritual life cannot but be detected by God ; and, while passing by the beautiful representations which please and attract the natural mind, His eye observes and His love visits the sincere, saying : "To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at My word" (Isa. lvi. 2).

—Bowden.(2.) Love to God.

(3947.) Many a professor, who dwells where the full-orbed splendour of the Sun of Righteousness shines around him, and in a genial climate, yet more resembles a native of Iceland or Lapland. You would suppose that for more than half his time he was not permitted to see the sun. A moral winter appears to rest upon his soul. What is the state of their hearts towards God ? Are they not cold and barren as the winter season ? What fruits do we see adorning their profession ? Or rather it may be asked, are they not like so many bare and leafless branches of the snow-clad forest, through which the gusts of pride and passion sweep with relentless fury, and upon which the dews and showers of gospel grace produce but the cold icicles of vanity, sin, and death ? Are there not others whose profession is little better than a mantle of snow, beautiful and dazzling to the eye for a short time, but soon melting and vanishing into its native element ?

—Salter.(3.) Longings after holiness.

(3948.) Many men that make a profession are like kites, which ascend high, but look low. But those that look high as they ascend high are risen with Christ. For a Christian being once in the estate of grace, he forgets what is behind, and looks upon ascending higher and higher, till he be in his place of happiness. —Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4.) Real conflict with evil.

(3949.) As at Christ's rising there was an earthquake, so such as are risen with Him do find a commotion and division between the flesh and the spirit. —Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(3950.) As it is with the fighting of two fencers on the stage, you would think at first they were in earnest ; but, observing how wary they are where they hit one another, you may soon know they do not intend to kill one another, and that which puts all out of doubt, when the prize is done you shall see them merry together, sharing what they got from their deluded spectators, which was all they sought for. Thus you shall have a carnal man, a man in the state of unregeneracy, make a great bustle against sin, by complaining of it or praying against it, so that there seems to be a great scuffle betwixt Satan and such a soul ; but if you follow him off the stage of duty (where he has gained the reputation of a saint, the prize he sought for), you shall see the devil and him sit as friendly in a corner as ever.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3951.) If Job had let Satan carry away his good conscience, he would soon have unbound him, and let him have his estate and children again. It is not a form of religion, but its power, that the devil maligns. The profession of Judas, Satan knew, did not put him a step out of his way to hell. The devil can live very peaceably, as a quiet neighbour, by the door of such as will content themselves with an empty profession ; this alters not his property, nor touches his copyhold. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5.) Purity of heart.

(3952.) When the earth is broken up, and a filthy stench comes out, argues it not that there was some dead corpse there ? So when men rend out cursings, swearings, railings, and such like that a man should not be able to endure, from whence issue these, but from a dead and rotten soul ? These carry about them then the grave and sepulchre of the soul. Now, that which is said of the words may be applied to the works. As a man, therefore, coming to a tomb, though never so costly, and curiously, or so royally decked, yet if at some vent he apprehend a filthy savour issuing out of it, he knows well there is not only a dead, but a rotten carcass within ; so when a man feels a filthy and unwholesome scent, either of profane speech or of dissolute life, issuing from the heart, which is the fountain of both, he must needs conclude, neither is it against charity to censure it, that there is a soul not only dead and buried, but even rotten in sin and corruption.

Therefore let no man delude himself while he would deceive others, to bear men in hand that he is sound at heart, when he is unsound and corrupt in his life, as if a man might be persuaded that it is a vine or fig-tree which he sees hanging full of crabs and wildings. —Stock, 1568-1626.

(3953.) People who profess to believe the doctrines of the Gospel, and yet do not experience the power of those doctrines unto sanctification, resemble a man who looks over a hedge into a garden without going into it. —Toplady, 1740-1778.

(6.) Consistency of conduct.

(3954.) As the sails of a ship, when they are spread and swollen, and the way that the ship makes, shows me the wind, where it is, though the wind itself be an invisible thing, so thy actions to-morrow, and the life thou leadest all the year, will show me with what mind thou camest to the sacrament to-day, though only God, and not I, can see thy mind. —Donne, 1573-1631.

(3955.) His religion is in vain, whose profession brings not letters testimonial from a holy life. Sacrifice without obedience is sacrilegious.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3956.) Thou callest thyself Christian; but we question whether thou hast a right to the title; thy conduct is too contrary to that sacred name, which is too holy to be written on a rotten post.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(7.) Patience under provocation.

(3957.) Some professors pass for very meek, good-natured people, until you displease them. They resemble a pool or pond, which, while you let it alone, looks clear and limpid; but, if you put in a stick and stir the bottom, the rising sediment soon discovers the impurity that lurks beneath.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(8.) Steadfastness under persecution.

(3958.) Some fresh-water sailor, standing upon the shore in a fair day, and beholding the ship's top and top-gallant sail in all their bravery, riding safely at anchor, thinks it a brave thing to go to sea, and will by all means aboard; but being out a league or two from the harbour, and feeling by the rocking of the ship his stomach begin to work, and his soul even to abhor all manner of meat—or otherwise a storm to arise, the wind and the sea, as it were, conspiring the sinking of the vessel—forthwith repents his folly, and makes vows that if he but once be set ashore again he will bid an eternal farewell to all such voyages. And thus there be many faint-hearted Christians to be found amongst us, who, in calm days of peace, when religion is not overclouded by the times, will needs join themselves to the number of the people of God; they will be as earnest and as forward as the best, and who but they? yet, let but a tempest begin to appear and the sea to grow rougher than at the first entry, the times alter, troubles raised, many cross minds of opposition and gainsaying begin to blow, they are weary of their course, and will to shore again, resolving never to thrust themselves into any more adventures: they would have Christum, but not Christum crucifixum (Christ they would have by all means, but Christ crucified by no means). If the way to heaven be by the gates of hell, let who will they will not go that way; they rather sit down and be quiet. —Spencer, 1658.

(3959.) [On a glow-worm.] What a cold candle is lighted up, in the body of this sorry worm! There needs no other disproof of those that say there is no light at all without some heat. Yet sure, an outward heat helps on this cool light: never did I see any of these bright worms, but in the hot months of summer: in cold seasons, either they are not, or appear not; when the nights are both darkest, and longest, and most uncomfortable.

Thus do false-hearted Christians: in the warm and lightsome times of free and encouraged profession, none shine more than they: in hard and gloomy seasons of restraint and persecution, all their formal light is either lost or hid. Whereas true professors, either, like the sun, shine ever alike; or, like the stars, shine fairest in the frostiest nights. The light of this worm is for some show, but for no use: any light that is attended with heat can impart itself to others, though with the expense of that subject wherein it is; this doth neither waste itself, nor help others. I would rather never to have light, than not to have it always; I would rather not to have light, than not to communicate it.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3960.) Many men owe their religion not to grace, but to the favour of the times; 'tis in fashion, they may profess it at a cheap rate, because none contradict it. Indeed it shows they are extremely bad that are bad when they may be good without any loss to themselves, but it does not show they are good that are only good in good times. Dead fish swim with the stream. They do not build upon the rock, but set up a shed leaning to another man's house, which costs them nothing; carried with a multitude, are not able to go alone in a good way; if they be religious, it is for others' sakes. Then is integrity discovered, when persons dare be good in bad times, as Noah was said to be an upright man, because he was perfect in his generation.

—Manison, 1620-1667.

(9.) Diligence in well-doing.

(3961.) Our profession without practice is but hypocritical, making us to resemble the stony ground, which brought forth a green blade, but no fruit to due maturity; like the fig-tree, which, having leaves but no figs, was accursed; like the tree in the garden, which, cumbering the ground with its fruitless presence, was threatened to be cut down; like glowworms, which have some lustre but no heat,—seeing such professors shine with some light of knowledge, but without all warmth of Christian charity. Neither is that "pure religion and undefiled before God" which, like an empty barrel, makes a great sound in an outward profession, but that which exercises itself in duties of Christianity.

—Downham, 1642.

(3962.) As one said of a poor apothecary's shop, that he could find no drugs for the pots and boxes, so it may be said of those that pretend to religion, and no further, we cannot perceive good deeds for words. Or as when Jacob looked for Joseph, he found nothing but his coat; so, while we look for honest men, we see nothing but their cloak: only a cloak of a good nap, and a fair gloss of profession; that is all.

—Adams, 1653.

(3963.) It is no good sign in a tree, when all the sap goes up into the leaves, and is spent that way; nor in a Christian, when all his grace shoots up into words: a verbal goodness; no reality at all.

—Adams, 1653.

(3964.) When the Interpreter had done, he takes them out into his garden again, and led them to a tree, whose inside was all rotten and gone, and yet it grew and had leaves. Then said Mercy, "What means this?" "This tree," said he, "whose outside is fair, and whose inside is rotten, is it to which many may be compared that are in the garden of God; who with their mouths speak high in behalf of God, but in deed will do nothing for Him; whose leaves are fair, but their heart good for nothing, but to be tinder for the devil's tinder-box."

—Bunyan, 1628-1688.

(10.) Growth in grace.

(3965.) If we be true Christians, we must grow from strength to strength: herein grace is contrary to nature, strongest at last. We must change till then, but in melius, till we come to our best; and then, we must be like Him in whom is no shadow of turning.

But, where we should be like the sun till noon, ever rising, there be many like Hezekiah's sun, that go back many degrees in the dial; whose beginnings are like Nero's first five years, full of hope and peace; or, like the first month of a new servant; or, like unto the four ages, whose first was gold, the last iron; or, to Nebuchadnezzar's image, which had a precious head but base feet. Look to yourselves: this is a fearful sign, a fearful condition. Can he ever be rich that grows every day poorer? Can he ever reach the goal that goes every day a step back from it? Alas! then, how shall he ever reach the goal of glory that goes every day a step backward in grace? —Hall.

(11.) Perseverance.

(3966.) Men that have not depth of grace, they are like comets. They blaze for a time. But fixed stars are always in the firmament; they never vary. So a true Christian is as a fixed star—he is fixed in the firmament, in his desire. "One thing have I desired, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life."

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(3967.) Some dyes cannot bear the weather, but alter colour presently; but there are others that, having something that gives a deeper tincture, will hold. The graces of a true Christian hold out in all sorts of weathers, in winter and summer, prosperity and adversity, when superficial counterfeit holiness will give out.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(3968.) The leopard doth not run after his prey like other beasts, but pursues it by leaping; and if at three or four jumps he cannot seize it, for very indignation he gives over the chase. There be some, that if they cannot leap into heaven by a few good works, they will even let it alone; as if it were to be ascended by leaping, not by climbing. But they are more unwise, that having got up many rounds of Jacob's ladder, and finding difficulties in some of the uppermost; whether wrestling with assaults and troubles, or looking down upon their old allurements; even fairly descend with Demas, and allow others to take heaven.

—Adams, 1653.

(3969.) [On the sight of a gliding star.] How easily is our sight deceived! how easily doth our sight deceive us! We saw no difference betwixt this star and the rest; the light seemed alike, both while it stood and while it fell. Had it been a star, it had still and ever shined: now, the very fall argues it a false and elementary apparition.

Thus our charity doth and must mislead us in our spiritual judgments. If we see men exalted in their Christian profession, fixed in the upper region of the Church, shining with appearances of grace, we may not think them other than stars in this lower firmament; but, if they fall from their holy station, and embrace the present world, whether in judgment or practice renouncing the truth and power of godliness, now we may boldly say they had never any true light in them, and were no other than a glittering composition of pride and hypocrisy.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3970.) Constancy is a mark of the true Christian. The seeming graces of hypocrites may be as forward and impetuous for the time as the true graces of believers: as in the stony ground (Matt. xiii. 5, 6), the seed sprung up so much the sooner by how much it had the less depth of earth. But the very same cause that made it put up so soon, made it wither again as soon, even because it wanted deepness of earth. So the hypocrite, when the fit takes him, he is all on the spur; there is no way with him, but a new man he will become out of hand; yea, that he will: momento turbinis. But he sets on too violently to hold out long; this reformation ripens too fast to be right spiritual fruit. As an horse that is good at hand, but nought at length, so is the hypocrite; free and fiery for a spurt, but he jades and tires in a journey. But true grace is all to the contrary; as it ripens for the most part by leisure, so it ever lasts longer: as philosophers say of habits, that as they are gotten hardly, so they are not lost easily. The faith, repentance, reformation, obedience, joy, sorrow, zeal, and other the graces and affections of hypocrites have their first motion and issue from false and erroneous grounds, as shame, fear, hope, and such respects. And it thence comes to pass that, where these respects cease to give them motion, the graces themselves can no more stand than a house can stand when the foundation is taken from under it. The boy that goes to his book no longer than the master holds the rod over him; the master's back once turned, away goes the book, and he to play; and right so is it with the hypocrite. Take away the rod from Pharaoh, and he will be old Pharaoh still. Now, then, here is a wide difference between the hypocrite and the godly man: the one does all by fits and by starts, and by sudden motions and flashes; whereas the other goes on fairly and soberly in a settled, constant, regular course of humiliation and obedience.

—Sanderson, 1587-1662.

(3971.) It is not one or two good actions, but a good conversation, which will speak a man to be a right Christian. A true believer, like the heavenly oros, is constant and unwearied in his motion and actings. Enoch "walked with God;" it is out taking a step or two in a way which denominates a man a walker, but a continued motion. No man is judged healthy by a flushing colour in his face, but by a good complexion. God esteems none holy for a particular carriage, but for a general course. A sinner in some few acts may be very good: Judas repents, Cain sacrifices, the Scribes pray and fast; and yet all were very false. In the most deadly diseases, there may be some intermissions, and some good prognostics. A saint in some few acts may be very bad: Noah is drunk, David defiles his neighbour's wife, and Peter denies his best friend; yet these persons were Heaven's favourites. The best gold must have some grains of allowance. Sheep may fall into the mire, but swine love day and night to wallow in it. A Christian may stumble, nay, he may fall, but he gets up and walks on in the way of God's commandments; the bent of his heart is right, and the scope of his life is straight, and thence he is deemed sincere. —Swinnock, 1673.

(3972.) They are beautiful colours that are drawn on some professors, but, alas! not laid on oil, and so are soon washed off again. How forward soever they are to promise they shall reach heaven, they will find it too long a step for their short-winded souls. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3973.) Many are soon engaged in holy duties, easily persuaded to take up a profession of religion, and as easily persuaded to lay it down; like the new moon, which shines a little in the first part of the night, but is down before half the night be gone; lightsome professors in their youth, whose old age is wrapped up in thick darkness of sin and wickedness. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3974.) What congregation cannot show some that have outlived their profession? Not unlike the silk-worm, which, they say, after all her spinning, works herself out of her bottom, and becomes a common fly. As the disciples said of the literal temple, "See what manner of stones are here," so we once said of the spiritual temple; but now not one stone upon another. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3975.) Nay, sometime those motions in natural men under the Gospel may be more quick, and warm, and violent for a time than the natural motion of this habit; as the motion of a stone out of a sling is quicker than that of life, but faints by degrees, because it is from a force impressed, not implanted and inherent in the nature. They are just like water heated by the fire, which has a fit of warmth, and may heat other things; but though you should heat it a thousand times, the quality, not being natural, will vanish, and the water return to its former coldness. But the new heart being in the new creature causes him to walk in the statutes of God, not by fits and starts, but with an uniform and harmonical motion. —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3976.) "This is something like!" observed the Hearth to the Chimney, as the Thorns flamed and crackled in the spacious fire-place of the farm-house; whilst the steam gushed out from under the lid of the pot hanging over the fire, and the water boiled and spluttered, owing to the sudden increase of flame. "Beautiful, beautiful!" exclaimed the Hearth, in admiration.

"I'm of opinion this won't last long; it seems to me to be too rapid to continue. Depend on it, friend Hearth, 'twill soon go down and be burnt out," sagely remarked the old Chimney.

"Do you think so?—well, 'twill be a great pity not to last; I love to see briskness in a fire; and this is so exciting and charming! I don't see why it should so quickly end, as you suppose."

"Well, I've had some experience in these matters," answered the Chimney; "I've made my observations, and am too well acquainted with the nature of fuel to be deceived by it; and, however sanguine you may feel about it, take my honest word, it will not last!"

Still, however, the fire flamed, and the water boiled, and the steam spurted, and the hot splashes fizzed, leaped about, and dropt down upon the crackling flame.

"I am delighted!" said the Hearth.

"And I shall rejoice if it continues," said the Chimney.

"And why it should not, I am unable to judge," observed the other.

"We shan't need to wait long, however," continued the old Chimney; "don't you perceive it is already going down?"—and before the Hearth could reply there was a marked change; and ebullition ceased; the steam subsided; the flame flickered; the fire only occasionally leaped; and then, it went lower, and went quite down; and then quite out altogether.

"Well, to be sure!" said the disappointed Hearth.

"No other than I expected," remarked the Chimney; "and for this reason, there was nothing substantial in the material, only thorns you see, which commonly make a great flame for the time, but quickly burn themselves out."

"'Tis a great pity!" sighed the Hearth; "who would have thought it!"

"As the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool: this also is vanity," writes Solomon. And so it is with a profession of religion in some instances; it is flaming, and bright, and beautiful for a while, and calling special attention; but it does not last: it is not of a nature to be lasting, only "the form of godliness," without the "power thereof;" and like the seed cast on the rocky soil, which sprang up quickly, but soon withered away, because it had no deepness of earth, so without Divine grace in the heart profession cannot be enduring. There may appear to be much of excitement, fervency, and zeal for a while, but it will eventually cool down and expire; because, like the thorns under the pot, having no substance (Mark iv. 17). —Bowden.

PROSPERITY.

1. Is not necessarily a proof of the Divine favour.

(3977.) As men cherish young plants at first, and fence them about to keep them from hurt, but when they are grown, they remove them, and then leave them to the wind and weather, so God besets His children first with props of inward comforts, but afterwards exposes them to storms and winds, because they are better able to bear it. Therefore let no man think himself the better because he is free from troubles. It is because God sees him not fit to bear greater. —Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(3978.) When the Lord hath set thee up as high as Haman in the court of Ahasuerus, or promoted thee to ride with Joseph in the second chariot of Egypt; were thy stock of cattle exceeding Job's (Job i. 3); did thy wardrobe put down Solomon's, and thy cupboard of plate Belshazzar's, when the vessels of God's temple were the ornament,—yet all these are but the gifts of Wisdom's left hand, and the possessors may be under the malediction of God, and go down to damnation.

—Adams, 1653.

(3979.) The eagles and lions seek their meat from God. But though all the sons of Jacob have good cheer from Joseph, yet Benjamin's mess exceeds. Esau shall have the prosperity of the earth, but Jacob goes away with the blessing. Ishmael may have outward favours, but the inheritance belongs to Isaac.

—Adams, 1653.

(3980.) No man knows how the heart of God stands toward him by His hand. His hand of mercy may be toward a man when His heart may be against that man, as you see in the case of Saul and others. And the hand of God may be set against a man when the heart of God is dearly set upon him, as you may see in Job and Ephraim. No man knows either love or hatred by outward mercy or misery; for all things come alike to all, to the righteous and the unrighteous, to the good and to the bad, to the clean and to the unclean. The sun of prosperity shines as well upon brambles of the wilderness, as fruit-trees of the orchard; the snow and hail of adversity light upon the best garden, as well as upon the stinking dunghill or the wild waste. Ahab's and Josiah's ends concur in the very circumstances. Saul and Jonathan, though different in their natures, deserts, and deportments, yet in their deaths they were not divided. Health, wealth, honours, crosses, sicknesses, losses, are cast upon good men and bad men promiscuously. "The whole Turkish empire," says Luther, "is nothing else but a crust cast by heaven's great Housekeeper to His dogs." Moses dies in the wilderness as well as those that murmured. Nabal is rich as well as Abraham; Abithophel wise as well as Solomon, and Doeg is honoured as well as Saul, as well as Joseph and Pharaoh.

—Brooks, 1680.

3. Renders it difficult for us to assure ourselves that we have the friendship of men.

(3981.) Prosperity assures us not of the favour of men. Yea, rather it makes us utterly uncertain who are our friends, and who are not. For they who flourish in the world have many friends in show, and few in truth, seeing they are friends to their prosperity, and not to themselves; they honour their places, and not their persons. It is the idol of wealth which the crowd adores, and not the ass that bears it. It is the honey of profit which these hungry flies haunt, and not the pot that keeps it; which being clean washed, and the honey put into another vessel, they straightway leave that, and as easily follow this. It is not the man, but the money that is affected; and so long as they banquet, feast, and sport together, they make great love and friendship one to another; but let the bond of pleasure be once broken by want or sickness, and these friends are straightway scattered.

—Downham, 1644.

3. Is a test of character.

(3982.) It is in the relaxation of security, it is in the expansion of prosperity, it is in the hour of dilatation of the heart, and of its softening into festivity and pleasure, that the real character of men is discerned. If there is any good in them, it appears then or never. Even wolves and tigers, when gorged with their prey, are safe and gentle. It is at such times that noble minds give all the reins to their good nature. They indulge their genius even to intemperance, in kindness to the afflicted, in generosity to the conquered,—forbearing insults, forgiving injuries, overpaying benefits. Full of dignity themselves, they respect dignity in all, but they feel it sacred to the unhappy. But it is then, and basking in the sunshine of unmerited fortune, that low, sordid, ungenerous, and reptile souls swell with their hoarded poisons; it is then that they display their odious splendour, and shine out in the full lustre of their native villany and baseness.

—Burke, 1728-1797.

(3983.) Prosperity is a more refined and severe test of character than adversity, as one hour of summer sunshine produces greater corruption than the longest winter day.

—Eliza Cook.

4. Is not a thing to be desired by every man.

(3984.) Great skill is required to the governing of a plentiful and prosperous estate, so as it may be safe and comfortable to the owner, and beneficial to others. Every corporal may know how to order some few files; but to marshal many troops in a regiment, many regiments in a whole body of an army, requires the skill of an experienced general.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3985.) As for prosperity, every man thinks himself wise and able enough to know how to govern it, and himself in it. A happy estate, we imagine, will easily manage itself, without too much care. Give me but sea-room, saith the confident mariner; and let me alone, whatever tempest arise.

Surely the great Doctor of the Gentiles had never made this holy boast of his divine skill, "I know how to abound," if it had been so easy a matter as the world conceives it. Mere ignorance, and want of self-experience, is guilty of this error.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3986.) How many can form any estimate as to whether it is best for them to be prosperous or not?

If I should consult the wheat that is growing in the spring in the field as to what was best for it, the wheat would say, "Let me alone. Let the rain feed me. Let the winds gently strengthen me. Let me grow to my full height and size." But ah! the land on which that wheat is sown is over rich; and if the wheat grows to its full height and size, it will be so fat and heavy that it will break and fall down, and be lost. So the farmer turns in his cattle, and they browse the wheat. They eat it down to the ground. And by and by, later, when it is allowed to grow, it has been so weakened by this cruel pasturage that it will not become so rank as to break down, but will stand erect, and carry its heads up, and ripen its grain.

Many men will bear browsing. They get too fat, and cannot carry themselves upright and firm, and they break and fall down; and the best part of them lies in the dirt; and all that stands up is straw and stubble.

There is another field where the wheat, if I were to say to it, "What is the best for you?" perhaps, hearing my discourse on the other field, might say, from an amiable motive, "Let me alone." But ah! that happens to be a field where the soil is poor, and where it has been poorly tilled, and where, if the prayer of the wheat should be heeded, and it should be let alone, it would not have strength enough to grow, and would only have a starveling life, and would bear no harvest. So the farmer says, "Give it ample top-dressing. Bring in your guano." Here is a field that has need of strength to enable it to carry its crop on to ripeness and perfection. Here there is no danger of the crop growing rank, and falling down, and leaving nothing but straw.

And so it is with men. But who knows what is best for him? Some men can endure prosperity, and some cannot; but who can discriminate between them?

—Beecher.

5. Is not the same thing as happiness.

(3987.) We must distinguish between felicity and prosperity; for prosperity leads often to ambition, and ambition to disappointment.

—Lander.

(3988.) Show me the man made happy by worldly accumulation. Who are the men who have the most anxiety, and work the hardest? The millionaires. Men work harder after they get five hundred thousand dollars than before. They work less at a hundred thousand dollars; still less at fifty thousand; still less at forty; still less at thirty; still less at five thousand dollars; and least of all when they have a salary to live on. The men who have the greatest freedom from care are those who live on their day's wages. Prosperity is like salt water: the more you drink of it the thirstier you are.

—Talmage.

(3989.) A man is not prosperous because he makes money, because he is skillful, or because he has knowledge. That man who is happy; that man whose mind is like a well-chorded harp, and is responsive to enjoyment; that man who knows how to enjoy with his intellect, with his moral sentiments, with his taste; that man who knows how to reap joy from all his social affections; that man who knows how to stand strong without being debauched by his animal passions; that man who knows how to regulate his physical life; that man who has supreme use of himself all through; that man who is happy in the broadest way, and with the greatest number of fountains of enjoyment—that man is prosperous. On the other hand, a man may be a ripe scholar and a rich man, and not be prosperous. A man may be a millionaire, and yet be so miserable as to groan all day and curse all night. A man may have all the outside things which the world affords, and yet not be a happy man. One man may have a chest full of excellent tools, and be a bungling workman; while another man may have nothing but a jack-knife, and be a skillful workman. One man may have ever so many external means of enjoyment, and not be happy. You must not, therefore, argue that a man is prosperous because he has influence, or power, or money, or any of these things. If you want to know who are prosperous, find out who are happy.

You would think to look at that bell up in the belfry, "Oh, such a bell, lifted up so high—it only needs that some one should pull the rope to make it sound gloriously through the air!" Well, pull the rope; it sounds for all the world like a tin pan! It is cracked. I see men in the old belfry of prosperity; and other men are looking up at them and say, "Oh, how happy they must be!" You will find them to be good for nothing the moment you subject them to that test.

—Beecher.

6. How little it profits us.

(3990.) Let a man consider how little he is bettered by prosperity, as to those perfections which are chiefly valuable. All the wealth of both the Indies cannot add one cubit to the stature either of his body or his mind. It can neither better his health, advance his intellectuals, nor refine his morals. We see those languish and die who command the physick and physicians of a whole kingdom. And some are dunces in the midst of libraries, dull and sottish in the very bosom of Athens; and far from wisdom, though they lord it over the wise.

For does he, who was once both poor and ignorant, find his notions or his manners anything improved, because, perhaps, his friend or father died, and left him rich? Did his ignorance expire with the other's life? Or does he understand one proposition in philosophy, one mystery in his profession at all, the more for his keeping a bailiff or a steward? As great and as good a landlord as he is, may he not, for all this, have an empty room yet to let? and that such an one as is like to continue empty upon his hands (or rather head) for ever? If so, surely then none has cause to value himself upon that which is equally incident to the worst and weakest of men.

—South, 1633-1716.

7. Its insecurity.

(3991.) The same person sometimes affords an example of the greatest prosperity and of greater misery in the space of a few hours. Henry the Fourth of France, in the midst of the triumphs of peace, was by a blow from a sacrilegious hand dispatched in his coach, and his bloody corpse forsaken by his servants, exposed to the view of all; so that, as the historian observes, there was but a moment between the adorations and oblivion of that great prince. "All flesh is grass, and the glory of it as the flower of the grass." Whatever disguises its imperfections, and gives it lustre, is but superficial, like the colour and ornament of a flower, whose matter is only a little dust and water, and is as weak and fading.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

8. Exposes us to envy and hatred.

(3992.) Prosperity is an eye-sore to many. Such sheep as have most wool are soonest fleeced. The barren tree grows peaceably: no man meddles with the ash or willow; but the apple-tree and the damasin shall have many rude suitors. Oh, then, be contented to carry a lesser sail; he that hath less revenues hath less envy; such as bear the fairest frontispiece, and make the greatest show in the world, are the white for envy and malice to shoot at.

—Watson, 1696.

(3993.) How do riches and honour, wit and beauty, strength and learning, shine and glister in the eyes of most men! and no doubt, but as all of them are the gifts, so are they also the blessings of God to those who can make a wise and sanctified use of them. But such is our unhappiness in this vale of weakness and mortality, that, like Jonah's gourd, no sooner do these things shoot out and flourish about us, and we begin to delight and please ourselves under the shadow of them, but God quickly provides a worm, even that killing one of envy, to smite the root of them, and then presently they decline, wither, and die over our heads. Shadows do not more naturally attend shining bodies, than envy pursues worth and merit, always close at the very heels of them, and, like a sharp blighting east wind, still blasting and killing the noblest and most promising productions of virtue in their earliest bud, and, as Jacob did Esau, supplants them in their very birth. For what made Saul so implacably persecute David? Was it not the greatness of his valour and the glory of his actions, which drew after them the applause of the whole kingdom, and consequently the envy of the king himself? How comes history to tell us of so many assassinations of princes, downfalls of favourites, underminings and poisonings of great persons? Why, in all or most of these sad events, still only worth has been the crime, and envy the executioner. What drew the blood of Cæsar, banished Cicero, and put out the eyes of the brave and victorious Belisarius, but a merit too great for an emperor to reward, and for envy to endure? And what happiness, then, can there be in such things, as only make the owners of them fall a woful sacrifice to the base suspicions and cruelties of some wicked and ungrateful great ones; but always worse than they are or can be great? He, indeed, who is actually possessed of these glorious endowments, thinks them both his ornament and defence; and so does the man think the sword he wears, though the point of it may be sometimes turned upon his own breast; and it is not unheard of for a man to die by that very weapon which he reckoned he should defend and preserve his life by.

—South, 1633-1716.

9. Should cause us to be especially watchful.

(3994.) It is the bright day that brings forth the adder, and that craves wary walking.

—Shakespeare.

(3995.) The desire of prosperity is implanted in our bosoms by God, and is the great stimulus to diligence and to progress.

But we have need to guard against the abuse of it, just as the master of a vessel, when the ship has all her canvas set, and is going with full sails before the wind, has need to look out, especially in the night time, and take care that there be no collision, and that the ship does not run upon a sunken rock.

—Alexander Thomson.

(3996.) Too long a period of fair weather in the Italian valleys creates such a superabundance of dust that the traveller sighs for a shower. He is smothered, his clothes are white, his eyes smart, the grit even grates between his teeth and finds its way down his throat; welcome are the rain clouds, as they promise to abate the nuisance. Prosperity long continued breeds a plague of dust even more injurious, for it almost blinds the spirit and insinuates itself into the soul; a shower or two of grief proves a mighty blessing, for it deprives the things of earth of somewhat of their smothering power.

A Christian making money fast is just a man in a cloud of dust, it will fill his eyes if he be not careful. A Christian full of worldly care is in the same condition, and had need look to it lest he be choked with earth. Afflictions might almost be prayed for if we never had them, even as in long stretches of fair weather men beg for rain to lay the dust.

—Spurgeon.

10. Is spiritually perilous.

(1.) It enfeebleth the soul.

(3997.) Generally speaking, the sunshine of too much worldly favour weakens and relaxes our spiritual nerves; as weather, too intensely hot, relaxes those of the body. A degree of seasonable opposition, like a fine dry frost, strengthens and invigorates and braces up.

—Toptady, 1740-1778.

(2.) It draws off the soul from God.

(3998.) The sun will put out the fire; and so will the love of the world the love of the Father; they cannot stand together in intense degrees, one cannot serve both these masters with such affection as both would have. Seldom seest thou a man make haste to be rich, and thrive in religion. Christ's message to John holds true; the poor are most forward in receiving and following the Gospel. As thou lovest thy zeal, beware of resolving to be rich, lest gain prove thy godliness; take heed of ambitious aspiring, lest courts and great places prove ill airs for zeal, whither it is as easy to go zealous as to return wise. Peter, while he warmed his hands, cooled his heart. Not that greatness and zeal cannot agree, but for that our weakness many times severs them. If thou art willing to die poor in estate, thou mayest the more easily live in grace. Smyrna, the poorest of the seven candlesticks, has the richest price upon it.

—Ward, 1577-1639.

(3999.) It is sad when men grasp so much business that they can have no leisure for a communion with God in a corner. The noise is such in a mill as hinders a private intercourse between man and man; and so a multitude of worldly businesses make such a noise, as it hinders all private intercourse between God and the soul. If a man of much business should now and then slide into his closet, yet his head and his heart will be so filled and distracted with the thoughts of his employments, that God shall have little of him but his bodily presence, or, at most, but bodily exercise, which profits little (1 Tim. iv. 8).

—Brooks, 1608-1680.

(3.) It causes men to forget God.

(4000.) Prosperity most usually makes us proud, insolent, forgetful of God, and of all duties we owe unto Him. It chokes and extinguishes, or at least cools and abates, the heat and vigour of all virtue in us. And as the ivy, whilst it embraces the oak, sucks the sap from the root, and in time makes it rot and perish; so worldly prosperity kills us with kindness, whilst it sucks from us the sap of God's graces, and so makes our spiritual growth and strength to decay and languish. Neither do men ever almost suffer an eclipse of their virtues and good parts, but when they are in the full of worldly prosperity.

—Downham, 1644.

(4001.) Prosperity is no friend to a sanctified memory, and therefore we are cautioned, when we are full, lest we forget God. Noah, who had seen the whole world drowned in water, was no sooner safe on shore, and in the enjoyment of plenty, than he forgot God, and drowned himself in wine.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4.) It makes men forgetful of death.

(4002.) It is a hard thing for princes to remember death. They have no leisure to think of it, but drop into the earth before they be ware, like a man who walks over a field covered with snow, and sees not his way, but, when he thinks to run on, suddenly falls into a pit: even so they who have all things at will, and swim in pleasure, which like snow covers their way and dazzles their sight, while they think to live on, and rejoice still, suddenly rush upon death, and make shipwreck in the calm sea.

—Henry Smith, 1593.

(5.) It destroys watchfulness.

(4003.) Prosperity in the beginning of a great action many times undoes a man in the end. Happiness is the cause of mischief. The fair chance of a treacherous die at first flatters an improvident gamester with his own hand to throw away his wealth to another: for while we expect all things laughing upon us, like those we have passed, we remit our care, and perish by neglecting. When a rich crown has newly kissed the temples of a gladdened king, where he finds all things in a golden swim, and kneeling to him with auspicious reverence, he carelessly waves himself in the swelling plenty, lays his heart into pleasures, and forgets the future, till ruin seizes him before he can think of it. Felicity eats up circumspection: and when that guard is wanting, we lie spread to the shot of general danger. How many have lost the victory of a battle, with too much confidence in the good fortune which they found at the beginning! Surely it is not good to be happy too soon.

—Felltham, 1668.

(6.) It exposes us to temptation.

(4004.) Prosperity is a secret traitor, which hides baited under the vizard of friendship, and thereby makes us so reckless and secure, that instead of opposition we are ready to receive this serpent into our bosom: and when he encounters us with all his forces, so bewitched we are with the sight of this glorious enemy, that we clear all the passages, and set wide open the gates of our souls to give him entertainment; voluntarily offering ourselves to dig in his mines, and in a most slavish manner to row in his galleys, so as we may be assured to enjoy his company. He inflicts on us no grisly wounds, nor brings us to our end by a foul death; but as it were tickles us to death with inveighing pleasures, making us laugh when we are most tormented, and in a chariot of gold, strewed with roses, he swiftly carries us into hell.

—Downham, 1644.

(4005.) The things of the world are so many purveyors for Satan. When Pharaoh had let the people go, he heard after a while that they were entangled in the wilderness, and supposes that he shall therefore now overtake them and destroy them. This stirs him up to pursue them. Satan, finding those whom he has been cast out from entangled in the things of the world, by which he is sure to find an easy access unto them, is encouraged to attempt upon them afresh, as the spider to come down upon the strongest fly that is entangled in his web; for he comes by his temptations only to impel them unto that whereunto by their own lusts they are inclined, by adding poison to their lusts, and painting to the objects of them. And oftentimes by this advantage he gets so in upon the souls of men, that they are never well free of him more whilst they live. And as men's diversions increase from the world, so do their entanglements from Satan. When they have more to do in the world than they can well manage, they shall have more to do from Satan than they can well withstand. When men are made spiritually faint, Satan sets on them as Amalek did on the faint and weak of the people that came out of Egypt.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(4006.) Where one thousand are destroyed by the world's frowns, ten thousand are destroyed by the world's smiles. The world, siren-like, sings us and sinks us; it kisses us and betrays us, like Judas; it kisses us and smites us under the fifth rib, like Joab.

—Brooks, 1608-1680.

(4007.) Prosperity, like smooth Jacob, will supplant and betray; a great estate, without much vigilancy, will be a thief to rob us of heaven; such as are upon the pinnacle of honour, are in most danger of falling.

A lower estate is less hazardous: the little pinnacle rides safe by the shore, when the gallant ship advancing with its mast and top-sail is cast away. Adam in paradise was overcome, when Job on the dung-hill was a conqueror.

—Watson, 1696.

(7.) It fosters the passions.

(4008.) Who seeth not that prosperity increaseth iniquity? and where is more want, there is less wantonness. The Church, like the moon, gives ever the clearest light, when the sun seems to be in most opposition to it. Drones gather honey only from the hive; a true believer will gather it even from thistles.

—Adams, 1653.

(4009.) When the weather is fine, and undisturbed by showers, dust is easily raised, and falls plentifully. In like manner, it is when flesh and blood enjoy fair weather and sunshine, that sinful lusts are most apt to be excited, and drop most thickly in actual sins.

—Scriven, 1629-1693.

(4010.) Nothing shall more effectually betray the heart into a love of sin, and a loathing of holiness, than an ill-managed prosperity. It is like some meats, the more luscious, so much the more dangerous. Prosperity and ease upon an unsanctified, impure heart, is like the sunbeams upon a dunghill; it raises many filthy, noisome exhalations. The same soldiers, who, in hard service, and in the battle, are in perfect subjection to their leaders, in peace and luxury are apt to mutiny and rebel. That corrupt affection which has lain, as it were, dead and frozen in the midst of distracting businesses, or under adversity, when the sun of prosperity has shined upon it, then, like a snake, it presently recovers its former strength and venom. Vice must be caressed and smiled upon that it may thrive and sting. It is starved by poverty, it droops under the frowns of fortune, and pines away upon bread and water. But when the channels of plenty run high, and every appetite is piled with abundance and variety—so that satisfaction is but a mean word to express its enjoyment—then the inbred corruption of the heart shows itself pampered and insolent, too unruly for discipline and too big for correction.

—South, 1633-1716.

(8.) It promotes pride.

(4011.) Who almost is there whose heart does not swell with his bags? and whose thoughts do not follow the proportions of his condition? What difference has been seen in the same man poor and preferred? his mind, like a mushroom, has shot up in a night: his business is first to forget himself, and then his friends. When the sun shines, then the peacock displays his train.
—South, 1633-1716.

(4012.) When flowers are full of heaven-descended dews, they always hang their heads; but men hold theirs the higher the more they receive, getting proud as they get full.
—Becher.

(9.) It increases selfishness.

(4013.) It is one of the worst effects of prosperity to make a man a vortex instead of a fountain; so that, instead of throwing out, he learns only to draw in.
—Becher.

(10.) It unfits men for trial.

(4014.) Much prosperity utterly unfits such persons for the sharp trials of adversity; which yet God uses as the most proper means to correct a soul grown vain and extravagant by a long, uninterrupted felicity. But an unsanctified, unregenerate person, passing into so great an alteration of estate, is like a man in a sweat entering into a river, or throwing himself into the snow; he is presently struck to the heart; he languishes, and meets with certain death in the change.
—South, 1633-1716.

PROVIDENCE.

I. IS ALL-EMBRACING.

1. It regards the acts and governs the course of every individual.

(4015.) If thou be not a senseless atheist, but knowest that God is everywhere, how is it possible thou shouldst doubt of His care or observance, or particular providence about everything? No child is scarce so foolish that will think his father cares not what he saith or doth, when he stands before him. Wouldst thou doubt of God's particular providence, whether He regards thy heart, and talk, and practice, if thou didst see Him with thee? Sure it is scarce possible. Why then dost thou question it when thou knowest that He is with thee?
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4016.) Oh, blind atheists! you see the sun before your eyes, which enlighteneth all the upper part of the earth at once; even millions of millions see all by his light; and yet, do you doubt whether God beholds, and regards, and provides for all at once! Tell me, if God had never a creature to look to in all the world but thee, wouldst thou believe that He would regard thy heart, and words, and ways, or not? If He would, why not now as well as then! Is He not as sufficient for thee, and as really present with thee, as if He had no other creature else? If all men in the world were dead save one, would the sun any more illuminate that one than now it doth? Mayest thou not see as well by the light of it now, as if it had never another to enlighten? And dost thou see a creature do so much, and wilt thou not believe as much of the Creator? If thou think us worms too low for God so exactly to observe, thou mayest as well think that we are too low for Him to create, or preserve; and then who made us, and preserveth us? Doth not the sun enlighten the smallest bird, and crawling vermin, as well as the greatest prince on earth? Doth it withhold its light from any creature that can see, and say, "I will not shine on things so base"? And wilt thou more restrain the Infinite God who is the Maker, Light, and Life of all? It is He that "fillet all in all." "The heaven of heavens cannot contain Him;" and is He absent from thee?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4017.) Socrates, the son of Sophroniscus, one of the sages of Greece, who in the night of paganism longed for light, spoke one day as he sat among his disciples of the over-ruling providence of the Deity, which being omnipresent, did hear and see everything, taking care of all creatures; and that we should always feel and recognise this more, the more we honoured and revered the Supreme Being.

In the emotion of his heart, the wise man alluded to a parable from the poems of the incomparable Homer, likening Divine Providence to a mother, who, with gentle and unseen hand, fans the flies from her sleeping child.

Among his disciples was Critias, the traitor, who afterwards condemned him to death. He laughed at the comparison, for he thought it ignoble and common. Therefore he laughed and mocked at it in his heart. However, Socrates observed it, and understood his thoughts. He turned to him, and said: "Dost thou not feel, my dear Critias, how nearly allied the human in its simplicity is to the divine, and how the former must raise us to the latter?" Thus he spoke. Critias departed with an angry heart; but Socrates continued to instruct the other disciples.

When Socrates was sentenced to death by the malice of Critias and condemned to drink the poisoned cup, the tyrant remembered the words and the parable of the sage, and he came to him, and said deridingly: "Well, Socrates, will the gods even now protect thee from the flies?" But Socrates smiled, and said: "The gods, Critias, now lead me to rest after my day's work is done. How could I still think of the flies!"
—F. A. Krummacker.

(4018.) A violet shed its modest beauties at the turfy foot of an old oak. It lived there many days during the kind summer in obscurity. The winds and the rains came and fell, but they did not hurt the violet. Storms often crashed among the boughs of the oak. And one day, said the oak, "Are you not ashamed of yourself when you look up at me, you little thing down there, when you see how large I am, and how small you are; when you see how small a space you fill, and how widely my branches are spread?" "No," said the violet, "we are both what God made us, and we are where God has placed us, and God has given us both something. He has given to you strength, to me sweetness; and I offer Him back my fragrance, and I am thankful." "Sweetness is all nonsense," said the oak; "a few days, a month at most—where and what will you be? you'll die, and the place of your grave won't lift the ground higher by a blade of grass. I hope to stand sometime—ages perhaps—and then when I am cut down, I shall be a ship to bear men over the sea, or a coffin to hold the dust of a prince. What is your lot to mine?" "But," cheerfully breathed the violet back, "we are both what God made us, and we are both where He placed us. I suppose I shall die soon. I hope to die fragrantly, as I have lived fragrantly. You must be cut down at last; it does not matter that I see, a few days, or a few ages, my littleness or your largeness, it comes to the same thing at last. We are what God made us. We are where God placed us. God gave you strength; God gave me sweetness." What a common mistake—what a vulgar prejudice that is—that God loves and takes care of, and watches over, and uses, great things, great people, noisy people, rich people. We are the slaves of the senses in all this. Zion said, "My God hath forgotten me;" and God said, "Can a woman forget her child? Neither will I forget thee." Yet her child is but a poor, weak, little, helpless thing. Cannot God regard, and love, and watch over the weak, the feeble? All those thoughts which argue God's insensibility, from our insignificance, dishonour Him, and disregard His word.

I know of no attribute of the Divine nature more cheering to us than that of the infinite love and tenderness of God, amidst the minute things and beings of His creation. He gives His infinite regards to the least, to birds, and to flowers; to men, and to women, and to lowly villages. There is nothing small or insignificant with God. "Why sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel, 'My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God?' He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might He increaseth strength." (Isa. xl. 29.)

—E. Paxton Hood.

2. It controls all the events of our everyday life.

(4019.) It may be remembered that some years ago a steamer going from New York to Liverpool was burned on the voyage. A boat-load of passengers succeeded in leaving the ship and were saved, among whom was a reverend gentleman, an evangelical of the Low-Church school, who belonged to Dublin. He returned thither from his ill-omened voyage, and, having a thrilling, interesting story to tell, was for a time the hero of all the tea-tables in Dublin, at which he used to moralise the occurrence after the fashion of persons of his school of theology. He knew himself to be unworthy of so signal a mercy, was lost in meditations on the wonder that the Almighty should have seen good to make him the example of so special a providence, was confounded at the thought that he had been picked out to be the recipient of so signal a mercy, &c. And all this told immensely, and was eagerly swallowed by the old ladies of the Dublin tea-fights. One day, on the occasion of one of the general receptions of the clergy, which often took place at the Archbishop's residence, our hero was holding forth in his usual strain to a little knot gathered around him in Whately's drawing-room, when the Archbishop, whose wont it was on such occasions to stroll about the room from one group to another, saying a few words here and a few words there to his guests, came up to the knot of which Mr. Thomson (we will give him that name for the nonce) was the centre. Whately listened with grave attention to the telling of his story and to the usual comments on it, and then spoke. "Wonderful occurrence! A great and signal mercy indeed, Mr. Thomson. But I think I can cap it," said he, using an expression which was very common with him, tossing up his white head in the old bull-like manner. "I think I can cap it with an incident from my own experience." Everybody pricked up his ears and listened for the passage in the Archbishop's life which should show a yet more marvellously merciful escape than that of Mr. Thomson's from the burning ship. Whately continued in the expressive manner for which he was celebrated: "Not three months ago I sailed in the packet from Holyhead to Kingston (the port for Dublin), and"—a pause while the Archbishop took a copious pinch of snuff, and his hearers were on the tenterhooks of expectation—"and by God's mercy the vessel never caught fire at all. Think of that, Mr. Thomson!"

(4020.) A man's child dies, and he says, "This is a mysterious providence." Well, was it not a mysterious providence when the child lived? It is said, "When a man was going along the street one day to his wedding, a brick fell off from a chimney, and struck him on the head; and he was laid dead." And the preacher will say, "It was a strange and mysterious providence." Well, there was another young man, on the same day, going through that same street to his wedding; and a brick did not fall and hit him; was not that event just as much a providence as the other? You think that exclamation-points are the whole of literature, and that only here and there an event which startles you is providential; whereas ten thousand events, and combinations of them, are all proceeding on precisely the same plan, namely, the working together of the soul and mind of God and the soul and mind of men. According to this plan, under the Divine guidance, myriads of results are worked out which you do not notice, but now and then one steps out more clearly and dramatically, and you call that a providence. It is a providence, and there is a providence all the time. Good and bad, light and shade, joy and sorrow, prosperity and adversity, things present and things to come, all alike are God's.

—Eggleston.

(4021.) I would, with special earnestness, beg you to believe that God is in little things. It is the little troubles of life that annoy us the most. A man can put up with the loss of a dear friend sometimes better than he can with the burning of his fingers with a coal, or some little accident that may occur to him. The little stones in the sandal make the traveller limp; while great stones do him little hurt, for he soon leaps over them. Believe that God arranges the littles. Take the little troubles as they come; remember them to your God, because they come from God. —Spurgeon.

(4022.) People talk about special providences. I believe in the providences, but not in the speciality. I do not believe that God lets the thread of my affairs go for six days, and on the seventh evening takes it up for a moment. The so-called providences are no exception to the rule—they are common to men at all moments. But it is a fact that God's care is more evident in some instances of it than in others, to the dim and often bewildered vision of humanity. Upon such instances men seize, and call them providences. It is well that they can; but it would be gloriously better if they could believe that the whole matter is one grand providence.

—George Macdonald.

3. The comprehensiveness of providence is a natural and inevitable result of the omnipresence of God.

(4023.) The providence of God is regina mundi, the queen and governess of the world: it is the eye that sees, and the hand that turns all the wheels in the universe. God is not like an artificer that builds a house, and then leaves it, and is gone; but like a pilot that does with a great deal of care steer on the ship of the whole creation.

—Watson, 1696.

4. Results of the comprehensiveness of God's providence:—

(1.) There are no disconnected events.

(4024.) Nothing is or can be properly accidental to God; but accidents are so called in respect of the intention or expectation of second causes, when things fall out beside their knowledge or design. And there is nothing in which Providence so much triumphs over, and, as I may so say, laughs at the profoundest wisdom of men, as in the stable, certain knowledge and disposal of all casual events, "in respect of which, the clearest mortal intellect is wholly in the dark. And upon this account, as loose as these events seem to hang upon one another, yet they are all knit and linked together in a firm chain, and the highest link of that chain, as the poets speak most truly and philosophically (though in a fable), is fastened to Jupiter's chair, that is, it is held and managed by an unerring Providence; the chain, indeed, may wave and shake this way and that way, but still the hand that holds it is steady, and the eye that guides it infallible.

Now, nothing has so powerful an influence upon the great turns of affairs, and the lives and fortunes of great persons, as the little, unobserved, unprotected events of things. For could anything be greater than the preservation of a great prince and his next heir to the crown, together with his nobles and the chief of his clergy, from certain imminent and prepared destruction? And was not all this effected by a pitiful small accident in the mistake of the superscription of a letter? Did not the oversight of one syllable preserve a church and a state too? And might it not be truly said of that contemptible paper, that it did Cæsarem vehere et fortunam Cæsaris, and that the fate of three kingdoms was wrapt and sealed up in it?

A little error of the eye, a misguidance of the hand, a slip of the foot, a starting of a horse, a sudden mist, or a great shower, or a word undesignedly cast forth in an army, has turned the stream of victory from one side to another, and thereby disposed of the fortunes of empires and whole nations. No prince ever returns safe out of a battle, but may remember how many blows and bullets have gone by him, that might as easily have gone through him, and by what little odd unforeseeable chances death has been turned aside, which seemed in a full, ready, and direct career to have been posting to him. All which passages, if we do not acknowledge to have been guided to their respective ends and effects by the conduct of a superior and a Divine hand, we do, by the same assertion, cashier all providence, strip the Almighty of His noblest prerogative, and make God, not the governor, but the mere spectator of the world.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4025.) The Christian often thinks, and schemes, and talks, like a practical atheist. His eye is so conversant with second causes, that the Great Mover is little regarded. And yet those sentiments and that conduct of others, by which his affairs are influenced, are not formed by chance and at random: they are attracted toward the system of his affairs, or repelled from them, by the highest power. We talk of attraction in the universe; but there is no such thing as we are accustomed to consider it. The natural and moral worlds are held together, in their respective operations, by an incessant administration. It is the mighty grasp of a controlling hand which keeps everything in its station. Were this control suspended, there is nothing adequate to the preservation of harmony and affection between my mind and that of my dearest friend for a single hour.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(2.) Great revolutions are effected silently and with apparent suddenness.

(4026.) In all Divine works, the smallest beginnings lead assuredly to some result; and the remark in spiritual matters, that "the kingdom of God cometh without observation," is also found to be true in every work of Divine providence; so that everything glides quietly on without confusion or noise, and the matter is achieved before men either think or perceive that it is commenced.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

(3.) The purposes of the wicked are frustrated.

(4027.) As the potter's clay, when the potter hath spent some time and pains in tempering and forming it upon the wheel, and now the vessel is even almost brought to its shape, a man that stands by may, with the least push, put it clean out of shape, and mar all on a sudden that he hath been so long a-making: so is it that all the plots and contrivances of wicked men, all their turnings of things upside down, shall be but as the potter's clay; for when they think they have brought all to maturity, ripeness, and perfection, when they look upon their business as good as done, on a sudden all their labour is lost, for God, who stands by all the while and looks on, will, with one small touch, with the least breath of His mouth, blast and break all in pieces.

—Edlin, 1566.

(4.) All things are overruled for good to them that love God.

(4028.) The promise is express, and literally true, that all things shall work together for good to them that love God. But they work together; the smallest as well as the greatest events have their place and use, like the several stones in the arch of a bridge, where no one would singly be useful, but every one in its place is necessary to the structure and support of the arch; or rather like the movement of a watch, where though there is an evident subordination of parts, and some pieces have a greater comparative importance than others, yet the smallest pieces have their place and use, and are so far equally important, that the whole design of the machine would be obstructed for want of them. Some dispensations and turns of Divine providence may be compared to the mainspring or capital wheels which have a more visible, sensible, and determining influence upon the whole tenor of our lives: but the more ordinary occurrences of every day are at least pins and pivots, adjusted, timed, and suited with equal accuracy, by the hand of the same great artist who planned and executes the whole; and we are sometimes surprised to see how much more depends and turns upon them than we were aware of. Then we admire His skill, and say, He has done all things well. Indeed, with respect to His works of providence, as well as of creation, He well deserves the title of Maximus in minimis. —Newton, 1725-1807.

(5.) Perfect order shall at length reign in the moral universe.

(4029.) Throughout the natural world we see everything, however interesting or valuable in itself, serving some other purpose. We are refreshed with the fragrance, and delighted with the beauty of the vernal bloom; and most certainly this was the purpose of the great Benefactor, but evidently not the chief purpose: the bloom disappears, and other objects succeed still more valuable, because more intimately conducive to human comfort. Yet this greater benefit is really conferred but by the way: for, as the blossom contained the embryo of fruit, so the fruit contains the embryo of trees. Can we suppose that this plan of successive advancement does not hold as fully in providence as in nature, or that any event can terminate in itself in the one more than in the other? But if there be the same fruitfulness, and the same progression, what a view does it give one of the grandeur of final results, since our own observation tells us that there is no restriction within a narrow circle, in providential, as in natural causes and effects. In the latter the blossom produces fruit, the fruit seed, the seed a tree, and there it begins again; but in providence, every succeeding stage of the progress involves new combinations, and consequently teems with new powers; so that in this great sphere of divine action, there is illimitable improvement to be reckoned on.

—Salter, 1840.

(4030.) All things are for the best, by virtue of no inherent power in evil to develop good, for evil must ever gravitate towards an increase of itself; but by virtue of an overruling Wisdom bringing good out of evil, and converting the evil itself into the instrument of good. This is true of natural laws. The storm destructive of life and property fills the atmosphere with the seeds of larger and freer life. Pestilence is the providential stimulus of sanitary progress. Difficulties and conflicts are the school of all the heroic virtues. Fortitude, self-control, heroic force of will, unselfish generosity, a rational love of liberty, and liberality tolerant of other men's opinions, all grow out of this soil. They are not hothouse exotics, needing to be stimulated into artificial life, but vigorous evergreens, flourishing only in the free air of heaven, and striking their roots deep only in their native soil. The exercise of a Divine wisdom and power over-ordering evil for good is but the application of the same principle to the higher sphere of God's moral government, but another and a louder strain of the same harmonious music. The past history of the world is one long illustration of this truth. The experience of the past becomes prophetic, and catching its language from the glowing pages of the inspired Scriptures, sings its songs of triumphant hope for the future. Looking back to the past and forward to the future, faith recognises that all is best. From the height of the revealed promise peeping on tiptoe into the future, it catches a glimpse of a more glorious hereafter.

—Garbett.

II. ITS MYSTERIES.

1. Many so-called inscrutable providences are really scrutable.

(4031.) When, the other day, a juror in one of the Westfield suits refused to award damages against the Steamboat Company, on the ground that the disaster could have happened only by the direct will of God, and was simply an inscrutable providence—the community heard him with a suppressed titter, which, if it implied tolerance for his convictions, implied equal contempt for his understanding. For it was patent to every mind but his own that a worn-out boiler must explode at the very instant when all conditions favoured that catastrophe, and that the men who knew that that instant was imminent, yet hourly solicited travellers to a possible death, were morally guilty, not only of criminal neglect and deceit, but of murder.

But many candid men who saw clearly the accountability of the Westfield owners and managers, shake their heads just now over what seems to them a really mysterious visitation of God—the Persian famine. And because all great and inexplicable calamities pain loving hearts, and sadden, if they do not obscure, the faith of many souls, it seems worth while to look a moment at this subject of inscrutable providences.

Here is this case of the Persian famine. For unknown years the Persians have been cutting off their trees, and diminishing their rain-fall thereby. Nay, not only has the removal of the forests decreased the supply, but it has wasted whatever rain fell. For the roots of the trees, and of all the innumerable shrubs and bushes and vines and ferns that thrive in their shadow, kept the ground open and held the water in countless natural wells for the use of the soil in droughts. But all the undergrowth dying when its protecting forests were felled, the scanty showers percolated into the streams at once, causing rare floods and frequent droughts. The droughts yielded no harvests, and no harvests were followed by pestilence, famine, and death. Now, for three years no rain has fallen on the blistered fields, and a nation apparently is dying. The very first drought was the kindly warning of heaven against the violation of natural laws. Men were too heedless or too ignorant to accept it; and the sins of the fathers are to-day visited on the children, not in the vengeance of an awful Power, but in the discipline of relentless law. Is not this a providence so scrutable that he who runs may read?

When, in Chicago, a night's fire undid a generation's toil, spreading misery and death broadcast, was that horror in the least degree inexplicable? Every man who, within thirty years, had put up a wooden house in a city whose familiar breezes were gales, and whose gales were hurricanes, solicited that rain of fire. They who, hasting to be rich, fell into the snare of cheap and dangerous building, digged, every man, a pit for his neighbour's feet as well as for his own. The inscrutable aspect of the calamity was that it had not come years before. And the providential lesson would seem to be that laws of matter are laws of God, and cannot be violated with impunity.

When the earthquake well-nigh swallowed up Peru five or six years ago, men stood aghast at the mysterious dispensation. But Heaven has not only always declared that tropical countries are liable to earthquakes, but had taught the Peruvians through hundreds of years to expect two earthquakes in a century, travelling in cycles from forty to sixty years apart. The citizens of Arica have not only this general instruction, but that special warning which nature always gives. A great light appeared to the south-east. Hollow sounds were heard. The dogs, the goats, even the swine foresaw the evil and hid themselves. But the simple men passed on and were punished.

Before the Alpine freshets come, the streams are coffee-coloured. Even the tornadoes of the tropics, which are instantaneous in their swoop, so plainly announce themselves to old sailors, that they reef sails and save ship and life, while only the heedless perish. The simoom gives such certain and invariable warnings that the caravan is safe if it be wary.

Herculaneum and Pompeii were built too far up the mountain. And that the builders knew quite as well as the excavators of the splendid ruins know it now. But they chose to take the risk. And to-day their cheerful compatriots gather their heedless vintage and sit beneath their perilous vines still nearer to the deadly crater. St. Petersburg has been three times inundated, and after each most fatal calamity processions filled the streets, and masses were said to propitiate the mysterious anger of God. Peter the Great, who built the city, was the successor of Canute. He ordered the Gulf of Cronstadt to retire, and then set down his capital in the swamps of the verge of the Neva. Whenever the river breaks up with the spring floods, the trembling citizens are at sea in a bowl. Only three times has the bowl broken, so much money and skill have been expended upon it. But when a March gale shall drive the tide back upon the river, swollen and terrible with drifting ice, drowned St. Petersburg will be the pendant for burned Chicago.

Modern science has brought the world a fifth gospel. In it we read that God commands us to give Him our whole heads as well as our whole hearts, for that we cannot know Him nor obey Him till we discern Him in every minutest fact, and every immutable law of the physical universe, as in every fact and law of the moral. It is barely two hundred years since the great Cotton Mather preached a famous sermon called "Burnings Bewailed," wherein he attributed a terrible conflagration to the wrath of God kindled against Sabbath-breaking and the accursed fashion of monstrous periwigs! For years after his time the Puritan colonies held fasts for mildew, for small-pox, for caterpillars, for grasshoppers, for loss of cattle by cold, and visitation of God. They saw an inscrutable providence in all these things. But when their children had learned a better husbandry and better sanitary conditions the "visitations" ceased.

In the perfect providence of God there are no surprises. If there seem to be, it is that we have suffered ourselves to be taken unawares. We must work out our own salvation. The book of natural phenomena is open wide before every man, and he is set to learn it for his own good. If he will not study it through reverence and love, he is taught it through pain. But the pain itself is the beneficence of a perfect law, and it is a constant testimony to the goodness and tenderness of God that calamity—not less than prosperity—is a scrutable providence.

2. They are never real.

(1.) They are due to the medium through which we view God's proceedings.

(4032.) Take a straight stick, and put it into the water; then it will seem crooked. Why? Because we look upon it through two mediums, air and water: there lies the deceptio visus; thence it is that we cannot discern aright. Thus the proceedings of God, in His justice, which in themselves are straight, without the least obliquity, seem unto us crooked: that wicked men should prosper, and good men be afflicted; that the Israelites should make the bricks, and the Egyptians dwell in the houses; that servants should ride on horseback, and princes go on foot: these are things that make the best Christians stagger in their judgments. And why? Because they look upon God's proceedings through a double medium of flesh and spirit, so that all things seem to go cross, though indeed they go right enough. And hence it is that God's proceedings, in His justice, are not so well discerned, the eyes of man alone being not competent judges thereof. —Fuller, 1608-1661.

(2.) They are due to the limitedness of our view.

(4033.) God is the Lord of Hosts; He is the great commander of heaven and earth; He it is that directs the conflicts, neither are any put to try mastery, no field pitched, no battle fought, but by His special order and commission, and all for the accomplishment of His glory. But it befalleth us, as it doth with them which stand in the same level, wherein two large armies are ready to engage, they conceive them to be a disordered multitude, whom notwithstanding, if they behold from a high hill, they will see how every one serveth under his own colours. Even so men which behold the state of the world with the eyes of flesh and blood, dim by reason of the weakness of their judgments and weakness of their affections, think all things are out of order, that there is nothing but confusion and disorder; that the worse men are, the better they fare; and they fare the worse, the better they are. But if they did but once ascend into the sanctuary of God, and judge of occurrences by heavenly principles, then they would confess that no army on earth can be better marshalled than the great army of all the creatures of heaven and earth; and that, notwithstanding all appearance to the contrary, all is well, and will end well; that God, who is the God of order, will bring light out of darkness, and order out of the greatest confusion, could they have but patience, and let Him alone with His own work. —Spencer, 1658.

(4034.) The ways of God in His providence often appear truly mysterious to us. This arises, however, from our ignorance and incapacity to comprehend the grandeur of His designs. In this present probationary and disciplinary state, it pleases Him often to conceal from us the ends which He has in view in His procedure. He gradually unfolds it, by a concatenation of circumstances and events which, in the issue, fulfil His purpose. In this case, it behoves us patiently to wait until the whole mystery be unveiled, and not rashly censure or condemn what is too lofty for our feeble conception, or too profound for our investigation. . . . Our situation may be compared to a traveller in an unknown land, who arrives at the banks of a spacious river, whose streams seem to flow gently, or more rapidly—to be clear as crystal, or dark and turbid, according to the position or the time on which he has fallen. He gazes around him, and strains the powers of his vision to the utmost stretch to follow its sinuous course on either hand; but he is utterly unable to trace it either to its source, or to follow it to the ocean into which it pours the fulness of its waters. So it is with us. It is only a small portion of the ways of God we can comprehend. —Ewing.

(3.) They are due to the fact that the providences we criticise are incomplete.

(4035.) The book of Providence is not so easily read as that of Nature; its wisdom in design and perfection in execution are by no means as plain. Here, God's way is often in the sea, His path in the mighty waters, and His footsteps are not known. But that is because the scheme of providence is not, like creation, a finished work. Take a man to a house when the architect is in the middle of his plan, and with walls half built, and arches half sprung, rooms without doors, and pillars without capitals, what appears perfect order to the architect who has the plan all in his eye, to the other will seem a scene of perfect confusion. And so stands man amid that vast scheme of providence which God began six thousand years ago, and may not finish for as many thousand years to come. Raised to the throne of Egypt, Joseph saw why God had permitted him to be cast into a pit, sold into slavery, and, though innocent of any crime, committed to prison. And raised to heaven, looking back on God's dealings with him in this world, and seeing how there was not a turn in the road nor a crook in his lot but was good, how his trials turned out blessings, and that, while others lost by their gains, he gained by every loss, the saint, now that God's works of providence stand before him in all their completeness, shall take his harp, and throwing his soul into the song, sing with the rest around the throne—"Great and marvellous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are Thy ways, Thou King of saints." —Guthrie.

(4.) They are due to our ignorance and immaturity.

(4036.) Revelation and Providence never stagger me. There may be a tertium quid, though we are not yet in possession of it, which would put an end to all our present doubts and questions. I was one day riding with a friend; we were discussing a subject, and I expressed myself surprised that such a measure was not adopted. "If I were to tell you one thing," said he, "it would make all clear." I gave him credit that there did exist something which would entirely dispel my objections. Now if this be the case, in many instances, between man and man, is it an unreasonable conclusion that all the unaccountable points which we may observe in the providence and government of God should be all perfection in the Divine Mind? Take the growth of a seed—I cannot possibly say what first produces the progress of growth in the grain. Take voluntary motion—I cannot possibly say where action begins and thought ends. The proportion between a fly's mind and a man's is no adequate illustration of the state of man with respect to God, because there is some proportion between the minds or faculties of two finite creatures, but there can be none between finite man and the Infinite God.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(4037) Must not the conduct of a parent seem very unaccountable to a child when its inclinations are thwarted; when it is put to learn letters; when it is obliged to swallow bitter physic; to part with what it likes, and to suffer, and do, and see many things done contrary to its own judgment? Will it not, therefore, follow from hence, by a parity of reason, that the little child-man, when it takes upon itself to judge of parental providence—a thing of yesterday to criticise the economy of the Ancient of Days—will it not follow, I say, that such a judge of such matters must be apt to make very erroneous judgments, esteeming those things in themselves unaccountable which he cannot account for; and concluding of some things, from an appearance of arbitrary carriage towards him, which is suited to his infancy and ignorance, that they are in themselves capricious or absurd, and cannot proceed from a wise, just, and benevolent God?

—Bishop Berkeley, 1684-1753.

2. Must be judged by us reverently.

(4038.) This is certain, that God is infinitely just, whether or no we apprehend He is so. It is impossible for God to do anything but what is right; but it is very possible for us, who are weak and fallible at the best, not always to discern it. When we think His ways are imperfect, we should remember, that the imperfection is only in our misunderstanding. It is not the ground or the trees that turn round; but the truth is we are giddy, and think so.

For us, in all God's dealings, to acknowledge the undoubted equity of His principles, and our ignorance of His methods, is not only humility, but philosophy; for it shows that we have arrived at the top of knowledge, even to understand both God and ourselves. Much to contemplate in God, frequently to consider Him and study His nature, though we do it but as philosophers in a sovereign way to be satisfied and resolved about the reason of all His actions. Because I cannot see the light, shall I say, that the sun does not shine? There may be many reasons that may hinder me. Something may cover the eye, or the clouds may cover the sun, or it may be in another horizon, as in the night; but it is impossible for the sun, as long as it is a sun, not to shine.

Now this tends to compose men's doubts, and to confute their murmurings, and to set God clear in their esteem, upon supposition of any of His dealings whatsoever. For although God's ways are intricate and unsearchable, yet we may undertake to give a reason of them so far, as to take off the cavil and the reprehension, though not the wonder.

Therefore, when such difficulties occur, we should remember to cast one eye upon God's absolute power, and the other upon His essential righteousness; through the former of which He may do what He will, through the latter He cannot will anything but what is just.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4039.) Placed in an obscure corner of the universe, where only a small proportion of God's works passes under his review; fixed in a valley, whose surrounding hills intercept his prospects: a prisoner even there, looking only through grates and bars; his very dungeon enveloped in mists and fogs; his eyes almost dim by reason of weakness—such is man!—and this vain man would be wise;—this is the candidate who deems himself, by his proposal, capable of governing, and wishes to arrange things according to his mind.

My brethren, have you not often found yourselves mistaken, where you thought yourselves most sure? Have you not frequently erred in judging yourselves, and generally erred in judging others? Do you not blame those who condemn any of your proceedings before they understand them, especially when the objects on which they decide fall not within the sphere of their knowledge or observation? What would you think of a subject who, scarcely competent to guile the petty concerns of his own household, would rush forth to assume the direction of the affairs of an enlarged empire, after censuring measures which he does not comprehend, cannot comprehend; whose labyrinths he cannot trace, whose extensive bearings he cannot reach, whose distant consequences he cannot calculate? All this imagery is weak when applied to "the man who stiveth with his Maker," and asks, "What doest Thou?" For whatever differences subsist between man and man, all are partakers of the same nature, and all are liable to error.—But "in God there is no darkness at all."—"Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid: how then could God judge the world?"

If we know not the peculiarities of the disease, how can we judge properly of the remedy which the physician prescribes? If we know not the station which the son is destined to occupy, how can we judge of the wisdom of the father in the education he is giving him? And how can we decide on the means which the Supreme Being employs, while we are ignorant of the reasons which move Him, and the plan which He holds in view?—A providence occurs; it strikes us; we endeavour to explain it—but are we certain that we have seized the true meaning? Perhaps what we take as an end, may be only the way; what we take as the whole, may be only a part; what we deprecate may be a blessing, and what we implore may be a curse; what appears confusion, may be the tendency of order; and what looks like the disaster of Providence, may be the preparation of its triumph. Before we begin to reform, let us be satisfied an amendment is necessary; and before we censure, let us understand.

—Jay, 1769-1853.

4. Must be acquiesced in believingly.

(4040.) Blessed it will be for us amid all these frowning providences, if, instead of presuming in a spirit of unbelief and distrust to ask, "What seekest Thou?" we are ready to hear the voice of the Unknown and Invisible saying, "Hold thee still; and know that I am God!" The dutiful servant asks no reason of his master; he does his appointed work in silent obedience. The loyal soldier asks no reason of his commanding officer for what he may think the hazardous and fatal movements in the day of battle; he obeys in prompt and willing silence. The faithful workman asks no reason for these rude gashes in the quarry; he is content to wait till builder or sculptor fashions the unshapely block into symmetry and beauty. We are apt, with Joseph, in our blind ignorance, to say, "Not so, my father;" but, like aged Jacob on that same occasion, God refuses our erring dictation, our unwise counsel, saying, "I know it, my son, I know it." It is the grandest triumph of faith thus to confide in the Divine leadings in the dark.

—Macduff.

(4041.) The mind of a pious workman, named Thierney, was much occupied with the ways of God, which appeared to him full of inscrutable mysteries. The two questions, "How?" and "Why?" were constantly in his thoughts—whether he considered his own life, or the dispensations of providence in the government of the world. One day, in visiting a ribbon manufactory, his attention was attracted by an extraordinary piece of machinery. Countless wheels and thousands of threads were twirling in all directions; he could understand nothing of its movements. He was informed, however, that all this motion was connected with the centre, where there was a chest which was kept shut. Anxious to understand the principle of the machine, he asked permission to see the interior. "The master has the key," was the reply. The words were like a flash of light. Here was the answer to all the perplexed thoughts. Yes; the master has the key. He governs and directs all. It is enough. What need I know more? "He hath also established them for ever and ever: He hath made a decree which shall not pass."

5. The point from which they are to be solved.

(4042.) During more than fifty centuries man had fixed his gaze on the starry sky, observing the motions of the planets, and seeking to trace their laws; observations increased, calculations became more exact, and yet notwithstanding all this the law of harmony eluded the search of learned men; the world, as far as they knew, performed eccentric circles, the object of which they could not comprehend. The universe was a confused maze, a labyrinth which baffled them. One day a man of genius said to himself, "The worlds must be considered with reference to the sun, and not with reference to the earth." He placed the sun as the centre, and directly the harmony appeared; everything was explained, the planets and their satellites traced out their regular orbits, and the system of the universe was discovered. God is the sun of spirits, and the true centre of the universe; and it is from the heart of His truth alone that we can judge of the law of our destinies.

—Eugène Bersier.

6. Their solution must be awaited patiently.

(4043.) Adonibezec instructed by his punishment concerning his sins, gave glory to God: "Threescore and ten kings, having their thumbs and their great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table: as I have done, so God hath rewarded me." It astonished one of the wisest and most virtuous of the Romans, that Pompey should perish in the defence of the juster cause, and Cæsar prosper in his violent usurpation; but if he had lived a while longer, and seen the usurper killed in the senate-house that Pompey had dedicated to the commonwealth, where Cæsar then exercised his tyranny, and that dying he fell at the feet of Pompey's statue, all stained with his blood, the darkness had been dispelled, and providence cleared up to his sight. Herod for assenting to the impious flattery of the people who deified him, was immediately struck with a shameful disease, and consumed by wretched vermin, as the just punishment of his pride. Pope Alexander the Sixth, was poisoned with that wine he had prepared for the murdering some rich cardinals. Henry III. of France was cut off by a stroke as dreadful as unexpected, on that day of the month and in that chamber where he was president of the council that contrived the bloody massacre of the Protestants. —Bates, 1625-1699.

(4044.) The sentences in the book of providence are sometimes long, and you must read a great way before you understand their meaning.

—Matthew Henry, 1662-1714.

(4045.) That great chain of causes, which, linking one to another, even to the throne of God Himself, can never be unravelled by any industry of ours.

—Burke, 1728-1797.

(4046.) The Lord has reasons, far beyond our ken, for opening a wide door, while He stops the mouth of a useful preacher. John Bunyan would not have done half the good he did, if he had remained preaching in Bedford, instead of being shut up in Bedford prison.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(4047.) However contradictory the designs of Providence at first appear to be, if we set ourselves to watch God in His works and ways with care, we shall soon discover that He acts according to some certain scheme or plan.

Were a person altogether unacquainted with architecture to visit some splendid temple in the process of erection, and observe the huge rough stones, and boards, and timbers, iron castings, bricks, lime, mortar, lying scattered in confusion all around; were he to see one group of workmen cutting up material here, another digging trenches there; one party raising a staging on this side, another nailing on some boards on that: were he to observe the blocks, the fragments, dust and rubbish, tools and instruments, all lying in disorder round about him, he might truly say that he could see no plan or system in the business; nor would he be likely to conceive or dream that out of such a chaotic mass of raw material, out of such contradictory labour, there could ever rise a magnificent temple, to reflect undying honour on the architect, and beautify the world!

But let the observer stop, and set himself to watch from day to day the busy work as it goes on; let him patiently examine, not only the minutest details, but also try to obtain a view of the general scope and bearing of the whole, and he will not be long in finding out that some superior mind controls and regulates the movements in accordance with some preconceived plan or system, which is constantly developing itself; and that every stroke of every workman is conducive to the same ultimate effect.

And when he comes to see the "beau ideal" of the builder realised in the fair proportions, in the classic beauty of the noble structure, he then perceives how inconsiderate, how unfair it was in him to decide upon a work in its incipient state, without some knowledge of the plan and the design of it.

God is building up the Christian in accordance with a perfect plan into a majestic temple for the decoration of the eternal city.

And though His dealings sometimes seem to be mysterious; though He seems to cut down here and to raise up there, to let the light into this part and to leave it dark in that; though it is hard to tell at times what such material is designed for, what this or that work means, or to conceive how the structure when completed will appear; it is nevertheless quite certain that God acts according to a fixed and unalterable plan; that every stroke we bear, or loss we mourn, is made subservient to the end; and although it is given us here to see only in part, whoever will take the pains to watch with care the course of providence will be convinced that it does not move along by chance, but that everything is done by a prospective plan.

—E. Nason.

(4048.) Those who have ever traversed the plains of Mexico have seen the Cactacea family. The cactus has an ungainly leaf, fat and thick, and full of thorns, so that, when men see it growing, they say, "It is a clumsy and hateful thing, that is ugly to look upon, and that pierces you whenever you touch it." Wait. When at last that plant, which grows in arid places, where hardly any weed will grow, with thick and succulent leaves, and a tough skin, and which stands almost without root through the whole year—when, at last, it has come to the point where it is developed, is there in the whole kingdom of beauty a blossom that is for exquisiteness of form and tint equal to the cactus blossom? It is the very perfection of beauty growing out of the very emblem of homeliness. And as it is with the vegetable kingdom, so is it with many developments of the Divine Kingdom. God's providence looks like a cactus-leaf—like an arid plant growing uselessly in the wilderness. But wait till it blossoms, and see how glorious is its beauty.

—Becher.

III. TRUST IN PROVIDENCE.

1. Is always to be exercised.

(1.) Even in the greatest straits of life.

(4049.) I have a story which I think will interest you if you will try to listen to it, of a man in London fifty years ago or more—at a time when there used to be not £5 notes only, but £1 notes. Well, there were two gentlemen who had met each other walking about in the streets. One was a minister of some chapel, and he did not know the other when he came up and spoke to him, but the gentleman knew him very well. They walked along and began to talk, and at last the gentleman introduced the minister into his house. The minister hardly knew what to make of it. He was very friendly with him, but he did not quite understand him. He took him up into the upper rooms and then he sat down with him in the parlour, and he said,

"You wonder why I am showing you these things. Now, you don't remember me, but I remember you." He said, "Many years ago I came to this town of London as a workman"—(an iron workman, I think he was)—and then he went on to say that he had come all the way from Scotland, and brought his wife with him, and they had lived in London. He had been ill and out of work for some months. He had pawned his things; nobody had befriended him, and he had been reduced from a state of being comparatively well-off as a working man till he had got lower and lower, and did not know what to do. He had no bread in the house—nothing at all—and he did not know where to get anything. It was a Sunday morning, and he set off with the intention of going and drowning himself. He got up early in the morning, and he went on till he passed a chapel where this minister was preaching. He went past it, and he saw people going in. In some places they preached early in the morning. And he said, "Well, I will just go and sit down there before I drown myself;" and he went in and sat down, and the sermon of that minister went home to his heart. The minister told him of God's loving-kindness and tender mercy to the poor sinner, until the thought of that love entered into the heart of that poor man. And he said at the close of the sermon, "Now, my dear friends, put the God of Israel to the test, and see if it is not as I have said. I have been telling you of His love, and now I ask you to come to Him now, and put Him to the test, and see whether it is not as I have said." And this poor man said to himself, "Well, I will go home, and I will put my trust in Him. He says that He will listen to the voice of those who come to Him. Well, I will put Him to the test." He went home straight to his wife and he said, "Let us have a little reading of the Bible." She was touched to the heart, for they had come from Scotland and used to read the Bible, but for many years they had forgotten it entirely. The wife agreed directly, and she wondered what it was that had induced him. And then he read a chapter, and knelt down and earnestly besought God to forgive him his sin, and also that He would give him food and show him how to go on. Well, there was no food to eat that day. They prayed again and again, that God would send them a deliverance from their trouble; that He would, in some way, help them out of their trouble, and earnestly begged God to forgive them their sin. Next day, in the morning, there came a letter to the house. It was a long time since they had had a letter from anybody. They opened it and found it came from a man who knew them years back, and knew that they were in trouble, and he said, "I have heard of such and such a place where they are seeking a workman. If you go there you will find, I think, that the master of the place will give you employment, and here is a one-pound note to help you in the meantime." The man felt he had put the God of Israel to the test, and God had answered his prayer. He went to the place indicated; and as he was really a good workman, he was employed, and soon got on. After a few years he became foreman; after that, partner in the business; and after that, I believe, he was pretty much the sole manager of it; and when he met the minister, he was a rich man. And he said to the minister, "All this is owing to your sermon that day. It was, through Jesus Christ, blessed to my soul. Now I have left off my wicked ways; I have come and trusted in God, and I have not only blessings around me, but I have a hope of blessedness hereafter in the world to come."

—Sewell.

(2.) Even when God's providences run counter to our ideas and expectations.

(4050.) The ways of the husbandman in ordering his fruit-trees are very strange to most people: some things seem contrary to reason, when he cuts down or digs up some fair large trees, beautiful to look upon, and sets small weak plants in their stead, and cuts off some large tops and branches of others, and grafts only a few little twigs in their room, wrapt about with a lump of clay; when in winter he prunes his trees and lays their roots bare, and scores and cuts their bodies on every side. These (and many such like works) are strange to most men; they have other thoughts of them than the husbandman hath.

This shadows out unto us that the dispensations of God towards His Church are contrary to the judgments of most people in the world.

—Austen, 1656.

(4051.) The providences of God are sometimes dark, and our eyes dim, and we can hardly tell what to make of them: but when we cannot unriddle providence, believe it shall work together for the good of the elect (Rom. viii. 28). The wheels in a watch seem to move cross one to another, but they help forward the motion of the watch, and make the alarum strike: so the providences of God seem to be cross wheels; but, for all that, they shall carry on the good of the elect. The pricking of a vein is in itself evil and hurtful; but as it prevents a fever, and tends to the health of the patient, so it is good: so affliction in itself is not joyous, but grievous; but the Lord turns this to the good of His saints. Poverty shall starve their sins, afflictions shall prepare them for a kingdom. Therefore, Christians, believe that God loves us, that He will make the most cross providences to promote His glory and our good.

—Watson, 1696.

(3.) Even when God's providences seem to run counter to His promises.

(4052.) The wheels in a clock move contrary one to another, some one way, some another, yet all serve the intent of the workman, to show the time, or to make the clock to strike. So in the world, the providences of God may seem to run cross to His promises: one man takes this way, another runs that way; good men go one way, wicked men another; yet all in conclusion accomplish the will and centre in the purpose of God, the great Creator of all things.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4053.) God is to be trusted when His providences seem to run contrary to His promises. God promised David to give him the crown, to make him king; but providence runs contrary to His promise: David was pursued by Saul, was in danger of his life; but all this while it was David's duty to trust God. The Lord doth oftentimes, by cross providence, bring to pass His promise. God promised Paul the lives of all that were with him in the ship; but now the providence of God seems to run quite contrary to His promise; the winds blow, the ship splits and breaks in pieces; and thus God fulfilled His promise; upon the broken pieces of the ship, they all came safe to shore. Trust God when providences seem to run quite contrary to promises. —Watson, 1696.

2. Reasons for exercising it.

(1.) Because distrust grieves the Divine Spirit.

(4054.) We are apt to distrust the providential care of God, and so to grieve the Divine Spirit.

We should feel ourselves very much offended if our children manifested by their words or acts a suspicion or fear that we did not care for them. What would a mother think if in the forenoon she overheard her girls counselling with each other, and wondering whether there would be any provision made for their dinner! What would be thought of children who should sit together and query whether their mother and father would think that they needed clothes for the summer and the winter, and discuss in the coolest manner their affairs on the theory that their parents would overlook them and forget them, and form their own plans upon the ground that there was a necessity for it?

—Becher.

(2.) Because all things are in God's hand.

(4055.) Well might we be distracted with these troubles, if we did not well know whence they come, even from a most wise, holy, powerful, just Providence. He that sits in heaven orders these earthly affairs, according to the eternal counsel of His will. It is that Almighty hand that holds the stern of this tossed vessel; and steers it in that course which He knows best. It is not for us, that are passengers, to meddle with the chart or compass. Let that all-skilful Pilot alone with His own work: He knows every rock and shelf that may endanger it, and can cut the proudest billow that threatens it with ease. "It is the Lord: let Him do what seemeth Him good."

—Haile, 1574-1656.

(3.) Because nothing can take Him by surprise.

(4056.) Everything in the future is appointed. Nothing shall happen to us which God has not foreseen. . . . We may derive no small comfort from this fact: for suppose one goes to sea under the most skilful captain, that captain cannot possibly know what may occur during the voyage, and with the greatest foresight he can never promise an absolutely safe passage. There may be dangers which he has never yet encountered—Atlantic waves, tornadoes, and hurricanes that may yet sweep the good ship away, and they that sailed out of port merrily may never reach the haven. But when you come into the ship of Providence, He who is at the helm is the Master of every wind that shall blow, and of every wave that shall break its force upon that ship; and He foresees as well the events that shall happen at the harbour for which we make as those that happen at the port from which we start. How safe are we, then, when embarked in the good ship of Providence, with such a Captain, who has fore-arranged and foreordained all things from the beginning even unto the end. And, furthermore, how much it becomes us to put implicit confidence in His guidance! Hold thy peace, man, even from counsel; for thy thoughts are vain where thy understanding is baffled.

"When my dim reason would demand
Why that or this Thou dost ordain,

By some vast deep I seem to stand,
Whose secrets I must ask in vain.

Be this my joy that evermore
Thou rulest all things at Thy will;
Thy sovereign wisdom I adore,
And calmly, sweetly, trust Thee still."

—Spurgeon.

(4.) The Lord redeemeth the soul of His servants; and none of them that trust in Him shall be desolate.

(4057.) Our storekeeper, an Englishman, earnest, hard-working, patriotic, and a Christian, was asked one day, when our supply of provisions was getting very low, to cut the slices of bread which he gave "the boys" a little thinner.

"Oh no!" said he, "I can't; the poor fellows are so hungry."

"But our bread will soon be gone."

"Well, I have faith that the Lord will send us more before we are quite out."

He was allowed to take his own course, though advised to be as sparing as possible. The day wore away, and still the hungry crowd of soldiers pressed around our doors. The last loaf was taken from the shelf. A hundred delegates were yet to have their supper. But there were no biscuits, no meat, no bread for them, or for the still unfed soldiers who, weary with wounds and a long, limping march from the field-hospital, lingered at our rooms for a morsel of food, a cup of coffee, and a word of direction about the trains for Baltimore and Philadelphia.

Just at the last moment, when our faith was almost exhausted, an immense load of provisions stopped before our quarters, and the drivers asked for the agents of the Commission. "We have brought bread, lint, bandages, jellies, and wines; we don't know just who are most needy, but we have confidence in you. Will you distribute these things for us?" The stores had come a hundred and three miles.

Never again did we chide the storekeeper's faith, nor did our stock of provisions ever again give out while we remained at Gettysburg.

—Story of the Christian Commission.

(4058.) David F— is a very aged citizen of Western North Carolina. He connected himself with the Church when very young, and has always been noted among his neighbours for his honesty, charity, piety, and faith in the power and willingness of God to protect those who do His will. It was ten or fifteen years ago that he determined to travel through the trackless wilds of the great and sparsely-inhabited West. His route lay along the borders of the Missouri and Nevada, infested at that time with more numerous clans of highway robbers than at present. He knew all this very well, and although urged by his neighbours to procure a couple of revolvers to defend himself, he took only his pocket Bible, and armed thus, set out on the perilous journey. He had passed some of the clans on the northern border of the Missouri, and was nearing the resort of one of the most formidable ones, headed by a notorious desperado, Jim Stevens, when he met a gentleman who by some coup d'état had escaped the vigilant eye of the robber captain. The first question that he propounded to old David was,

"Are you armed?"

"Yes," was the aged Christian's reply, as he produced his pocket Bible.

The gentleman, who was almost weighed down with bowie-knives and pistols, laughed outright at what he considered the old man's folly, and with considerable ridicule in his tone remarked—

"If that is all the weapon you have, you had better be saying your prayers. The den of Jim Stevens is about ten miles farther on, just where you will get by night, and he cares as little for Bibles as a rattlesnake."

They exchanged names, and each went his own way: the one surprised at the other's apparent folly and recklessness; the other undismayed, and his faith in the protecting power of his Bible undiminished.

Night had thrown her dark mantle around the earth, and the chilling blasts had begun to pierce the somewhat feeble frame of old David, when he descried a light far down in a glen a short distance from the road. He was sure that it proceeded from a robber's den, but he must have shelter, and impelled by almost boundless faith, he directed his course thither. He halted when within a few paces of the door, and being coarsely greeted by some uncouth, mean-looking men, was invited to alight. When he entered the humble habitation he saw significant looks pass between the inmates, and each chuckle to himself, and he knew that he was at the headquarters of a "road committee," among a desperate, relentless, and murderous clan of banditti. Nothing daunted, he occupied the proffered seat. Having partaken of a rough meal, with which they furnished him at his request, he began conversation, which was continued till far in the night, when it was interrupted by the return of the captain, Jim Stevens, and a couple of his confreres in crime from a plundering raid. Stevens, advancing within a few feet of him, asked jeeringly,

"Old man, aren't you afraid to travel in this section, among the robbers, alone and unarmed?"

"No," was old David's bold and fearless reply, as he produced his Bible, continuing, "This is my weapon of defence. I always read a chapter, and pray, too, before I retire. I know you are robbers, but I shall read and pray here to-night, and you must join with me."

The roof of the shabby hut shook with loud taunting peals of laughter at this expression of the old man; but nothing dismayed he began to read. Gradually all became silent, and when he knelt to pray, every knee was bowed. That was a strange affecting sight—murderers and plunderers of their fellow-men kneeling and attentively listening to a prayer! Long and fervently the humble servant of God prayed: nor did their interest in the solemn scene and supplications abate. When he had finished he was conducted to a hard pallet, where he slept the livelong night undisturbed, and even free from haunting fears.

He arose very early in the morning, and read and prayed before breakfast. They refused to receive aught for his entertainment during the night, and, instead, cordially thanked him for the interest which he had manifested in their behalf. Asking for them the light of Divine grace and the purification of their hearts, he bade them adieu and departed. He pressed onward, strengthened in faith in the goodness of God.

At the next settlement he learned of the death of the gentleman he had met on the road, who had ridiculed the Bible. This incident confirmed him in his belief of the superiority of the Bible as a weapon of defence.

He prosecuted his journey successfully, and soon returned safely to his home, family, and friends. Often now he gathers around him his grandchildren and the juveniles of the neighbourhood, and relates to them his adventures among the robbers. With his face animated, and his eyes glowing with superhuman light, he dwells upon the prayer-scene in the banditti's hut, ecstatically exclaiming, "My Bible palsied their arms, unnerved their hearts, and bowed their knees." He always concludes his relation of the adventure with the solemnly-spoken exhortation, "Children, you need not fear the most perilous dangers of life, provided you are armed with the Bible, and have an abiding faith in the protecting power of God."

3. Is not to be allowed to degenerate:

(1.) Either into an indolent fatalism.

(4059.) As the mariner, when he perceiveth a tempest to be near, first calleth upon God by earnest prayer that he may safely attain to the wished-for haven, and then striketh his sails, and useth all good means which he supposeth needful for the same: even so we must so trust to the providence of God, that we also use our own industry in all good means convenient. —Cawdray, 1609.

(4060.) An imagined absurdity may sometimes best illustrate a real wrongness. We will suppose the improbable, to show the folly and sin of what is quite real and quite frequent in actual life. It is a winter day, and a father stands at his parlour window with his infant on his arm. Snow is on the ground. Near the window is a thorn tree, with its ripe red berries. Birds alight on the tree, scatter the snow, and eat the berries. It was in part for the birds that the berries have ripened.

The father looks up, and says—"How kind is God! This is His providence; He feeds the birds." And he speaks wisely and piously. But now, ringing the bell—"Nurse," he says, "see how God is feeding the birds! take our baby, and set him in the snow; God will care for him." So baby is set in the snow; and the rough wind soon extinguishes the tender flame of his life. Then the father cries—"What a dark providence! how inscrutable are the ways of God!" Are there not many like this supposed strange father? who talk of providence but as an excuse for their leaving those, whom they were expressly appointed to cherish and help, to stumble on unwatched, and front, as they may—with souls, and perhaps bodies, unclad and unhoused—the "bitter blast" of time. There are not wanting, too, men who, opening the window of their comfortable room, call out to the miserable to trust in God; and then, exhausted by the effort and chilled with the entering wind, turn round to the fire, and refresh themselves with wine, cake, and essays on philanthropy.

—Lynch, 1818-1871.

(2.) Or into a rash presumption.

(4061.) Let not fortune, which hath no name in Scripture, have any in thy divinity. Let Providence, not chance, have the honour of thy acknowledgments, and be thy Œdipus in contingencies. Mark well the paths and winding ways thereof;

but be not too wise in the construction, or sudden in the application. The hand of Providence writes often by abbreviations, hieroglyphics, or short characters, which, like the laconism on the wall, are not to be made out but by a hint or key from that Spirit which indited them.

—Sir T. Browne, 1605-1682.

(4062.) God never promises anywhere that those who love and fear Him shall be always saved from the consequences of their mistakes. He never says that He will so interfere in their case, that their acts shall not produce their natural and necessary results. He does indeed sometimes do so, but He never undertakes to do it. Josiah was mistaken in going out against Pharaoh-Nechoh. He was not bound to do it. He was going out of his way to encounter a danger that did not lie in his way. It was, in a measure, presuming that God would keep him from an evil which he himself had sought. It was, in a manner, "entering into temptation." Even the heathen Pharaoh could see this. He had no personal hostility towards Josiah. He had no quarrel with him or his kingdom. And he sent to tell him so, and to urge him not to assail him as an enemy, when he was not at enmity with him. And this warning of the Egyptian king, though he did not know it, was really a warning from God; and is therefore called "the words of Necho from the mouth of God." Josiah did not regard this warning, and God allowed the natural consequences of his own act to take their course. The arrow did not turn aside because Josiah was a servant of Jehovah, but did its deadly work.

What God did then, He does now. A man is going a voyage. He receives information, on which he can rely, that the ship in which he means to sail is not well commanded, or scarcely seaworthy. He might not have heard this; but having heard it, it is a kind of warning to him not to sail by that ship. He does, however, and it is lost. When that ship, heavily encumbered where it ought to be kept free, strained by the weight that is badly placed and carelessly left, gets into the storm, and instead of rising well over the vast mountainous waves, is swept by one, half filled by another, put out of all power to make way by another, and at last lies upon the sea a heaving, helpless barque, slowly but surely foundering,—all this is only the opening out into particulars of what was wrapt up in the warning, which in God's providence was given to that man. And that ship, fast settling down, will not stop, because that man is a true servant of God. "One event happens to them all."

—Champerys.

REGENERATION.

1. IN WHAT IT CONSISTS.

1. The difficulty of defining it.

(4063.) It is difficult to describe exactly the nature of regeneration because it is visible, not in itself, but in its effects. We know seed propagates itself, and produces its like, but the generative part in the seed lies covered with husks and skin, so that it is hard to tell in what atom or point the generative particle lies. We know we have a soul, yet it is hard to tell what the soul is, and in what part it principally resides. We know there are angels, yet what mortal can give a description of that glorious nature?

It is certainly true, that as a painter can better decipher a cloudy and stormy air than the serenity of a clear day, and the spectator conceive it with more pleasure; so it is more easy to represent the agitations and affections of natural corruption, than the inward frame of a soul wrought by the Spirit of God.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

2. Not in the destruction or removal of any of our natural qualities or characteristics.

(4064.) Regeneration is not a removal of the old substance or faculties of the soul. Some thought that the substance of Adam's soul was corrupted when he sinned, therefore suppose the substance of his soul to be altered when he is renewed. Sin took not away the substance, but the rectitude; the new creation therefore gives not a new faculty, but a new quality. The cure of the leprosy is not a destroying of the fabric of the body, but the disease; yet in regard of the greatness of man's corruption, the soul is so much changed by these new habits, that it is as if it were a new soul, a new understanding, a new will.

It is not the destroying the metal, but the old stamp upon it to imprint a new. Human nature is preserved, but the corruption in it expelled. The substance of gold is not destroyed in the fire, though the metal and the flame mix together, and fire seems to be incorporated with every part of it; but it is made more pliable to what shape the artist will cast it into, but remains gold still. It is not the breaking the candlestick, but setting up a new light in it; not a destroying the will, but putting a new bias into it. It is a new stringing the instrument to make a new harmony. It is a humbling the loftiness, and bowing down the haughtiness of the spirit to exalt the Lord alone in the soul (Isaiah ii. 11), speaking of the times of the Gospel.

The essential nature of man, his reason and understanding, are not taken away, but rectified. As a carver takes not away the knobs and grain in the wood, but planes and smooths it, and carves the image of a man upon it; the substance of the wood remains still; so God pares away the rugged pieces in a man's understanding and will, and engraves His own image upon it; but the change is so great that the soul seems to be of another species and kind, because it is acted by that grace, which is another species from that principle which acted it before.

New creation is called a resurrection. Our Saviour in His resurrection had the same body, but endued with a new quality. As in Christ's transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 2), neither His Deity nor humanity were altered, both natures remained the same. But there was a metamorphosis and a glorious brightness conferred by the Deity upon the humanity which it did not partake of before. So though the essence of the soul and faculties remain the same, yet another kind of light is darted in, and other qualities implanted. It was the same Paul when he complied with the body of death, and when he complained of it, but he had not the same disposition. As Adam in the state of corruption had the same faculties for substance which he had in the state of innocence; but the power, virtue, and form in those faculties, whereby he was acceptable to God, and in a capacity to please Him, was wholly abolished. We lose not our substantial form, as Moses' rod did, when it was turned into a serpent; or the water at Cana when turned into wine. Our nature is ennobled, not destroyed; enriched, not ruined; reformed, not annihilated.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(4065.) Regeneration is not a change of the essential acts of the soul, as acts. The passions and affections are the same as to the substance and nature of the acts, but the difference lies in the object. And acts, though for substance the same, yet are specifically distinguished by the diversity of objects about which they are conversant. Whosoever is a commendable quality in nature, and left in man by the interposition of the Mediator, is not taken away; but the principle, end, and objects of those acts, arising from those restored qualities, are altered. The acts of a renewed man and the acts of a natural man are the same in the nature of acts, as when a man loves God or fears God, or loves man or fears man; it is the same act of love and the same act of fear; there are the same motions of the soul, the same substantial acts simply considered; the soul stands in the same posture in the one as in the other, but the difference lies in the objects; the object of the one is supernatural, the object of the other natural. As when a man walks to the east or west, it is the same motion in body and points, the same manner of going; yet they are contrary motions, because the terms to which they tend are contrary one to the other; or, as when we bless God and bless man, it is with one and the same tongue that we do both, yet these are acts specifically different, in regard of the difference of their objects. The nature of the affections still remain, though not the corruption of them, and the objects to which they are directed are different. If a man be given to thoughtfulness, grace removes not this temper, but turns his meditations to God. The solitariness of his temper is not altered, but something new offered him as the object of his meditation. If a man be hot and earnest in his temper, grace takes not away his heat, but turns it into zeal to serve the interest of God. Paul was a man of active disposition; this natural activity of his disposition and temper was not dammed up by grace, but reduced to a right channel, and pitched upon a right object; as he laboured more than any in persecution, so afterwards he laboured more than any in edifying (1 Cor. xv. 9, 10). His labour was the same, and proceeded from the same temper, but another principle in that temper, and directed to another term. As it is the same horse, and the same mettle in the beast, which carries a man to his proper stage that carried him before in a wrong way, but it is turned in respect of the term. David's poetical fancy is not abolished by this new principle in him, but employed in descanting upon the praises of God, which otherwise might have been lavished out in vanity, and foolish love-songs, and descriptions of new mistresses. So that the substance and nature of the affections and acts of a man remain; but anger is turned into zeal by virtue of a new principle; grief into repentance, fear into the fear of God, carnal love into the love of the Creator, by another principle which doth bias those acts.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

3. Not in the impartation of any new faculties.

(4066.) In regeneration nature is not ruined, but rectified. The convert is the same man, but new made. The faculties of his soul are not destroyed, but they are refined; the same viol, but new tuned. Christ gave not the blind man new eyes, but a new sight to the old ones. Christ did not give Lazarus a new body, but enlivened his old body. So God in conversion doth not bestow a new understanding, but a new light to the old; not a new soul, but a new life to the old one. The powers of the man are like streams, not dried up, but turned into another channel. The truth is, that man by his fall from God is so exceedingly degenerated and polluted, that repairing and mending will not serve, he must be wholly and thoroughly new made; as the house infected with the leprosy, scraping would not do, it must be pulled down, and new set up; but as when a house pulled down is new set up, we use possibly the same timber and stones, and materials, which were in it before, only they are new squared and polished; what is rotten or amiss in them is pared off, and what is wanting, as several things will be, are added; so when this new building of regeneration is erected, the Spirit of God makes use of the old substantial materials—the soul and its faculties, the body and its members which were in man before, only polisheth and purifieth them, and squareth them according to the rule of God's Word; it hews off what is unsound and sinful, and bestoweth that grace and holiness which is needful. He taketh not away our beings, but the wickedness and crookedness of our beings, and addeth a new gracious beauty which we had not before. We put off the rags of the old man, and put on the robes of the new man, and continue in regard of substance the same men.

—Swinnoek, 1673.

4. Not in the addition of anything to what we already possess.

(4067.) Nor is regeneration an addition to nature. Christ was not an addition to Adam, but a new Head by Himself, called Adam in regard of the agreement with him in the notion of a head and common person, so neither is the new creature, or Christ formed in the soul, an addition to nature. Grace grows not upon the old stock. It is not a piece of cloth sewn to an old garment, but the one is cast aside, the other wholly taken on; not one garment put upon another; but a taking off one and a putting on another; "putting off the old man, putting on the new man" (Col. iii. 9, 10). It is a taking away what was before, "old things are passed away," and bestowing something that had no footing before. It is not a new varnish, nor do old things remain under a new paint, nor new plaster laid upon old; a new creature, not a mended creature. It is called light, which is not a quality added to darkness, but a quality that expels it; it is a taking away the stony heart and putting a heart of flesh in the room (Ezek. xxxvi. 26). The old nature remains, not in its strength with this addition, but is crucified, and taken away in part with its attendants—"They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts." As in the cure of a man, health is not added to the disease; or in resurrection, life added to death, but the disease is expelled, death removed, and another form and habit set in the place. Add what you will without introducing another form, it will be of no more efficacy than flowers and perfumes strewed upon a dead carcase can restore it to life and remove the rottenness. Nothing is the terminus a quo in creation; it supposes nothing before as a new subject capable; nothing in a natural is a subject morally capable to have grace, without the expulsion of the old corrupt nature. It is called a new creature, a new man; not an improved creature, or a new-dressed man.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

5. Not in the calling forth of good latent within us.

(4068.) Regeneration is not an excitation or awakening of some gracious principle which lay hid before in nature, under the oppression of ill habits, as corn lay hid under the chaff, but was corn still. Not a beating up something that lay skulking in nature, not an awakening as of a man from sleep, but a resurrection as a man from death—a new creation, as of a man from nothing. It is not a stirring up old principles and new kindling of them; as a candle put out lately may be blown in again by the fire remaining in the snuff, and burn upon the old stock—or as the life which retired into the more secret parts of the body in those creatures that seem dead in winter, which is excited and called out to the extreme parts by the spring sun. Indeed, there are some sparks of moral virtues in nature which want blowing up by a good education; the foundation of these is in nature, the exciting of them from instruction, the perfection of them from use and exercise. But there is not in man the seed of one grace, but the seeds of all sin. "I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwells no good thing." Some good thing may be in me, but it ariseth not from my flesh; it is not from any seed sown by nature, but it is another principle put in me, which seminally contains in it all grace: it is a putting a new seed into the soil, and exciting it to grow, "an incorruptible seed" (1 Peter i. 23). Therefore the Scripture does not represent men in a trance, or sleep, but dead; and so it is not only an awakening, but a quickening, a resurrection (Eph. ii. 5, &c.). We are just in this work as our Saviour was when the devil came against Him. "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in Me." He had nothing to work upon in Christ, but he rakes in the ashes of our nature and finds sparks enough to blow upon; but the Spirit finds nothing in us but a stump, some confused desires for happiness; He brings all the fire from heaven, wherewith our hearts are kindled. This work, therefore, is not an awakening of good habits which lay before oppressed, but a taking off those ill habits which were so far from oppressing nature that they were connatural to it, and by incorporation with it quite altered it from that original rectitude and simplicity wherein God at first created it.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

6. Not in any merely outward reformation of character or conduct.

(4069.) Reformation may proceed either—(1)—from force and fear. Such a reformation is from impediments, not from inclination. The cutting a bird's wings takes not away its propensity to fly, but its ability; the cutting the claws of a lion or pulling out his teeth changes not his lionish nature. Fear restrained Herod from putting John to death when his will was inclined to the act. Fear may pare the nails of sin, grace only can hinder the growth and take away its life. This doth but only stop the streams, not choke the fountain.

Or—(2)—from sense of outward interest. It may be a rational abstinence from those sordid pleasures which debase a man's esteem and prey upon his reputation, and in the meantime his inward lusts may triumph, while outward appearances are stopped. Such a splendid life may consist with those inward vermin, more contrary to the pure nature of God, and as inconsistent with a man's happiness. The river which ran in open view may sink and run as fiercely through subterranean caverns. Men may cast out one gross devil to make way for seven more spiritual ones. The interest which restrains outward acts will not restrain inward lusts.

Well then, an outward reformation without an inward grace can no more rectify nature than an abstinence from luxury can cure a disease a man has contracted through intemperance, without some other physic to pluck up the root of the distemper. Outward applications of salves and ointments will do little good in a fever, unless the spring of the disease be altered, and a new crisis wrought in the blood.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4070.) A man may reform, without true repentance, though no man can truly repent without moral reformation. Reformation whitewashes the house: regeneration takes the house to pieces, and rebuilds it from the ground. Reformation varnishes the outside of the vessel; regeneration melts the vessel down, and casts it into a new mould.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(4071.) It often happens that men deceive themselves on this important subject, and rest satisfied with some partial change which does not more truly constitute the new birth, than the shadow identifies itself with the substance. Suppose the case of a man who has diminished his fortune and shattered his constitution by sensual indulgences. He foresees that his last shilling will soon be spent, and that life will be very speedily extinguished if he continue in his present course. He is wise enough to listen to the voice of reason and to desist. But he does not cease to love the criminal pleasures in which he had indulged. It is, on the contrary, a source of perpetual annoyance and mortification to him, that he cannot give the reins to his corrupt propensities as he had been wont to do. Are we to consider such a man a new creature? Surely not. It is the mind that constitutes the man, so that, while the identity of the mind remains, it would not be much more absurd, because an individual had altered his dress, to call him a new creature, than so to designate him, because he had made clean the exterior of his character, or rather its dress, while the interior remained as filthy and abominable as ever.

—Payne.

7. But in the impartation of new life to the soul.

(4072.) Regeneration is not a new beginning of a man, but a beginning of the best good in a man. It confers no fresh faculties or sensibilities, but awakens, restores, and controls those already in existence. The only thing bad in man is sin. That is the root of all other evil—of darkness, weakness, and corruption—and the grace of God is to put that away. It is as with a painting covered through long years with dust and smoke, looking as if one dark surface—the divine grace cleanses that surface and restores the portrait, not by making fresh features, but bringing out the old ones. It is as with natural life: a man has little vital power, the action of the heart is feeble almost to death; and it shows itself in different effects, according to the several functions of the body, causing torpor, pain, or disfigurement, as the case may be, or all together; and the Divine grace quickens new life, and without adding or altering organs, secures the regular and energetic action of each. —A. J. Morris.

8. In a change of heart.

(4073.) Regeneration is principally an inward change. It is as inward as the soul itself. Not only a cleansing the outside of the cup and platter, a painting over the sepulchre, but a casting out the dead bones and putrified flesh; of a nature different from a Pharisaical and hypocritical change. It is a clean heart David desires, not only clean hands. If it were not so, there could be no outward rectified change. The spring and wheels of the clock must be mended before the hands of the dial will stand right. It may stand right two hours in the day, when the time of the day comes to it, but not from any motion or rectitude in itself. So a man may seem by one or two actions to be a changed man, but the inward spring being amiss, it is but a deceit. Sometimes there may be a change, not in the heart, but in things which the heart was set upon, when they were not what they were. As a man whose heart was set upon uncleanness, change of beauty may change his affection; the change is not in the man, but in the object. But this change I speak of is a change in the mind, when there is none in the object: as the affection of a child to his trifles changes with the growth of his reason, though the things his heart was set upon remain in the same condition as before. —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4074.) Regeneration is a change of principle. The principle of a natural man in his religious actions is artificial; he is wound up to such a peg, like the spring of an engine, by some outward respects which please him; but as the motion of an engine ceases, when the spring is down, so a natural man's motion holds no longer than the delight those motions gave him, which first engaged him in it. But the principle in a good man is spirit, an eternal principle, and the first motion of this principle is towards God, to act from God, and to act for God.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4075.) He who is born of God hath a new heart: new, not for substance, but for qualities. The strings of a viol may be the same, but the tune is altered.

—Watson, 1696.

(4076.) Observe the order in which these things are arranged. "I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within them; and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them an heart of flesh; that they may walk in My statutes, and keep Mine ordinances, and do them." Thus principle precedes practice, and prepares for it. And here we admire the plan of the gospel. To make the fruit good, it makes the tree also: to cleanse the stream, it purifies the fountain. It renews the nature, and the life becomes holy of course.

—Jay, 1769-1853.

9. In the impartation of a new impulse and direction to the moral nature.

(4077.) Reformation does but turn the course or stream of men's affections, it does not change the nature of them. They are the same in their spring and fountain as ever they were, only they are habituated into another course than what of themselves they are inclined to. You may take a young whelp of the most fierce and savage creature, as of a tiger, or of a wolf, and by custom or usage make it tame and harmless as any domestic creature,—or dog, or the like: but although it may be turned into quite another way or course of acting than what it was of itself unto, yet its nature is not changed; and therefore frequently, on occasion, opportunity, or provocation, it will fall into its own savage inclination, and having tasted of the blood of creatures, it will never be reclaimed. So it is with the depraved affections of men with respect to their change: their streams are turned, they are habituated unto a new course, but their nature is not altered, at least not from rational to spiritual, from earthly to heavenly.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(4078.) We do not mean to assert that any new faculties of mind will be implanted, but that there will be a new impulse given to those which you do possess—new motives, new desires, new actions, new conduct. Nay, all obey the hand of another master, and are under the direction of a new influence, like a harp of which the strings remain the same; but the tones and music are various, as the hand that moves them varies. With one it may send forth harsh and discordant sounds; but, played on by another, the same chords ravish the senses with their rich and flowing music.

—Salter.

10. In the transformation of our moral likeness into the image of God.

(4079.) It is the whole image of God which is drawn in the new creature. It is "the image of God" (Col. iii. 10.), not a part: a foot or a finger is but the image of those parts, not of a man. The members in a child answer to those in a parent, though not in so great a proportion. The image of a man has not only the face, or eyes, but the other members. Though a Christian may have one or two parts of this image more beautiful than the rest, as a man may have a sparkling eye that has not a proportionable lip, yet he has all the members of a man. The painter's skill appears in some lineaments more than in others. So the Spirit's wisdom appears in making some eminent in one grace, some in another, according to His good pleasure; yet the whole image of God is imprinted there; it would not else be a likeness, but a monstrous birth in defect. The fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness, righteousness, and truth (Eph. v. 9.), and therefore the immediate effect of the Spirit in the soul is the engrafting all goodness, righteousness, and truth in the essential parts of it. As God's nature is holy, His perfections holy, His actions holy, so holiness beautifies the nature, spirits the actions, and is writ upon all the endowments of a renewed man. There is an impression of the wisdom of God in the understanding, and of the holiness of God in the will.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

II. WHY IT IS NECESSARY.

1. To render us acceptable in the sight of God.

(4080.) There may be several things which may help to make the life fair in the eyes of men; but nothing will make it amiable in the eyes of God, unless the heart be changed and renewed. All the medicines which can be applied, without the sanctifying work of the Spirit, though they may cover, they can never cure the corruption and diseases of the soul. The best man without this is like a serpent, painted, as it were, without, but poisonous within. As the herb biscort, he may have smooth and plain leaves, but a crooked root; or as a pill, be gilded on the outside, when the whole mass and body of it is bitterness.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4081.) An apple may look very fair to the eye—quite ripe and red; and yet it may be full of rottenness within; so, on the other hand, the fruit may be brown, and flecked with spots, and burrowed into by wasps in search of its sweetness. But if we cut it open, and find it sweet in its substance and sound to the core, we say that it is good. It is just the same with man in his relation to God. He may look very fair on the outside, he may be respected and honoured by his fellow-men; but if his heart has not been renewed by divine grace, there is nothing but rottenness and corruption in the sight of God. While, in contrast with this, he who has come to his Heavenly Father believing in Jesus Christ, and repenting of his dead works and his idle words, cannot but be, by God's grace, sound and pure, however humble and despised he may appear.

—Hooper.

2. Because without it no spiritual blessing can be obtained.

(4082.) A grave and wise counsellor of France, being desirous in his old age to retire himself, was entreated by the king to write down some directions, and leave with him, for the more prosperous government of his realm. The counsellor took some paper, and wrote on the top, moderation; in the middle, moderation; at the bottom, moderation. Demosthenes being asked what was the chief thing in an orator, answered, elocution; and being demanded the same question three times, what made an orator, he still gave the same answer. Augustine being demanded what was the greatest requisite of a Christian, what was the first, second, and third, still answered, humility, humility, humility. Truly what the counsellor said of moderation, the Grecian of elocution, and the Father of humility, I shall say of regeneration. If you ask me what is the chiefest thing in the world for a man to mind; what is that which is worthy of all his time, and strength, and thoughts, and words, and actions? I answer, regeneration. If you demand what is that which is of the greatest necessity and excellency, that bringeth in the greatest profit, delight, and happiness? I answer, regeneration. He that hath this, hath all that is worth having; the having of this is heaven. He that wanteth this hath nothing; the whole world cannot make up the want of this; the want of this is hell.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4083.) "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin."—Mark the thoroughness of this desire. Not only must sin be blotted out, but the sinner himself must be washed and cleansed. There must not be merely a change of state, but a change of nature. Not only must the debt be forgiven, but all disposition to contract further debt must be eradicated. When the criminal has completed his term of imprisonment, he may be innocent in the eyes of the law, but unless that criminal has repented of his sin, he is as much guilty as on the day in which he first bowed his head under a prison door. All true and lasting change must be made in the nature.

—Parker.

3. To heal the disease of sin.

(4084.) Shame may hide sin, but it will not heal it. Corruption often lies secret in the heart, when shame hinders it from breaking out in scabs and blotches in the life.

Example, custom, and education may also help a man to make "a fair show in the flesh," but not to "walk after the Spirit." They may prune and lop sin, but never stub it up by the roots. All that these can do is to make a man like a grave, green and flourishing on the surface and superficially, when within there is nothing but noisomeness and corruption. It has often appeared that those means which the great moralists have used to bridle their lusts and passions have rather, like strong accents to epileptic bodies, raised than recovered them. Indeed, if the chief fault were not in the vital parts, these outward applications might be effectual; but when the heart, and lungs, and inwards are all corrupted, plasters applied to the face, or hands, or thighs, or sides will do little good. When the fault is in the foundation of a house, it cannot be mended by plastering or rough-cast. A leopard may be flayed, but he is spotted still, because the spots are not only in the skin, but in the flesh, and bones, and sinews, and most inward parts. When the disease is accidental, as to lose the sight by small-pox, or the like, there the physic of morality may be advantageous; but where the disease is natural, as in the man who was born blind, there physic will do no good; a miracle alone must restore such a one to his sight.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4085.) There are different ways of treating diseases. A man has a bad malady upon him, and it breaks out in his flesh. He goes to a quack, who gives him an ointment, which he applies outwardly to heal the sore till the morbid appearances vanish, and he congratulates himself on the cure, and commends the charlatan for his skill. By and by the man is lying so grievously sick and ill that he does not know what to do. "Oh," thinks he to himself, "have I made a mistake?" And when the true physician comes he says, "What have been your symptoms?" He tells the tale of an eruption on his skin, and the remedies he resorted to. "Ah," says the physician, "the disease is driven inwards; you have taken the wrong course; your present symptoms are fatal; you will die. It was well that it should come out on your flesh, seeing it lurked in your constitution. When you have a disease, you had need lay the axe at the root, and not at the branches. It is not the disfigurement of the skin that is so alarming as the blood-poisoning that caused it." Forthwith he begins to deal with the real evil.

So, my dear friends, you are only tinkering with the symptoms, the mere eruption on the skin, while you aim at outward reformation. You must be born again: that is the only cure for the leprosy of sin.

—Spurgeon.

4. To destroy the love of sin in the soul.

(4086.) It is one thing to be angry with sin upon a sudden discontent, as a man may be with his wife whom he loves dearly, and another thing to hate sin as that which we abhor to behold and endeavour to destroy. A filthy heart, like a foul body, may seem for a good while to be in a good plight ; but when the heats and colds of temptation appear, it will betray itself. Some insects lie in a dead sleep all the winter, stir not, make no noise, that one would think them dead ; but when the weather alters, and the sun shines, they revive and show themselves : so, though lusts may seem dead in an unregenerate man, they are only laid asleep, and when opportunity is, will revive again.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4087.) Fear will do somewhat to curb a vitiated nature, but it cannot cure it. The bear dares hardly touch his desired honey, for fear of the stinging of the bees. The dog forbears the meat on the table, not because he does not love it, but because he is afraid of the cudgel. Many leave some sin, in their outward actions—as Jacob parted with Benjamin, for fear they should starve if he kept him—who are as fond of it as the patriarch of his child. This inward love of sin is indeed its life, and that which is most dangerous and deadly to the soul. As an imposthume is most dangerous for being inward, and private rocks under water split more vessels than those that appear above water, so sin reigning only in the heart is oftentimes more hurtful than when it rages in the life. Such civil persons go to hell without much disturbance ; being asleep in sin, yet not snoring to the disquieting of others, they are so far from being jogged or awaked, that they are many times praised and commended.
—Swinnock, 1673.

(4088.) A vicious horse is none the better tempered because the kicking straps prevent his dashing the carriage to atoms ; and so a man is none the better really because the restraints of custom and providence may prevent his following that course of life which he would prefer. Poor fallen human nature behind the bars of laws, and in the cage of fear of punishment, is none the less a sad creature ; should its master unlock the door we should soon see what it would be and do. A young leopard which had been domesticated, and treated as a pet, licked its master's hand while he slept, and it so happened that it drew blood from a recent wound ; the first taste of blood transformed the gentle creature into a raging wild beast ; yet it wrought no real change, it only awakened the natural ferocity which had always been there. A change of nature is required for our salvation—mere restraints are of small value.
—Spurgeon.

5. To eradicate pride and self-sufficiency.

(4089.) We cannot without regeneration perform gospel duties humbly. Old things must pass away, that God may be all in all in the creature. We cannot without a new nature make a true estimate of ourselves, and lie as vile and base in the presence of God. A stone with all the hammering cannot be made soft. Beat it into several pieces, you may sever the continuity of its parts, but not master its hardness. Every little piece of it will retain the hardness of its nature. So is it with a heart of stone. The nature must be changed before it be fit for those services which require melting, humble, and admiring frames. There is a necessity of a residing grace, like fire, to keep the soul in a melting temper.
—Charnock, 1628-1680.

6. To enable us to derive profit from religious ordinances.

(4090.) Without regeneration ordinances cannot be improved. The word has no place with the unregenerate (John viii. 37). There is no footing naturally for any divine and spiritual truth. The nature of the soil must be changed before this heavenly plant will thrive. Plants grow not upon stones, nor this heavenly plant in a stony heart. The vine and the weed draw the same moisture of the earth, which in the vine is transmuted by the nature of the plant into a nobler substance than that in the weed. The new nature of a good man turns the juice of the word into a nobler spirit in him ; and according to the nature of a good man is enriched with grace, the more does he concoct the word and improve it, to the bringing forth fruit, and fruit of a diviner nature than another. The juice it affords to all is the same, but the nature of the creature turns it into concoction. Nature must be changed, then, to make any profitable improvements of the word and other institutions. A stone receives the water upon it, not into it ; it falls off or dries up as soon as ever it falls ; but a new heart, a heart of flesh, sucks in the dew of the word, and grows thereby. The new birth and nature makes us suck in the milk, and grow thereby.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

7. To enable us to live for the glory of God.

(4091.) Unsansctified persons at best act from themselves, and therefore for themselves. As the kite, they may spread their wings and soar aloft as if they touched heaven, when, at the highest, their eyes are upon their prey upon earth. Lucullus told his guests, when he had feasted them liberally, and they had admired his bounty in their costly entertainment, "Something, my friends, is for your sakes, but the greater part is for Lucullus' own sake." An unconverted person may do something, some small matter for the sake of religion, from common gifts of illumination, &c. ; but the most that he does is for his own sake, for that credit or profit which he expects thereby. If anything be enjoined which thwarts his interest, he will reply with Ajax, when commanded to spare Ulysses, "In other things I will obey the gods, but not in this."
—Swinnock, 1673.

8. To enable us to live a holy life.

(4092.) An old heart will never serve for, or enable unto, the acts of new obedience. The water will rise no higher than the fountain-head whence it floweth. If you would have a clock to move regularly, and the hand without to go true, you must have the wheels and poises right within.
—Swinnock, 1673.

(4093.) Thou must be righteous and holy, before thou canst live righteously and holily. If the ship hath not its right make at first, be not equally poised according to the law of that art, it will never sail trim ; and if the heart be not moulded anew by the workmanship of the Spirit, and fashioned according to the law of the new creature, "in which old things pass away, and all things become new," the creature will never walk holily.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4094.) We must be born again ; it is not a dead nature, nor a dead faith, can produce living fruit for God. We may as well read without eyes, walk without legs, act without life, as perform any service to God without a new nature ; no, we cannot perform the least ; a dead man can no more move his finger than his whole body.
—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4095.) Without a change of nature, men's practice will not be thoroughly changed. Until the tree be made good, the fruit will not be good. Men do not gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles. The swine may be washed, and appear clean for a little while, but yet, without a change of nature, he will still wallow in the mire. Nature is a more powerful principle of action, than anything that opposes it: though it may be violently restrained for a while, it will finally overcome that which restrains it. It is like the stream of a river, it may be stopped a while with a dam, but if nothing be done to dry the fountain, it will not be stopped always; it will have a course, either in its old channel, or a new one. Nature is a thing more constant and permanent than any of those things that are the foundation of carnal men's reformation and righteousness. When a natural man denies his lust, lives a strict, religious life, and seems humble, painful, and earnest in religion, it is not natural, it is all a force against nature; as when a stone is violently thrown upwards. But that force will be gradually spent; nature will remain in its full strength, and so prevails again, and the stone returns upwards. As long as corrupt nature is not mortified, but the principle left whole in a man, it is a vain thing to expect that it should not govern. But if the old nature be indeed mortified, and a new heavenly nature infused, then may it well be expected, that men will walk in newness of life, and continue to do so to the end of their days.

—Jonathan Edwards, 1637-1716.

9. To make us like Christ.

(4096.) As we cannot be like to Christ in our walk here without a new birth, neither can we without it be like to Christ in glory hereafter. 'It is not the place makes us like to God, but there must be a likeness to God to make the place pleasant to us. When once the angels had corrupted their nature, the short stay they made in heaven did neither please them nor reform them. And when Satan appeared before God, among the angels (Job i. 6), neither God's presence nor His speaking to him did him anywise better him; he came a devil and he went away so, without any pleasure in the place or presence, but by the permission of God to wreak his malice on holy Job.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

10. To ensure a durable profession.

(4097.) Reader, make sure of this inward change; otherwise, though thy conversation may be specious, it can never be gracious, nor thy profession durable. If the house be built on loose earth, it will never stand long. When the principles are variable and uncertain, so will the practices be. If the arguments upon which thou takest upon thee the livery of Christ, and the grounds of thy engagement in His service, be not firm and constant—the love of God, and hope of eternal life, &c.—such as the world and flesh cannot over-top, thou wilt throw up thy profession and leave thy Master, when thou art offered, in thy blind judgment, a better service (though it be but the pleasures of sin for a season, with eternal pains at the end of them) for thy soul and Saviour and eternal salvation. How well may he prove a bankrupt, who is worse than nought when he first sets up! I wonder not that many professors disown the Lord Jesus, when they are ignorant why they at any time owned Him. He that takes up religion on trust, will lay it down when it brings him into trouble. He that follows Christ, he knoweth not why, will forsake Him, he knoweth not how.

—Swinnock, 1673.

11. To qualify us for heaven.

(4098.) As regeneration is necessary to a gospel state, so it is necessary to a state of glory. It seems to be typified by the strength and freshness of the Israelites when they entered into Canaan. Not a decrepit and infirm person set foot on the promised land: none of those who came out of Egypt with an Egyptian nature, and desires for the garlic and onions thereof, with a suffering their old bondage, but dropped their carcasses in the wilderness; only the two spies, who had encouraged them against the seeming difficulties. None that retain only the old man, born in the house of bondage, but only a new regenerate creature, shall enter into the heavenly Canaan. Heaven is the inheritance of the sanctified, not of the filthy (Acts xxvi. 18), "That they may receive an inheritance among them which are sanctified, through faith that is in me."

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4099.) As we come out of the quarry of nature, rough and unpolished, we are not fit to be cemented with the corner-stone in the heavenly building: we must be first smoothed and altered by grace.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4100.) The duties of heaven cannot be performed without a new nature. Is it usual in this world to take up a person from under a hedge, and bring him to an immediate attendance on a prince without cleansing him, and begetting the other dispositions and behaviour in him by some choice education? God picks some out for an immediate attendance on Him in heaven; but He sends His Spirit to be their tutor, to breed them up, and grace their deformed souls with beautiful features; and their ulcerous and cancerous spirits, with a sound complexion, that they may be meet to stand before Him. When God calls any to do Him service in a particular station in the world, He gives them another heart; so he did to Saul for the kingdom (1 Sam. x. 9). Is there not much more necessity of it for an immediate service of God in heaven? A malefactor, by pardon, is in a capacity to come into the presence of a prince, and serve him at his table; but he is not in a fitness till his noisome garments, full of his prison vermin, be taken off. Can one that is neither pardoned nor purified, one with guilt of rebellion upon him, and a nature of rebellion in him, be fit to stand before God?

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4101.) If God should bring a man with his corrupt nature into local heaven, God could not please Himself in it, nor such an one delight himself in God, no more than a swine can be pleased with the presence of an angel, or a mole sport itself with the beauty of flowers, or a vitiated eye rejoice at the brightness of light.

Without a new nature, a new frame, we are no more able to understand or enjoy the pleasures of heaven, than a bat is to take pleasure in a mathematician's lines or a philosopher's books.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4102.) The new birth is necessary as to the duty, so to the reward of heaven. As the reward is exceeding glorious, the preparation thereto must be exceeding gracious. The rewards of heaven are something incorporated with us, in the very frame of our souls, and cannot be conceived enjoyable without a change in the nature of the subject. Man was first formed before he was brought into the garden of Eden, or pleasure: there He "put the man whom He had formed." Man must be new formed before he can be brought into that place, which is the antitype of Eden, the place of eternal and spiritual pleasure. A natural man can no more relish the rewards of heaven, than a dead carcass can esteem a crown and a purple robe; or be delighted with the true pleasure of heaven, than a swine that loves to wallow in the mire can be delighted with a bed of roses. A disorder in nature is a prohibition to all happiness belonging to that nature; a distempered body under the fury of a disease can find no delight in the pleasures of the healthful; a wicked man, with a troubled and foaming sea of sin and lust in his mind, would find no more rest in heaven than a man with his disjointed members upon a rack can in the beauty of a picture. We must be spiritually-minded before we can have either life or peace. Righteousness in the soul is the necessary qualification for the peace and joy in the kingdom of God: "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." While malice remains in the devil's nature, were he admitted into heaven he would receive a torment instead of a content. A wicked man would meet with hell in the midst of heaven as long as he carries his own rack within him, boiling and raging lusts in his heart, which can receive no contentment without objects suitable to them, let the place be what it will. Heaven, indeed, is not only a place, but a nature; and it is a contradiction to think that any can be happy with a nature contrary to the very essence of happiness.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

12. Because there can be no substitute for it.

(4103.) No earthly change whatever can be a substitute for the change which comes from above; any more than the lights of earth will suffice for the sun, moon, and stars, any more than all the possible changes through which a potter may pass a piece of clay can convert it into the bright, round, pure, stamped, golden coin of the realm.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(4104.) If the works of a watch are out of order, it is of no use to be continually setting the hands, they will soon be wrong again; you must go to the watchmaker's to repair the interior mechanism: so it is for no purpose for a vicious man to be now and then attempting some little reformation in outward conduct, he must also pray for the renewal of his heart.

—Salter.

(4105.) "You are vile-looking stuff!" said a stone of Lime to a lump of soft Red Clay by the door of the Pottery, one day.

"Very true," thought the Clay within itself; and as it could not deny what was said, it said nothing.

"I suppose you would not object to a better condition if you might?" said the other.

"Truly I would not," replied the Red Clay; "but the question is, How may it be done?"

"I have the quality of whitening whatever I touch," answered the Lime, "and am therefore, out of pure pity, willing to render you a good service."

"It will be very thankfully received," said the Clay.

"Well, you see," said the Lime, "I'm connected with the whitewashing business, which is a very wholesome and purifying process. Now, a little that I could make, rubbed over your surface, would turn you as white as any snowball."

"Would it!" said the Clay.

"Yes it would, I promise," answered the Lime.

"That would be a wonderful thing in my favour, so far as appearance is concerned," said the Clay.

"And what would you wish for more?" observed the Lime. "It is your appearance that you want to improve, is it not?"

"Truly; but, I'm thinking, as it would not change my nature, I should still only be Clay inside, after all," it replied.

"Oh, inside! Never mind that, if you are fair outside. Better the deception if nobody could discover it," answered the Lime.

"And would it last always?" asked the Red Clay again.

"If you were not to be meddled with; and were particularly careful to keep out of the way of water," said the Lime.

"Why?" it inquired.

"Oh; why? why because, of course, whitewash will rub off and easily wash off. To keep white, only keep out of the way of rubbing and rain," remarked the Lime.

"Ah! yes, I see: but thank you, I had rather honestly own what I am, than wear a disguise, and be a whitewashed deceiver. The true way of having my condition bettered, is by being manufactured into some useful article. Do you observe all those pans, pitchers, and other admirably formed vessels? Well, they were all once only Red Clay like me; we have but the same common origin; and the skill that converted lumps of vile earth into such beautiful and useful things, is able to make me into a vessel 'fit for the Master's use:' for which purpose, I have been taken up out of the miry pit; and am placed here by the Good Potter, who will not despise the work of His own hands, however vile by nature I acknowledge that I am."

No external rites can change the heart; which, by nature, is earthly throughout and vile before God. Our Lord described some Pharisaical characters as "whitewashed," or "sepulchres." Only the work of the Holy Spirit by His renewing grace, can mould us according to the will of God, and make us "vessels of honour meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work" (2 Tim. ii. 21).

—Bowden.

III. ITS AUTHOR.

(4106.) All a man's teaching will never reform the heart. Man's light is as a March sun, which raises vapours, but does not dispel and scatter them: so it discovers lust, but does not give us power to suppress it. Therefore our main business must be to be taught of God.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(4107.) Man, by the help of instituted privileges, does not produce this work of regeneration in himself, without a supernatural grace attending them. Ordinances cannot renew a man, but the arm of God, which manages them, edges them into efficacy, as the arm that wields the sword gives the blow. Means are the showers of heaven, but they can no more make the heart fruitful till some gracious principles be put in, than the beams of the sun, the dews of heaven, and the waterpots of the clouds, can make a barren ground bring forth flowers, without a change of the nature of the soil, and new roots planted in it. All the spectacles in the world cannot cure a man's eyes; he must have a visive faculty to make use of them. Our faculty must be cured before we can exercise it about objects, or use means proper to that faculty. All persuasions will not prevail with a dead man; the fairest discourses, the most undeniable arguments, the most moving rhetoric will not stir or affect him, till God take away the stones from the grave and raise him to life.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4108.) Ascribe nothing to instruments, either men or means. It is not of the will of man, nor another's will. Without the efficacious working of the Spirit, the gospel itself is but as a dead letter; the Spirit only quickens it. It is not outward teaching and blowing which of itself will kindle these sparks; an instrument cannot act without the strength of an agent to manage it; the chisel forms the stone into a statue, but according to the skill and strength of the artificer moving it. It is not the breath of a man, and a few words out of his mouth, can produce so great a work as the new creation; this might be a reason why God chose so weak an instrument as man to preach the gospel, to evidence that the great work was not from the weakness of man, but the power of God.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4109.) All mere outward declarations are but suasions, and mere suasion cannot change and cure a disease or habit in nature. You may exhort an Ethiop to turn himself white, or a lame man to go; but the most pathological exhortations cannot procure such an effect without a greater power than that of the tongue to cure nature; you may as well think to raise a dead man by blowing in his mouth with a pair of bellows.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4110.) All the power of regenerate men in the world joined together cannot renew another; all the industry of man, without the influence of the heavens in the sun and rain, cannot produce fruit in the earth, no, nor the moral industry of men grace in the soul.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4111.) The wintry day is a striking emblem of the state of the soul of every individual till it is renewed. The mind of the sinner is so benighted, that he sees no glory in God; his heart is so cold that he is a stranger to the sweet emotions of love and gratitude; and his life is barren, like the wintry soil, of the wholesome fruits of righteousness. The day in spring, on the contrary, is obviously descriptive of the renewed soul—all is life, animation, fruitfulness. Then the eye is opened, and God has said, "Let there be light," and there is light. It is the blessed dawn of an eternal day. It is the work of God to change the gloomy month of winter for the delightful season of spring: "Every good gift," &c. No one but He that formed the spring can renew it. No human power could have introduced the spring a month earlier, or have introduced it at all. So the efforts of the greatest and best of men for the renewal of sinners, without the gracious influences of the Spirit, will be equally inefficacious.

—Salter.

(4112.) Some people laugh at regeneration by the Spirit of God, and think there is nothing in it; a plain sign that they themselves are quite without it. If a man were to come and tell me that there is no such thing in the world as money, I should take it for granted that he therefore thinks so, because he himself never had any.

—Topeady, 1740-1778.

(4113.) No plant or tree can grow by any inherent ability, apart from sun, soil, moisture, heat, and the like. No animal can do so simple a thing as breathing by inherent ability, he must have air; he can walk, or run, or climb, or fly, only by conditions external, that must be supplied. So also the mind or intelligence can remember only as fit associations are supplied to assist the recall of things gone by, or discover laws only when stimulated by the suggestions of appropriate facts, or maintain a power of high command only where there are great occasions and perils to be mastered. In just the same way, passing to what is spiritual, God cannot be loved, save as He is offered to love in qualities that will awaken and support love; and, for the same reason, no sinner of mankind can regenerate himself by any inherent ability, apart from conditions powerfully presenting God, and pouring His radiance into the soul; for the regenerate state is only the new revelation of God within, whence before He was excluded, so that now life proceeds from Him as its actuating impulse and law.

—Bushnell.

IV. ITS EVIDENCES.

1. If it has taken place, there are sure to be evidences of it.

(4114.) Regeneration is never without some effect; if we have not the properties, we have not the nature. If the air be dark and pitchy, that a man cannot see his way, it is a sign the sun is not up to enlighten that hemisphere. A thick darkness cannot remain with the sun's rising. The works of darkness, with their power, cannot remain with a new creature state. The old rubbish cannot wholly remain with a new building. Look well, therefore, whether old principles, aims, customs, company, affections, are passed away, and whether new affections, principles, ends, be settled in the room.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4115.) In the Bible it is designated as "life from the dead," and as a "new creation;" and it is impossible that this change should take place and no evidence be furnished of it; or that it should occur and produce no difference in the life. Can the vegetable world again bloom with beauty in the returning spring, after the long death of the winter, and give no evidence of life? Can the buds open, and the flowers blossom, and the grass carpet the earth, and yet all be as cold and sterile as in the winter? Could the now pale, and stiff, and mouldering corpses under ground leave their graves and come forth, and yet there be no evidence of life? Could the sun rise suddenly at midnight, and shed his beams on the dark world, and there be no evidence of the mighty change? And can a sinner, dead in sin, be quickened into life by the power of God's Spirit, and still there be no life; can the powers of the soul, long torpid and chill in the dreary winter of sin, be warmed and animated with the love of God, and no one know it? Can the pure light of the Sun of Righteousness pour its beams into the soul darkened by sin, and all be as benighted as ever? Can the slave in sin be at liberty? can the Gospel touch his shackles, and his limbs feel the manly impulse of freedom of the sons of God, and he continue to feel and act as if he were still a slave? Can the poor maniac be restored to his right mind, the wandering eye of the lunatic become settled and calm, and no one know it? Can he who has all his life hated eternal and infinite excellence, be brought to love it, and the soul itself be ignorant of the amazing transformation? And can he who has despised the Cross, and trampled the blood of the covenant beneath his feet, embrace that Cross as the only foundation of his hope of heaven, and yet give so dubious indications of the change that no one shall know it, or suspect it from his conduct?

—Barnes, 1790-1870.

2. Purification of the thoughts of the heart.

(4116.) We can have no greater evidence of a change in us from this state and condition, than a change wrought in the course of our thoughts. A relinquishment of this or that particular sin is not an evidence of a translation from this state; for such particular sins proceed from particular lusts and temptations, and are not the immediate universal consequence of that depravation of nature which is equal in all. Such alone are the vanity and wickedness of the thoughts and imaginations of the heart. A change here is a blessed evidence of a change of state. He who is cured of a dropsy is not immediately healthy, because he may have the prevailing seeds and matter of other diseases in him, and the next day die of a lethargy; but he who, from a state of sickness, is restored, in the temperature of the mass of blood and animal spirits, and all the principles of life and health, unto a good crisis and temperature, his state of body is changed. The cure of a particular sin may leave behind it the seeds of eternal death, which they may quickly effect; but he who has obtained a change in this character, which belongs essentially to the state of depraved nature, is spiritually recovered. And the more the stream of our thoughts is turned, the more our minds are filled by those of a contrary nature, the greater and more firm is our evidence of a translation out of that depraved state and condition.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

3. Hatred of sin.

(4117.) St. John spoke a hard saying, but by the Spirit of manifestation we are all taught to understand it: "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for His seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God" (1 John iii. 9). The seed of God is the Spirit, which hath a plastic power to efform us in similitudinem filiorum Dei, into the image of the sons of God; and as long as this remains in us, while the Spirit dwells in us, we cannot sin; that is, it is against our natures, our reformed natures, to sin. And as we say we cannot endure such a potion, we cannot suffer such a pain; that is, we cannot without great trouble, we cannot without doing violence to our nature; so all spiritual men, all that are born of God, and the seed of God remains in them, "they cannot sin;" cannot without trouble, and doing against their natures and their most passionate inclinations. A man if you speak naturally, can masticate gums, and he can break his own legs, and he can sip up by little draughts, mixtures of aloes and rhubarb, of henbane or the deadly nightshade; but he cannot do this naturally, or willingly, or cheerfully, or with delight. Every sin is against a good man's nature; he is ill at ease when he has missed his prayers, he is amazed if he have fallen into error, he is infinitely ashamed of his imprudence; he remembers a sin as he thinks of an enemy, or the horrors of a midnight apparition; for all his capacities, his understanding, and his choosing faculties, are filled up with the opinion and persuasions, with the love and with the desires of God.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(4118.) The Spirit of God begets in the man that is born of the Spirit a natural hatred to sin, though he loved it in his old estate. The vulture's nature is to prey with horrid preference on the putrid carcasses of the dead. But did you ever see the gentle dove gorging the loathsome food? So the sinner feeds with delight on the nauseous enjoyments of his iniquity, like the carrion-eating bird of prey, while the regenerate soul has a holy disgust of all that is offensive to his heavenly nature.

—Salter.

4. Holiness of life.

(4119.) As a man is judged and known to be waking when he can do the office of a waking man, as talk, work, write, or such like: even so is a man awaked out of the sleep of sins when he lives in charity, fears God, and walks according to His law in His vocation.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(4120.) If you have learned Christ as the truth is in Him, you have so learned Him as to put off the old man and to put on the new. Faith works by love, even as the tree has both its leaf and fruit. And as if a tree should be changed from one kind to another, the leaves and fruit should likewise be changed; as if a pear-tree should be made an apple-tree, it would have leaves and fruits agreeing to the change made in it; so man by faith having his heart purified, made a tree of righteousness, he has his leaves and fruits; leaves of profession, fruits of action. So again, a man, as a new tree set into and growing out of Christ, bears a new fruit, he converses in holiness and newness of life. Thus you see how those that are faithful are also saints, because by faith their heart is purified, their profession and conversation are sanctified.

—Bayne, 1617.

5. Likeness to Christ.

(4121.) The creation of the world is a shadow of the regeneration of a Christian. First, there was an earth without form, void, and a darkness upon the face of the deep. Predestination is this great deep, which cannot be discovered or discerned. There the light was separated from the darkness; here knowledge is separated from ignorance in the soul; there is calling. Then was the sun created; so here the bright beams of grace are diffused into our hearts which fill us with spiritual joy; there is sanctification. Lastly, Adam was created after the image of God, and placed in Paradise; so the new man is conformed to the image of Christ, and shall be reposed in the paradise of everlasting glory.

—Adams, 1653.

6. Ease and delight in the performance of duty.

(4122.) Regeneration changeth the frame of our thoughts, and maketh us to mount upwards. Those that are regenerated can in some measure perform their duties naturally and easily; it is as easy for the flame to ascend as for a stone to descend. A vine doth with as much ease produce grapes as a thistle or a thorn doth prickles; and, therefore, thy heart may produce spiritual meditations with almost as much ease as a carnal man shall produce sensual, corrupt, vile thoughts, if thou dost not injure the divine nature, but exercise it in sending up holy thoughts towards God. —Salter.

(4123.) What is the religion of too many?—They are like machines, impelled by force: they are influenced only by external considerations. Their hearts are not engaged. Hence, in every religious exercise they perform a task. They would love God much better, if He would excuse them altogether from the hateful obligation. They put off these duties as long as possible; resort to them with reluctance; adjust the measure with a niggardly grudge; and are glad of any excuse for neglect. While labouring at the drudgery, they entertain hard thoughts of the cruel Taskmaster, who can impose such severities upon them, and sigh inwardly, "When will the Sabbath be over? when shall we unbend from these spiritual restraints, and feel ourselves at liberty in the world?" Can this be religion? Is there anything in this, suitable to the nature of God, who is "a Spirit"? or to the demands of God, who cries, "My son, give Me thine heart;" "serve the Lord with gladness, and come before His presence with singing"? Behold a man hungry—he needs no argument to induce him to eat. See that mother—she needs no motive to determine her to cherish her darling babe—nature impels. The obedience of the Christian is, in consequence of regeneration, natural; and hence it is pleasant and invariable: "He runs and is not weary, he walks and is not faint."

—Jay, 1769–1853.

7. Wisdom in the use of the law.

(4124.) There is in a renewed understanding, a principle teaching how to make use of the law. It is like the inward skill of a pilot, who guides the ship by the compass and rudder. The outward law is the compass by which we must steer; the inward law is the practical knowledge of this; an inward skill to make application of it to particular occasions.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

IV. SHOULD BE SOUGHT EARLY.

(4125.) Deferring the seeking after this new birth till more years grow upon you is a mighty folly. It is a matter of the highest concern, the greatest necessity, in comparison of which all other things are but toys and superfluities. Is it not folly to prefer superfluous things before necessary? Is it not a madness for a man to be mending the mud wall about his garden, and neglect to quench the fire which has got hold of his house? You are poisoned in your nature, you have plague spots upon your hearts. Would it not be ridiculous for a man that has drunk poison, and spilt some upon his clothes, to be more careful to have the stains fetched out of his garments than the poison out of his stomach? You are careful about the concerns of the body and flesh; oh! be not such fools as to let the poison within get the greater head, and the plague continue in the heart.

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(4126.) As an early regeneration makes for God's honour, so it makes for your own interest. Your new birth will be the gentler. The work of conscience will be more kindly, without the horrors they have who have lain many years soaking in the old nature. More of hell must be flashed in an old sinner's face, to awaken him from his dead sleep. Paul, who had sinned some years with an high hand, was struck to the earth. Christ, as it were, took him by the throat, and shook him: (Acts ix. 6.) He trembling and astonished, said, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" There will be more amazing aggravations of sin to reach the conscience, and consequently more anguish. Putrified wounds require more lancing; and therefore are more painful in the cure than those which are but newly made. The more we are alienated from the life of God, the harder it will be to return to live that life again. The farther a man is gone out of his road, the longer he must travel to come in again; and the more pains he must take in running or riding, than that he wandered but a little from it.

Charnock, 1628–1680.

V. IN WHAT SENSE IT IS INSTANTANEOUS.

(4127.) I shall show what regeneration is: by which it will plainly appear, that there is no necessity that it should be effected in an instant and at once, but that it will admit of degrees. I do not deny that it may be in an instant and at once. The power of God is able to do this, and sometimes does it very thoroughly and very suddenly. But the question is whether there be a necessity it should be so and always be so. Now regeneration is—the change of a man's state from a state of sin to a state of holiness; which, because it is an entrance upon a new kind or course of life, is fully resembled to regeneration or a new birth; to a new creation; the man being, as it were, quite changed, or made over again, so as not to be, as to the main purpose and design of his life, the same man he was before. This is a plain sensible account of the thing, which every one may easily understand. Now there is nothing in reason why a man may not gradually be changed, and arrive at this state by degrees, as well as after this change is made, and he arrived at this state of a regenerate man, he may by degrees grow and improve in it. But the latter no man doubts of, but that a man that is in a state of grace may grow and improve in grace; and there is as little reason to question why a man may not come to this state by degrees, as well as leap into it at once.

All the difficulty I know of in this matter is a mere nicety, that there is an instant in which every thing begins, and therefore regeneration is in an instant; so that the instant before the man arrived at this state, it could not be said that he was regenerate; and the instant after he is in this state, it cannot be denied that he is so. But this is idle subtilty, just as if a man should prove that a house was built in an instant, because it could not be said to be built till the instant it was finished, though for all this, nothing is more certain than that it was built by degrees. Or, suppose the time of arriving at man's estate be at one and twenty, does it from hence follow that a man does not grow to be a man by degrees, but is made a man in an instant, because just before one and twenty he was not at man's estate, and just then he was. Not but that God, if He please, can make a man in an instant, as He did Adam; but it is not necessary from this example, that all men should be made so, much less does it follow from this vain subtlety. This is just the case. All the while the man is tending towards a regenerate state, and is struggling with his lusts, till, by the power of God's grace and his own resolution, he get the victory; all the while he is under the sense and conviction of his sinful and miserable state, and sorrowing for the folly of his past life, and coming to an effectual purpose and resolution of changing his course; and, it may be, several times thrown back by the temptations of the devil, and the power of evil habits, and the weakness and instability of his own purpose, till at last by the grace of God following and assisting Him, he comes to a firm resolution of a better life, which resolution governs him for the future; I say all this while, which in some persons is longer, in others shorter, according to the power of evil habits and the different degrees of God's grace afforded to men; all this time the work of regeneration is going on; and though a man cannot be said to be in a regenerate state till that very instant that the principle of grace and his good resolution have got the upper hand of his lusts, yet it is certain for all this that the work of regeneration was not effected in an instant.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4128.) Let us look a little at what is meant by immediate regeneration. It is not meant, in the first place, that the preparatory steps, which consist in the infusion of knowledge, and in all those influences which go to form, if not the element, yet the vehicles, of moral power, are instantaneous. On the contrary, experience teaches—and Scripture corroborates it—that the state of preparation for change may admit of any amount of gradualness. A man's education in the household may be part of a work which has its final solution scores of years afterward. A man that goes from wickedness into a congregation, may from Sabbath to Sabbath attend there, and may for months and even years be undergoing a sort of preparatory change. When you plant peach-pips, they lie all winter long, doing what? Ungluing the edges of the containing shell. The frost and the moisture are preparing it so that when spring comes, the germ is unlocked, and allowed to swell and grow. Here has been a whole six months in which there was a constant state of preparation for the germination which takes place within perhaps a day or two. A six months' preparation was necessary to make that possible. There may be a long series of ameliorations, there may be the wasting of prejudices, there may be the supplanting of ignorance by better views, there may be an increase of sensibility to that which is right and noble, there may be a greater conformity of conduct to right rules and principles, there may be an infinite number of minute and gradual unfolding processes; so that when men say, "That man was not suddenly converted; I have seen the work preliminary to his conversion going on for two or three years, and have noticed his leaving off one habit and taking on another, extricating himself from one set of influences, and giving himself up to another set of influences,"—when men say this, it may be true. But that does not touch the moment of change. Preparations may be gradual; but all changes that turn upon volition must be instantaneous.

A man is pondering whether he will transfer himself from the east to one of the newer states. It is a matter of thought with him through a whole year. It is uncertain what he will do. He reads, and he talks with all returned travellers from that state. There is a growing inclination on his part to go. His affairs are settled, so that it is possible for him to take his choice between going and staying. And yet, he is not determined until it comes to the month, to the week, to the day, to the hour, to the minute, when he must make up his mind. There was a second, when the man came to a decision and said, "I will go!" He was years, it may be, preparing; but when the thing was done, it was done instantaneously.

You are travelling in a given direction, and you at first have a faint perplexing feeling, "I am afraid I have the wrong road;" but you travel on, and the feeling grows on you, and evidences increase, and you walk slower, and are more irresolute, till by and by the conviction flashes on you, "I am wrong!" and you turn about and go the other way. There is an instant in which you stop, although it may be preceded by hours of thought, and a growing tendency to change; and when a man changes from going in a wrong direction to going in a right, there is an instant in which he turns.

And so it is in moral things. A man may have been undergoing moral ameliorations and tendencies, and obstacles may be removed on the one side and the other, but when at last the preparations that he has gone through become operative, there is a decisive moment. And when a man changes from the power of supreme selfishness to the power of supreme love, from the service of the world to the service of God, the change is instantaneous, though the causes leading to it are gradual.

—Becher.

RELIGION.

L IS A NECESSITY OF THE SOUL.

(4129.) No man can be without his god; if he have not the true God, to bless and sustain him, he will have some false god, to delude and to betray him. The Psalmist knew this, and therefore he joined so closely the forgetting the name of our God, and holding up our hands to some strange god. For every man has something in which he hopes, on which he leans, to which he retreats and retires, with which he fills up his thought in empty spaces of time; when he is alone, when he lies sleepless on his bed, when he is not pressed with other thoughts; to which he betakes himself in sorrow or trouble, as that from which he shall draw comfort and strength,—his fortress, his citadel, his defence; and has not this good right to be called his god? Man was made to lean on the Creator; but if not on Him, then he leans on the creature in one shape or another. The ivy cannot grow alone; it must twine round some support or other; if not the goodly oak, then the ragged thorn; round any dead stick whatever, rather than have no stay or support at all. It is even so with the heart and affections of man ; if they do not twine around God, they must twine around some meaner thing.

—French.

(4130.) "These troublesome vines," exclaims the vintner, "why can they not grow upright like bushes?" And one man comes to him and says, "It is all because you have tied them to oak stakes. If you will get cedar stakes you will have no difficulty." The vintner goes to the forest for cedar stakes, but still the vines creep and cling. Another man says, "Cedar stakes are not good ; you must have hickory ;" and he gets hickory, but the vines clasp them also. Another man says, "It is not hickory, but chestnut stakes that you need ;" and so he gets chestnut stakes, but it is all the same to the vines. At length there comes a man who says, "Your course is wrong from beginning to end. If you will throw away all your stakes, and stop your training, and leave the vines to nature, you will have none of these clambering, wild-roaming, embracing ways." So the vintner pulls up the stakes, and clears the piles of timber from the ground, and leaves the vines unproped. And now do they grow upright, and cease to throw out tendrils and clasping rings? No. It is their nature to cling to something ; and if you will not give them help to climb upward, they will not on that account cease to reach out, but will spread all over the ground, clasping cold stones, and embracing every worthless stick, and the very grass.

Now our religious nature, like the vine, must have something to cling to ; and one man says, "The Brahminical system is as good as the Christian ;" another says, "The old Greek mythology is better than either ;" and another says, "Catholicism is preferable to the Protestant form of Christianity ;" and then comes a man who declares that all systems are extraneous and hurtful, and that if we were left to grow up unprejudiced, with the light and laws of nature, such a thing as a religious system would never be known nor needed. "First," he says, "the nurse betools the child, and then the mother takes him, and then the priest and the Church ; and so he is educated to false views from the beginning." The truth of the matter is this : religious systems do not create the religious nature in man. The religious nature itself, craving and longing for development, creates both the systems and the priests who minister in them. The heart, with its thousand tendrils, reaches forth to God, and in its reaching clasps whatever it may.

A student, annoyed by the notes of the canary-bird in his window, says, "It is the robin in the opposite cage that makes the canary sing," and so he takes the robin away ; but still the song goes on. It was not its companion that made it call, but something yearning out of its own little bosom ; and because of this yearning, whether alone or with its mate, in summer or winter, in light or darkness, it still will sing. So the heart yearns and calls for God ; not because of outward solicitation, but because of the longing, the want it feels within. No difference of teachers or systems can change this nature of the soul. The ocean is the same, whatever craft sail up and down upon it, whether they be pleasure-boats, brigs, merchant-ships, pirates, or men-of-war ; so whatever religious navigators may be going up and down the sea of life, its depths, and shores, and distant haven remain the same. The stars never change for astrologers or astromers. They roll calmly above storms and above opinions. So man's nature does not vary for circumstances, or conflicting views, but still wants God above, and fellow-man below.

However various our wants may seem, what we all need is God. He has given us the earth for our body, but He Himself is the soil in which our souls must root ; the eternal help, the source of succour and all supply, the bread of life, and the water of life. Feeding upon Him, we shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, but be satisfied.

—Becher.

II. TRUE RELIGION—IN WHAT IT CONSISTS.

1. Not in outward observances.

(4131.) Outward observances, indispensable as they are, are not religion ; they are its aliment, but not its life : the fuel, but not the flame ; the scaffolding, but not the edifice.

—Saller.

(4132.) It is not by enthroning religion on Sunday in the sanctuary ; but it is by bringing religion into the counting-house, the exchange, and the market, that we really honour her. It is not by studied service, by early matins, by twilight vespers, by chimes of holy bells that summon us three times a day to come to worship, that we do homage to Christ. True, such is thought religion ; in Rome it is pronounced so ; by the imitators of Rome it is felt that you may spend the evening in the opera, if only an hour before you come to vespers ; and that in the morning, you may do anything you like, provided you have come only first to matins : if you attend to religion in consecrated places, in canonical hours, that is being religious ; and as for the intervals between, you may follow the lust of the eye, the pride of life, and the love of this present world. Now it seems to me that to be truly religious is not to go to matins, nor to vespers, nor to go to church on Sunday (though this last is right and dutiful) ; but it is to bring the motives, the hopes, the precepts, the spirit of religion into all our walks and ways in the world, till our whole life becomes religious.

—Cumming.

(4133.) A religion that does not take hold of the life that now is, is like a cloud that does not rain. A cloud may roll in grandeur, and be an object of admiration, but if it does not rain, it is of little account so far as utility is concerned. And a religion that consists in the observance of magnificent ceremonies, but that does not touch the duties of daily life, is a religion of show and of sham.

—Becher.

(4134.) The spiritual life is closely connected with ordinances, actions, and activities,—but it no more stands in these things,—it is no more ordinance, or action, or activity—than the life of a tree is the fruit of the tree, or the means used for cultivating the tree.

(1.) It does not consist in ordinances, many or few. These are means in God's hand, of kindling the spiritual life in the soul of man, or means of feeding the flame when kindled ; but they are not the flame itself, they are not the life. It may be very necessary for a fruit-tree, in order to its bearing fruit, that its roots should be stirred with the spade, overlaid with the manure, moistened with the watering-pot; but nothing can be clearer than that the spade, the manure, and the watering-pot are distinct things from the life of the tree. Yet so apt are we (at least in spiritual subjects) to confound means with ends, and to erect the means into an end, that even religious people often find it hard to conceive of a devout life in the absence of an apparatus of ordinances; whereas it is quite clear that such might exist where, for some reason or other, the ordinances could not be had; in which case God, who is independent of ordinances, would no doubt supply their virtue immediately to the soul.

(2.) The spiritual life does not consist in actions. The actions are the result, the fruit, but they are not the life of the tree. Yet how frequently, in the popular estimate of the subject, are the two confounded.
—Goulburn.

(4135.) We need to draw the distinction more broadly between religion and the instruments of religion—its institutions, its doctrinal forms, and its modes of worship. For it cannot be denied that the popular mind scarcely discriminates between the instruments of religion and the thing itself. In husbandry, no man ever says that hoes, and ploughs, and harrows, and harnesses, are very precious for food. The veriest boor knows that these are simply the instruments by which we procure food from the soil. But there are thousands of men that are neither boors nor clowns who look upon churches, and days, and books, and doctrines, and ministers—the things which are the mere tools of spiritual husbandry—as a very part of religion itself. They are not religion. They may be the physical instruments by which you seek to excite and educe a religious life. But religion is the product of the soul. It is a vital mental state. A music-book is not a tune, though it may carry that which represents a tune, and may be essential to the production of music. And ministers, and doctrines, and books, and days, and churches, though they have an important relation to the production of religion, are not religion. Religion is brain-work, and soul-work. It is a living power in the individual man.

—Becher.

2. Not in fluent speech concerning sacred things.

(4136.) To talk about religion, ministers and sermons, missions and missionaries, religious schemes and books, revivalists and revivals, is not religion. Some have been the most fluent talkers about these things who feel them least. Shallow rivers are commonly noisy rivers; and the drum is loud because it is hollow. Fluency and feeling don't always go together. On the contrary, some men are most sparing of speech when their feelings are most deeply engaged. I have been told that there is an awful silence in the ranks before the first gun is fired, and little talking heard during the dreadful progress of the battle, or sound, save the roar of cannon, the cries of wounded, the shouts of attack, the bursts of musketry, and bugles sounding the charge. And I have also heard men say, that when the ship is labouring for her life, and every moment may decide her fate, and whether she shall clear reef or headland hangs in anxious suspense, there is no talking; nothing is heard amid the roaring of the storm but the voice of officers, as they shout their orders—to cut away the mast—let go the sails—or put the helm hard a-port. Deep passions, like deep waters, often run silently; and men in earnest are more given to act than to talk. True, out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh; still, the fuller the heart is, the less fluent sometimes is the speech. There are things too deep for utterance. Strong gratitude, deep love, are not fluent, nor is intense anxiety. The sight of her child wrapped in flames, or tottering on the edge of a precipice, has paralysed its mother; rooted to the ground, she has gazed in speechless horror, unable to raise a shriek, or move a foot to save it.

Besides, owing, perhaps, to constitutional peculiarities, the religion of some has its most perfect emblem in Christ's own words, "Ye are the light of the world." It is a thing seen; not heard, it shines, but it makes no sound; not often found on their lips, but always in their lives.
—Guthrie.

3. Not in unpractical meditations on spiritual things.

(4137.) We have greater work to do here than merely securing our own salvation. We are members of the world and Church, and we must labour to do good to many. We are trusted with our Master's talents for His service, in our places to do our best to propagate His truth, and grace, and Church, and to bring home souls, and honour His cause, and edify His flock, and further the salvation of as many as we can. All this is to be done on earth, if we will secure the end of all in heaven.

It is then, an error, though it is but few, I think, that are guilty of it, to think that all religion lieth in minding only the life to come, and disregarding all things in this present life; all true Christians must seriously mind both the end and the means or way. If they mind not, believingly, the end, they will never be faithful in the use of means. If they mind not, and use not, diligently, the means, they will never obtain the end. None can use earth well that prefer not heaven, and none come to heaven, at age, that are not prepared by well using earth. Heaven must have the deepest esteem, and habituated love and desire and joy; but earth must have more of our daily thoughts for present practice. A man that travelleth to the most desirable home, hath a habit of desire to it all the way, but his present business is his travel; and horse, and company, and inns, and ways, and weariness, &c., may take up more of his sensible thoughts, and of his talk and action, than his home.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4138.) Any such thought of the things unseen and eternal as shall unfit a man for his daily secular duties, or teach him to despise them, is wrong thought, and should be discarded. Religion underlies all things. It is intended to fit a man for life—to teach him how to carry himself in his business, his pleasures, and his pains, as much as to aid him when he dies. It was not meant to lift him out of, or beyond, the common work or wants of life until life is passed.
—Becher.

(4139.) The men who walk in lonely places thinking only of God and the angels, are not the most reliable Christians, are not the bone and sinew of the Church. This has been proved throughout the ages.
—Becher.

4. Not in a confident assurance of our personal safety.

(4140.) Some men think of religion as if it were, on the whole, simply a title to heaven. They love the hymn, "When I can read my title clear." They understand deeds, and titles, and conveyances. Their heavenly title seems to them, in the earlier part of their religious experience, to be disputed. It is as if the devil were some sneaking man seeking to invalidate their title to their property. They go into court, invalidate the claim of their adversary, and establish their own. That is to say, they are awakened, convicted, and converted. And now they say, "I have a title to heaven." It is as if a man had a large estate which he was carrying on in a certain way, and for which there had risen up a claimant, and he went before the tribunals, and there contested his right, and got a verdict in his favour, and then returned home, and lived on the estate as before, without repairing the fences, without better tilling it, without building new mansions upon it, but allowing it to remain the same old thistle-grown estate that it was before; the only change being that his title to it is confirmed, so that he can say, "I own it." There are a great many men to whom religion seems to be simply the authentication of their title to heaven. When they think they have obtained it, they say to themselves, "Now, whatever may befall the world,"—while they have a heritage, perhaps of brimstone and fire,—"I am called, elected, sealed, and adopted. I am going to heaven!" But their life remains the same as before. They are no better, no more honourable, no more truthful, no more spiritual, no more devout, no more holy.

—Becher.

5. Not in a mere prudential morality.

(4141.) Religion in most countries—more or less in every country—is no longer what it was, and should be,—a thousand-voiced psalm from the heart of man to his invisible Father, the fountain of all goodness, beauty, truth, and revealed in every revelation of these; but for the most part a wise, prudential feeling, grounded on mere calculation; a matter, as all others now are, of expediency and utility; whereby some smaller quantum of earthly enjoyment may be exchanged for a far larger quantum of celestial enjoyment. Thus religion, too, is profit, a working for wages; not reverence, but vulgar hope or fear. Many, we know—very many, we hope—are still religious in a far different sense; were it not so, our case were too desperate: but to witness that such is the temper of the times, we take any calm observant man, who agrees or disagrees in our feeling on the matter, and ask him whether our view of it is not in general well founded.

—Carlyle.

6. Not merely in the performance of acts of benevolence.

(4142.) To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and keep one's garments unspotted from the world, under the influence of the holiest motives and with a view to the highest ends, though here called pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father, is not the sum total of true religion. These are but samples of the stock—the small segments of a large circle. Here, as elsewhere in Scripture, a part, or parts, is put for the whole; and these two are selected for this, among other reasons, that they are characteristic and most important; not secondary, but primary; not accidental, but essential features of all true religion. To make this plainer, it is as if I described a living man by saying, he breathes. But he does many things else.

He sees and hears; he walks and talks; he thirsts and hungers—and a hundred things besides. Still, unless he breathes, he is not alive, but dead; and dead is the religion that does not aim at these two things, personal purity and active charity; in other words, doing good and being good.

—Guthrie.

7. But in a right government of the soul.

(4143.) The religion of heaven, being full of holy love and joy, consists very much in affection: and therefore, undoubtedly, true religion consists very much in affection. The way to learn the true nature of anything, is to go where that thing is to be found in its purity and perfection. If we would know the true nature of gold we must view it, not in the ore, but when it is refined. If we would learn what true religion is, we must go where there is true religion, and nothing but true religion, and in its highest perfection, without any defect or mixture.

—Jonathan Edwards, 1703-1758.

(4144.) Some men think that religion is a mere ecstatic experience, like a tune rarely played upon some faculty; living only while it is being performed, and then dying in silence. And, indeed, many men carry their religion as a church carries its bell—high up in a bellry, to ring out on sacred days, to strike for funerals, or to chime for weddings. All the rest of the time it hangs above reach—voiceless, silent, dead. But religion is not the speciality of any one feeling, but the mood and harmony of the whole of them. It is the whole soul marching heavenward to the music of joy and love, with well-ranked faculties, every one of them beating time and keeping tune.

The religious life is thoughtful, but thought is not alone its nature. It is full of affection, but it has more than mere feeling; it abounds in grand moral impulses. Effervescent experiences are not its characteristic. It is the soul of a man made wondrously rich, moving to the touch of Divine influence, in every way to which so facile and elaborate a creature as man can move. There is no end to its combinations. It shapes itself beyond all enumeration of shapes. It thinks in vast and fathomless streams. It wills with all attitudes of authority and decision. It feels with all moods and variations of social affection. It rises by the wings of faith, into the invisible, and fashions for itself a life there, glowing with every imaginable ecstasy. And neither one of these is religion more than another. It is the whole soul's life that is religion. When the sun rose on Memnon, it was fabled to have uttered melodious noises; but what were the rude twangings of that huge grotesque statue, compared with the soul's response when God rises upon it, and every part, like a vibrating chord, sounds forth, to His touch, its joy and worship?

—Becher.

(4145.) There are a great many persons who think, "I must take care of my religion." They have got something that they call religion which they conceive needs to be guarded. Just if I should say, "I must take care of my health," and should yet neglect my body, so that my nerves were out of order, and my heart was out of right beat, thinking that I had something distinct from the body, which was health; whereas health means a body acting right in every one of its parts! And religion is to the soul what health is to the body—it is the right ordering of all the faculties. Many persons think it is confined to certain faculties, which must be set buzzing at particular times. They treat it very much as a boy would a caged bird. They keep their religion at home all the week, and on Sunday they go and slip it into the cage, and let it sing; but its voice is hushed the moment they take it out.

—Becher.

8. In doing secular work from sacred motives.

(4146.) To be conversant in holy duties is indeed more sweet to a man's self, and is a heaven upon earth; but to be conversant in our calling is more profitable to others—to the Church, the commonwealth, or the family—and so may glorify God more (Phil. i. 24). "More fruit" is brought forth when both are joined and wisely subordinated, so as the one is not a hindrance to the other. Though the child, out of love to his mother and the sweetness he has in her company, could find it in his heart to stay all day at home to look on her, yet it pleases her more for him to go to school all day, and at night to come home and be with her, and play with her; and she then kisses him and makes much of him.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(4147.) It is a grand mistake in the world to think that you can only be religious when engaged in religious work. That is not true. You are religious when you are building, or ploughing, or sowing, or reaping. If anything were to go wrong, or any temptation urged to do wrong, you would fall back upon the grand governing motive, "Serve the Lord Christ:" but for the time you are engaged wholly in the work; and it is not irreligious to do it with all your might, when the motive for which you do it, and the end to which you do it, is a Divine one. It is not true that doing religious work is necessarily being religious. A man may spend twelve hours every day in building a church, and may be an absolute heathen or atheist. Another man may spend sixteen hours a day in building a warehouse, and may be doing a most holy and religious work. It is not the work that makes the workman holy, but it is the workman's heart that consecrates the toil, and makes all he does to be serving the Lord Christ.

—Cumming.

9. In a faithful discharge of our duties toward both God and man.

(4148.) As the boat cannot move rightly when the oars only on one side are plied; or as the fowl, if she use only one wing, cannot fly up: so religion consisteth of duties to be performed, some to God and some to man—some for the first table of the law, some for the second; or otherwise that religion will never profit that hath one hand wrapped up that should be towards man in all offices of charity, though the other be used towards God in all offices of piety.

—Gregory the Great, 545-604.

(4149.) Herein is religion best seen, in an equal and uniform practice of every part of our duty; not only in serving God devoutly, but in demeaning ourselves peaceably and justly, kindly and charitably towards all men, not only in restraining ourselves from the outward act of sin, but in mortifying the inward inclination to it, in subduing our lusts, and governing our passions, and bridling our tongues. As he that would have a prudent care of his health and life must not only guard himself against the chief and common diseases which are incident to men, and take care to prevent them, but must likewise be careful to preserve himself from those that are esteemed less dangerous, but yet sometimes do prove mortal; he must not only endeavour to secure his head and heart from being wounded, but must have a tender care of every part, there being hardly any disease or wound so slight but that some have died of it. In like manner the care of our souls consists in a universal regard to our duty, and that we be defective in no part of it; though we ought to have a more especial regard to those duties which are more considerable, and wherein religion doth mainly consist, as piety towards God, temperance and chastity in regard of ourselves, charity towards the poor, truth and justice, goodness and kindness towards all men; but then no other grace and virtue, though of an inferior rank, ought to be neglected by us.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

10. In likeness to God.

(4150.) "Be ye followers of God as dear children." The abstract of religion is to imitate Him whom thou dost worship. Such an one hath done me insufferable wrong, how can I forgive him? God would. Another is gotten into my debt, and abuseth my patience, how can I forbear him? God would. Be thou a follower of God in grace, that thou mayest ascend to His glory. A man is travelling to this city, at least in his own opinion he thinks so, and tells all he meets that he is going to London; yet still he keeps his back upon it, and bends his course the contrary way. So ridiculous a thing is it for men to profess that they are going to heaven when their whole life is directly forwarding themselves to hell.

—Adams, 1653.

(4151.) The first act of religion is to know what is true of God, the second act is to express it in our lives.

—Whicote, 1610-1683.

(4152.) The best way to find out what is religion in us, is to inquire what is true concerning God: for religion in us is our resemblance of God, who is ever best pleased with those things in His creatures which are most eminent in Himself.

—Whicote, 1610-1683.

(4153.) To be godly is to be godlike. The full accord of all the soul with His character, in whom, as their native home, dwell "whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely," and the full conformity of the will to His sovereign will who is the life of our lives—this, and nothing shallower, nothing narrower, is religion in its perfection, and the measure in which we have attained to this harmony with God is the measure in which we are Christians. As two stringed instruments may be so tuned to one keynote that if you strike the one, a faint ethereal echo is heard from the other, which blends undistinguishably with its parent sound; so drawing near to God, and brought into unison with His mind and will, our responsive spirits vibrate in accord with His, and give forth tones, low and thin indeed, but still repeating the mighty music of heaven.

—Maclaren.

(4154.) By religion I mean perfected manhood,—the quickening of the soul by the influence of the Divine Spirit.

—Becher.

11. In communion with God.

(4155.) There is another kind of virtue that may find employment for those retired hours in which we are altogether left to ourselves and destitute of company and conversation ; I mean that intercourse and communication which every reasonable creature ought to maintain with the great Author of his being. The man who lives under an habitual sense of the Divine presence keeps up a perpetual cheerfulness of temper, and enjoys every moment the satisfaction of thinking himself in company with his dearest and best of friends. The time never lies heavy upon him : it is impossible for him to be alone. His thoughts and passions are the most busied at such hours when those of other men are the most inactive. He no sooner steps out of the world but his heart burns with devotion, swells with hope, and triumphs in the consciousness of that presence which everywhere surrounds him ; or, on the contrary, pours out its fears, its sorrows, its apprehensions to the great Supporter of its existence.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

III. ITS REASONABLENESS.

(4156.) Certainly that which is necessary should be preferred before that which is superfluous. A man would take care to get meat rather than sauce, and would prefer his business before his recreation. It is not necessary that we should be great and rich in the world ; within a little while it will not be a pin to choose what part we have acted here. But it is necessary we should be gracious, holy, and acquainted with God in Christ : that is our business.

Again, that which is eternal should be preferred before that which is temporal. You count him a fool who is very exact and careful to get his room in an inn furnished, when he neglects his house where his constant abode is. In the other world—there is our home ! and if all our care should be here for the present estate where we tarry but for a night, and neglect eternity, our everlasting happiness, that were a very great folly.

That which is spiritual, which concerns our soul, should be preferred before that which is carnal and corporeal, and only concerns the body : for the better part should have the most care. As, for instance, a man that is wounded, and cut through his clothes and skin and all, will sooner look to have the wound closed up in his body, than the rent made up in his garment. So the distempers of the inward man should be first cured before we look after the outward man, which is as it were the garment and clothing, for these outward things shall be added. Here is your work—to please God, not to satisfy the flesh. This is that which concerns us not only for a little while, but for ever, and concerns the inward man. —Manton, 1620-1667.

(4157.) It may be made out to be reasonable to embrace and voluntarily to submit to present and grievous sufferings, in hopes of future happiness and reward ; concerning which we have not, nor perhaps are capable of having, the same certainty and assurance, which we have of the evils and sufferings of this present life.

Now, granting that we have not the same certainty concerning our future happiness, that we have of our present sufferings which we feel, or see just ready to come upon us ; yet prudence making it necessary for men to run this hazard, does justify the reasonableness of it. This I take to be a known and ruled case in the common affairs of life, and in matters of temporal concernment ; and men act upon this principle every day. The husbandman parts with his corn, and casts it into the earth, in confidence that it will spring up again, and at the time of harvest bring him in a considerable return and advantage. He parts with a certainty in hope only of a great future benefit. And though he have no demonstration for the infallible success of his labour and hazard, yet he acts very reasonably ; because if he does not take this course, he runs a greater and more certain hazard of perishing by famine at last, when his present stock is spent. The case of the merchant is the same, who parts with a present estate in hopes of a future improvement, which yet is not so certain as what he parts withal.

And if this be reasonable in these cases, then the hazard which men run with greater assurance than either the husbandman or the merchant have, is much more reasonable. When we part with this life in hopes of one infinitely better, that is in sure and certain hope of a resurrection to eternal life ; and when we submit to present sufferings to avoid an eternity of misery, which is much more to be dreaded than temporal want, this is reasonable ; because here is a much greater advantage in view, and a more pressing necessity in the case,—nothing being so desirable to one that must live for ever, as to be happy for ever ; and nothing to be avoided by him with so much care as everlasting misery and ruin. And for our security of obtaining the one and escaping the other we have the promise of God who cannot lie ; which is all the certainty and security that things future and invisible are capable of.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4158.) He that will allow exquisite and endless happiness to be but the possible consequence of a good life here, and the contrary state the possible reward of a bad one, must own himself to judge very much amiss if he does not conclude that a virtuous life, with the certain expectation of everlasting bliss which may come, is to be preferred to a vicious one, with the fear of that dreadful state of misery which it is very possible may overtake the guilty, or at best the terrible uncertain hope of annihilation. This is evidently so, though the virtuous life here had nothing but pain, and the vicious, continual pleasure ; which yet is for the most part quite otherwise, and wicked men have not much the odds to brag of, even in their present possession ; nay, all things rightly considered, have, I think, the worst part here. But when infinite happiness is put in one scale against infinite misery in the other,—if the worst that comes to the pious man, if he mistakes, be the best that the wicked attain to, if he be in the right,—who can without madness run the venture ? Who in his wits would choose to come within a possibility of infinite misery, which if he miss there is yet nothing to be got by that hazard ? Whereas, on the other side, the sober man ventures nothing against infinite happiness to be got, if his expectation comes to pass. If the good man be in the right, he is eternally happy ; if he mistakes, he is not miserable ; he feels nothing. On the other side, if the wicked be in the right, he is not happy ; if he mistakes, he is infinitely miserable. Must it not be a most wrong judgment that does not presently see to which side in this case the preference is to be given?

—Locke, 1632-1704.

IV. ITS VALUE.

1. Cannot well be overstated.

(4159.) Religion is like the firmament; the more it is examined the greater the number of stars will be discovered; like the sea, the more it is observed the more it appears to be immense; like fine gold, the more it is tried in the furnace the greater will be its lustre.

—Rays of Light.

2. Is manifest in the dignity it gives to our life.

(4160.) It is a peculiar advantage of piety that it furnisheth employment fit for us, worthy of us, hugely grateful, and highly beneficial to us. Man is a very busy and active creature, which cannot live and do nothing, whose thoughts are in restless motion, whose desires are ever stretching at somewhat, who perpetually will be working either good or evil to himself, wherefore greatly profitable must that thing be which determineth him to act well, to spend his care and pain on that which is truly advantageous to him; and that is religion only. It alone fasteneth our thoughts, affections, and endeavours upon occupations worthy the dignity of our nature, suiting the excellency of our natural capacities and endowments, tending to the perfection and advancement of our reason, to the enriching and ennobling of our souls. Secluding that, we have nothing in the world to study, to affect, to pursue, not very mean and below us, not very base, and misbecoming us, as men of reason and judgment. What have we to do but to eat and drink like horses or like swine; but to sport and play like children or apes; but to bicker and scuffle about trifles and impertinences like idiots? What but to scrape or scramble for useless pelf, to hunt after empty shows and shadows of honour, or the vain fancies and dreams of men? What, but to wallow or bask in sordid pleasures, the which soon degenerate into remorse and bitterness? To which sort of employments were a man confined, what a pitiful thing would he be, and how inconsiderable were his life! Were a man designed only, like a fly, to buzz about here for a time, sucking in the air and licking the dew, then soon to vanish back into nothing, or to be transformed into worms, how sorry and despicable a thing were he! And such without religion we should be. But it supplieth us with business of a most worthy nature and lofty importance; it setteth us upon doing things great and noble as can be; it engageth us to free our minds from all fond conceits, and cleanse our hearts from all corrupt affections, to curb our brutish appetites, to tame our wild passions, to correct our perverse inclinations, to conform the dispositions of our souls and the actions of life to the eternal laws of righteousness and goodness; it putteth us, upon the imitation of God, upon obtaining a friendship and maintaining a correspondence with the High and Holy One, upon fitting our minds for conversation and society with the wisest and purest spirits above, upon providing for an immortal state, upon the acquisition of joy and glory everlasting. It employeth us in the divinest actions, promoting virtue, performing beneficence, serving the public, and doing good to all; the being exercised in which things doth indeed render a man highly considerable, and his life excellently valuable.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

3. Is manifest in its influence on individual happiness.

(4161.) There are no principles but those of religion to be depended upon in cases of real distress; and these are able to bear us up under all the changes and chances to which our life is subject.

—Sterne, 1713-1768.

(4162.) Believe me, I speak it deliberately and with full conviction: I have enjoyed many of the comforts of life, none of which I wish to esteem lightly: often have I been charmed with the beauties of nature, and refreshed with her bountiful gifts. I have spent many an hour in sweet meditation, and in reading the most valuable productions of the wisest men. I have often been delighted with the conversation of ingenious, sensible, and exalted characters: my eyes have been powerfully attracted by the finest productions of human art, and my ears by enchanting melodies. I have found pleasure when calling into activity the powers of my own mind; when residing in my own native land or travelling through foreign parts; when surrounded by large and splendid companies—still more when moving in the small endearing circle of my own family; yet, to speak the truth before God, who is my Judge, I must confess I know not any joy that is so dear to me, that so fully satisfies the inmost desires of my mind, that so enlivens, refines, and elevates my whole nature, as that which I derive from religion, from faith in God: as one who not only is the parent of men, but has condescended as a brother, to clothe Himself with our nature. Nothing affords me greater delight than a solid hope that I partake of His favours, and rely on His never-failing support and protection. . . . He who has been so often my hope, my refuge, my confidence, when I stood upon the brink of an abyss where I could not move one step forward; He who, in answer to my prayer, has helped me when every prospect of help vanished; that God who has safely conducted me, not merely through flowery paths, but likewise across precipices and burning sands;—may this God be thy God, thy comfort, as He has been mine!

—Lewater, 1741-1801.

(4163.) On a Sunday afternoon, a working man—a fine, tall fellow, with honest, manly face, and in an easy manner—thus addressed a crowd of hearers, in Regent's Park, London:—

"There is," he said, "nothing like religion for making you truly happy. The other day I was passing by an infidel place, and must needs go in; so when I got in, I heard a man giving an account of a visit which he had paid to one of their number who had just died; and he said that he could assure them, on the word of a gentleman, that he had died very happy. Well, I thought to myself, 'That's very strange;' so when he sat down, I rose and said, 'May I be permitted to speak a word?'"

"By all means," they answered.

"So I said to them, 'The gentleman who has just sat down has told you that one of your friends, an infidel, who professed to believe that dying is either going nowhere, or else going no one knows where, died very happy. Now, that's the very first infidel I ever heard of who died very happy; but, as your friend declares it on the word of a gentleman, of course it must be so. I am obliged to admit that one infidel has died "very happy."

But then, if he died very happy, I am sure he lived very miserable. For, listen; I've got a dear wife at home; she is the light of my dwelling. When I get home from my work, there she always is, with smiling face, to give me a cup of tea and a warm welcome. If I were going to die, and leave her for ever, to go nowhere, or no one knows where, I couldn't be happy at that moment. I have four dear little children, whose little, bright faces are always looking out for me when I am coming home, and whose pretty prattle and merry laugh I love to hear. If I were going to die, and to look on those dear little faces no more, and felt that I was going nowhere, or no one knows where, I could not be very happy at that moment. If I had lived a cat-and-dog life with my wife, and wished to get rid of her on any terms; if my children had been my curse and torment, and I wished by any means to see the last of them; then, perhaps, I could be happy in the thought of dying, and going nowhere or anywhere; but this would only be, because I had lived so miserably. And so I say that the person whose death has been described, and who died so happy, must have lived very miserable; for if he had lived happy, he could only have been miserable at the thought of dying, and leaving all that made him happy behind.

"But, my friends, real religion makes us happy while we live, and happy when we die. It is religion that has given me such a happy home; it is that which makes my wife so good a wife, and my children such obedient children, and myself such a happy man; and when I come to die, then, through faith in my blessed Saviour who died to redeem me, I know where I shall go—to my Father's house in heaven. There I shall see my Saviour whom I loved, and have a happy meeting again with those I left behind. I can speak well, then, of real religion; I can warmly recommend it to you. Without delay choose this good part. Give your hearts to the Saviour, and He will make you safe and happy for ever."

4. Is manifest in its influence on the national welfare.

(4164.) It is a most important sentiment, and ought to be kept constantly before the public mind, that religion is the most direct and powerful cause of national comfort, prosperity, and security, and that in its absence all their other causes must be limited and transient in their effects. If religion were a mere abstraction of devotion, confined to the closet and the sanctuary, and restricted in its influence to the imagination and the taste, but not having any necessary control over the conscience, the heart, and the life, and not intended to regulate the intercourse of society; if it consisted merely in attendance of the rites and forms of the Church, and began and ended upon the threshold of the house of God, then it would be difficult to point out what connection such a religion had with the welfare of a country. It would, in that case, resemble the ivy, which, though it add a picturesque effect to a venerable fabric, imparts neither stability to its walls, nor convenience to its apartments. But if religion be indeed a principle of the heart, an element of the character, the habit of thinking, feeling, and acting aright in all our social relations, the basis of every virtue, and the main prop of every excellence, if it be indeed the fear of the Lord by which men depart from evil, if it be faith working by love, if it be such a belief in the gospel of Christ as leads to a conformity to His example, religion being such as this must secure the welfare of any country. There is not one single influence, whether of law, of science, of art, of learning, tending to the well-being of society, which true religion does not guard and strengthen.

—James.

(4165.) Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labour to subvert those pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

—Washington: Farewell address to the people of the United States.

(4166.) Human society reposes on religion. Civilisation without it would be like the lights that play in the northern sky—a momentary flash on the face of darkness ere it again settled into eternal night. Wit and wisdom, sublime poetry and lofty philosophy, cannot save a nation, else ancient Greece had never perished. Valour, law, ambition, cannot preserve a people, else Rome had still been mistress of the world. The nation that loses faith in God and man loses not only its most precious jewel, but its most unifying and conserving force; has before it a

"Stygian cave forlorn

Where brooding darkness spreads his jealous wings,
And the night raven sings."—A. M. Fairbairn.

V. ITS DIFFICULTIES.

1. Are often exaggerated.

(4167.) How common it is for men first to throw dirt in the face of religion, and then persuade themselves it is its natural complexion! They represent it to themselves in a shape least pleasing to them, and then bring that as a plea why they give it no better entertainment. —Stillingfleet, 1633–1699.

2. Yet they are not to be concealed.

(4168.) It is not to taste sweet things, but to do noble and true things, and vindicate himself under God's heaven as a God-made man, that the poorest son of Adam dimly longs. Show him the way of doing that, the dulllest day-drudge kindles into a hero. They wrong man greatly who say he is to be seduced by ease. Difficulty, abnegation, martyrdom, death, are the allurements that act on the heart of man. Kindle the inner genial life of him, you have a flame that burns up all lower considerations. Not happiness, but something higher: one sees this even in the frivolous classes, with their "point of honour" and the like. Not by flattering our appetites; no: by awakening the heroic that slumbers in every heart, can any religion gain followers. —Carlyle.

3. Neither are they to be made unduly prominent.

(4169.) It is wrong to exhibit chiefly, as we are in danger of doing, the negative side of religion, its refusals, its limitations, its pains, its healing processes. Suppose that in attempting to set forth the delights of learning, one should represent the dog-eared spelling-book, a boy stewing in stupefactions, and all the unwelcome tasks and perplexities which are concomitant to an education. These things are no part of the representation of the joy of literature, though it is through them that one must come to it if he experiences it. Suppose that in descanting upon the joys of health, one should set forth all the stages through which he has gone from sickness up to health, describing the sickroom, the disgusting potions, the nursing, the ten thousand things that weary and harass the convalescent? These are not concomitants of health, though they may be necessary to the process of procuring it. Now there are many things in religion that stand connected with the process of education and of healing, which make it necessary for us to bear the cross, to deny ourselves, to suffer more or less pain; but these things belong to the negative side, and it is wrong to put that side in such prominence that men of the world shall take their idea of religion from these instrumental processes. There is also a positive side to religion. There is joy connected with it; joy in God; joy in trust and hope; joy in conscience; joy in love; joy in the Providence which overrules and watches all men's interests; joy in redemption; joy in the Holy Spirit; joy in the anticipation of heaven; joy on every side. These belong to every real Christian in a greater or less measure; and it is the side of religion to which they belong that ought to be exhibited. You do not think it needful to bring all the dross that is in the gold from California to exhibit it. You think it is enough to bring the gold and exhibit that. And it is not needful that you should exhibit all the dross of experience, and make it equal to the real experience of Christian life. The point where the soul catches the light of heaven; the point where the Holy Ghost, resting on the affections, kindles them into responsiveness to God—that is the point where the world should begin to see religion.

—Becher.

4. They are not exceptional.

(4170.) Is religion difficult? and what is not so, that is good for anything? Is not the law a difficult and crabbed study? Does it not require great labour and perpetual drudging to excel in any kind of knowledge, to be master of any art or profession? In a word, is there anything in the world worthy the having that is to be gotten without pains? And is eternal life and glory the only slight and inconsiderable thing that is not worth our care and industry? —Tillotson, 1630-1694.

5. They are transient.

(4171.) An heifer that is not used to the yoke struggles; the yoke pincheth the neck, but after a while she carries it more gently. A new suit, though never so well fitted to a man's body, is not so easy the first day as after it is worn awhile. Two millstones, after they be made fit, do not grind so well at the first as afterwards. As we see it is with a man when he goes to bathe himself in the midst of summer, there is a trembling of his body when he first puts into the water, but after he hath drenched himself all over he is not sensible of any cold at all. So the way of religion is irksome at the first, but after, it gives great comfort and contentment; it is called a yoke, grave cum tollis, &c. (grievous when a man takes it up, but, after it is borne awhile, both easy and light). It is a straight way, yet try it; put into it, however: do but patiently bear the difficulty of the entrance, and then thy feet shall not be straitened; thou shalt find more and more enlargement, each day will bring more comfort than the other.

—Shute, 1643.

6. How they are to be overcome.

(4172.) "Drink deep, or taste not," is a direction fully as applicable to religion, if we would find it a source of pleasure, as it is to knowledge. A little religion is, it must be confessed, apt to make men gloomy, as a little knowledge is to render them vain: hence the unjust imputation often brought upon religion by those whose degree of religion is just sufficient, by condemning their course of conduct, to render them uneasy; enough merely to impair the sweetness of the pleasures of sin, and not enough to compensate for the relinquishment of them by its own peculiar comforts. Thus then men bring up, as it were, an ill report of that land of promise, which, in truth, abounds with whatever, in our journey through life, can best refresh and strengthen us.

—Wilberforce, 1759-1833.

(4173.) God's commands "are not grievous" to those in whose hearts His love is shed abroad. Their actions correspond with inward principles and dispositions; these render them pleasant and delightful. The religion of Jesus will always be a yoke; but His people find it to be an easy one, like the yoke of marriage to that happy pair who daily bless God for the bondage. It is a burden, but always light, because of His grace and love: the burden of a pair of wings to a bird, which gives buoyancy, ascension, and the expanse of the skies.

—Jay, 1769-1853.

VI. ITS PLEASANTNESS.

(4174.) Religion is not the prophet's roll, sweet as honey when it was in his mouth, but as bitter as gall in his belly. Religion is no sullen Stoicism, no sour Pharisaism: it does not consist in a few melancholy passions, in some dejected looks or depressions of mind; but it consists in freedom, love, peace, life, and power; the more it comes to be digested into our lives, the more sweet and lovely we shall find it to be. Those spots and wrinkles which corrupted minds think they see in the face of religion, are indeed nowhere else but in their own deformed and misshapen apprehensions. It is no wonder when a defiled fancy comes to be the glass if you have an unlovely reflection.

—John Smith, 1618-1652.

(4175.) Outward things and forms, like glow-worms, may be glistening, but they are not warming; it is the power of religion, like the sun, that brings refreshing light and enlivening heat along with it. "The wicked is snared in his wickedness, but the righteous sing and rejoice." —Swinmuck, 1673.

(4176.) Who are they that say that religion is gloomy? Infidels, profane men. But why should I listen to their testimony about religion? I am not in the habit of listening to the testimony of blind men about the beauties of colour; I am not in the habit of listening to the testimony of deaf men upon the harmonies of sound and the variations of melody; and if I do not listen to blind men about colour, or to deaf men about sounds, why should I listen to infidel men about religion? They never tested it; they never experimented the matter.

—Beaumont.

VII. HOW THE WORLD JUDGES OF IT.

(4177.) While you are talking about distributing Bibles, really, in men's esteem, you are Bibles yourselves, walking through the streets and in places of business. Do not you know that hundreds of men judge of the truth or falsity of religion by what you are and what you do? Do not you know that men are wont to say, "Oh, the preacher drones and drones about virtue, but just see how his Church lives. As I understand it, virtues are things that are to be looked for in the life. The doctrine that a man preaches is to be judged of by what his people are?" Do not men often make such remarks as this: "Do you go and tell your minister that when he makes A, B, and C, honest men, I will attend to his message?" Do not men say, "Ah! I understand what your religion is; for I have had dealings with one of your members"? You understand what his failings are in the hour of temptation; for there is a great want of charitableness toward bad Christian men, or imperfect Christian men—if those two words may go together. But is it not by living Christians, after all, that the world judges of the Bible and its doctrines?

Give me the men, and I will write a commentary on the Bible that will not need any explanation—for most commentaries are more troublesome than the Bible which they are designed to explain. I will put them, not in the sanctuary on the Sabbath, but at home, in the street, in their neighbourhood, in all the intricacies of business, everywhere; and no matter where they may be, they shall be a savour of Christ, sweet as the odour of blossoms. They shall be garden-men that have some flowers for every month, and that are always fragrant and redolent of blossom and fruit. Give me a hundred such men, and I will defy the infidel world. I will take them and bind them into a living volume, and with them I will make the world believe. It only takes about one man in a hundred years to make the world believe. After a long age of religious corruption, and hollow-heartedness, and outside observance, and sprawling before God, and filling the empty air with empty words, and neglecting the weightier matters of the law, there comes a man like Luther—when all the corruptions of the Church are forgotten, and men, looking on him say, "There is truth in religion, after all." One Luther is enough to qualify a hundred years' growth of infidels and hypocrites. Now give me a hundred men—not men that are glowing while they sing and heavenly while they pray, though I would have them so; but men that are, morning and noon and night, born of God, and that so carry the savour of Christ that men coming into their presence say, "There is a Christian here," as men passing a vintage say, "There are grapes here." Give me a hundred such men, and I will make the world believe. I do not ask to be shown the grape-vine in the woods in June before I will believe it is there. I know that there are grapes near when the air is full of their odour; and the question under such circumstances always is, "Where is the vine?" and never, "What is it that I smell?" You are to be a savour of love, and peace, and gentleness, and gratitude, and thanksgiving, so that wherever you go, the essence of the truth that is in you shall go out to men.

—Beecher.

VIII. ITS RELATION TO OUR DAILY LIFE.

1. It is to pervade and glorify our whole life.

(4178.) If you would speak with a tradesman, you may meet him in his shop; the farmer's usual walk is in the fields; he that has business with the merchant expects him in his counting-house or amongst his goods; and he that looks for the Christian shall not fail to find him with his God. Whether he be alone or in company, abroad or in his family, buying or selling, feeding himself or visiting others, he does all as in God's presence, and in all aims at His praise. As the sap of a tree rises up from the root, not only to the body, but also to the branches and smallest twigs; so grace in a saint springs up from his heart, and flows out, not only in his spiritual and higher, but also in his civil and lower actions. —Swinmock, 1673.

(4179.) We are not to conceive so of religion, as having to shun the familiar ways of men, as like some flowers flourishing best in the shade, or as being, at least in its finer and more ethereal parts, like a corpse long dead that crumbles into dust when exposed to air; but we are to think of her as the mistress and mother of all things natural and fair and wholesome; as the friend and benefactor of every human faculty and every worldly work; as able to descend to the lowest state and cheer the saddest; as the sun of the soul, first gilding the mountain-heights of reason and conscience, but "shining more and more" until the whole surface of our life reflects its light, and the most humble and hidden places receive and rejoice in its enlivening rays.

—Morris.

(4180.) Religion is not a thing which it is possible to put off and put on like a Sunday dress. There are certain organs of your body to which you can allow repose, and if they are out of order you may afford to do without them for a season. But there are other organs which do not cease to move and work from the first moment to the last moment of your existence. If these are diseased, impaired, or weary, they must work on, all out of order as they are, or you die. You cannot give a week's, a day's, a moment's rest to your heart or your lungs. The same thing may be said of your religion. It should be the very essence of your whole life,—the spring of all your emotions,—the ceaseless source of all your conduct; if it be not this, you have most certainly been confounding something else with it. You cannot take up and put down, take off and put on, your religion. If you think you are doing so, believe me that as yet it is not a religion, but a web of delusions. —Reynolds.

(4181.) There are a good many pious people who are as careful of their religion as of their best service of china, only using it on holy occasions for fear it should get chipped or flawed in working-day wear.

—Douglas Jerrold.

(4182.) What is religion but a habit? and what is a habit but a state of mind which is always upon us, as a sort of ordinary dress or inseparable garment of the soul. A man cannot really be religious one hour and not religious the next. We might as well say he could be in a state of good health one hour, and in bad health the next. A man who is religious, is religious morning, noon, and night; his religion is a certain character, a mould in which his thoughts, words, and actions are cast, all forming parts of one and the same whole.

—Newman.

(4183.) True Christianity is not a nun, to be locked up within cloistered walls; but she is a wife, a mother, the nearest and the dearest in all the walks and vocations of this present life. She is not to be your light only upon Sundays; she is also to be your guide upon week days.

—Cumming.

(4184.) Suppose I should urge a man to live an honest life, and he should say, "I am going to set apart from my daily duties an hour in which to be honest." Many persons think of piety in the same way that we might suppose such a man would think of honesty. They regard it as something separated from ordinary life, and to be attended to at intervals. They have an idea that it is something which is lived particularly in the closet. Now it is proper that there should be special hours set apart for devotion; but, after all, a life of piety, like a life of patriotism, or a life of honesty, is connected with, and a part of, common life.

—Becher.

(4185.) Men think religion bears the same relation to life that flowers do to trees. The tree must grow through a long period before the blossoming time: so they think religion is to be a blossom just before death, to secure heaven. But the Bible represents religion, not as the latest fruit of life, but as the whole of it—beginning, middle, and end. It is simply right living.

—Becher.

(4186.) Religion is the Bread of Life. I wish we better appreciated the force of this expression. I remember what bread was to me when I was a boy. I could not wait till I was dressed in the morning, but ran and cut a slice from the loaf—all the way round, too, to keep me until breakfast; and at breakfast, if diligence in eating earned wages, I should have been well paid. And then I could not wait for dinner, but ate again, and then at dinner; and I had to eat again before tea, and at tea; and lucky if I didn't eat again after that. It was bread, bread all the time with me, bread that I lived on and got strength from. Just so religion is the bread of life; but you make it cake—you put it away in your cupboard and never use it but when you have company. You cut it into small pieces and put it on china plates, and pass it daintily round instead of treating it as bread; common, hearty bread, to be used every hour.

—Becher.

(4187.) Religion should not be used as caulking, something to stuff into the cracks and crevices of a man's life; but it should be regarded and used as the very warp and woof of life.

—Becher.

2. Yet it is not to engross all our thoughts.

(4188.) "Whatsoever you do, in word or in deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ." But you naturally say, "We shall find next week that we shall be so overwhelmed with the pressure of business, we shall be so busy from early morning to late at night that we can scarcely get time to think about religion." I do not prescribe that when you are making an article of commerce, or summing up your accounts, or prescribing as a physician, or drawing up a case as a solicitor, or pleading at the bar as a barrister, at every moment, and at every step, and continually, you are to feel a sense of God's presence. That cannot be. You are so absorbed, as common sense shows, doing the thing that is given you, that you cannot have the thought of God and religion like a continuous presence. But, nevertheless, you may be doing all to the Lord, and doing it wholly for Him.

For instance, a father goes into a distant land to toil because he cannot get bread for his family at home. He labours in that land: he is busy, perhaps, sowing or ploughing for twelve hours together. He thinks of nothing but of the furrows, the seeds, or the plough, or the harrow, and all the demands of agriculture. But, nevertheless, the reason for his being there, the motive power of his being there, is to find bread for his family. So you may be busy all day in traffic, in commerce, in business, in trade. You may not, from six o'clock in the morning till six o'clock at night, have the thoughts of religion, because you are utterly absorbed in the business that is before you. But the reason of your doing that business, when you look back, and the reason why you are engaged in that business, when you look forward, is that you may do God's will in that sphere, place, and province in which His providence has placed you; and while fervent in spirit and diligent in business you are serving the Lord Jesus Christ.

Or, to take another illustration, a minister of Christ may be anxious to find out the meaning of a Greek or Hebrew word. If you call upon him, he is searching two or three hours in different writers to ascertain the derivation and application of this word. For at least half a dozen hours that minister may have been preparing his sermon, and yet he has been so busy in searching out that word, its derivation, its application, its usages, that he has had no time or spare thought to think of anything but of this one Hebrew or Greek word, and all its applications. Nevertheless, the reason why he makes the search, and his joy when he has concluded the search, arises ultimately from his desire to win souls, and to spread the kingdom of Christ. So with you; you may be in the world, whatever your situation or employment may be in that world, serving Christ, whilst you are utterly absorbed for the hour or two in the business that is before you. And if you were not to attend to that business with all your energy, you would soon lose your business, and the opportunities of doing service to Christ's cause, or good to mankind.

—Cumming.

(4189.) To have God and the things of eternity consciously always in mind is impossible. There is no provision, either in nature or grace, for such a state of things. But to have Him in our hearts, as the governing power of our lives, and to carry our love for Him, consciously and unconsciously, as a mother carries the love of her first-born child, is what is our privilege and our duty to do, and our only safety. The mother thinks of ten thousand things which, for the time, must crowd her babe out of her mind; but never does she get free of the influence that her love for him has over her. We must make these natural loves our teachers of how we are to be filled with the love of God.

—Beecher.

(4190.) Men who were to treat their social affections as we treat our religious ones would be regarded as fools—and with reason. While we are busy with the pressing affairs of life, we cannot feel the glow of religious affection—nor is it expected. If, when the pauses of business come (not when we pause from exhaustion, but in the leisure hours), our soul gladly returns unto its love; or if, when in the hurry of work and trade, a question of principle comes up, our thoughts glance quickly Godward, and we decide as in His presence, we need not fear that we are in a cold, backslidden state, though we be, indeed, very diligent in business. To have the fear of the Lord always before one, it is not necessary that one should be always directly thinking of Him, or of spiritual things. This is impossible in those pauses of daily life, where it is our duty to concentrate thought upon secular concerns. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon" has been perverted to mean that it was unchristian for a man ever to give his whole attention to money-making.

Now the whole attention of a man must be given to study during study hours, or he will never make a scholar; and it must be equally given to business during business hours, or he will never succeed in the proper support of his family or the gospel. When the work and the strain is over, then the soul of the Christian will consciously rejoice in the Lord.

What if I, on awaking, were to say—"Now I will love my family with all my heart—nothing shall, this day, interfere with my love for them," and were then to go into a furious fervour about it, embracing and kissing them, and declaring my affection for them. I might try to work, with my mind so hotly fixed on them, but I could not do it. I should soon say—"I can't hunt up these texts, I can't write these sermons; they require my whole attention, and that is not justice to my wife and children; they turn away my thoughts and affections from my family—I will no longer try to work at them." I then impatiently toss books and papers aside, and devoting myself to the declarative form of love for my family, forget all else. How much good shall I do them under such circumstances? The true way to prove my love for them is, to devote myself steadily to some way of supporting them. Then, at the season of relaxation from work, I shall be sure to enjoy them and their love. Just so in spiritual matters; for the family is the best teacher of theology.

—Beecher.

3. It is to be exemplified and perfected in daily life.

(4191.) The Christian must express the power of holiness in his particular calling and worldly employments that therein he is conversant with. Holiness must be writ upon those as well as on his religious duties. He that observes the law of building is as exact in making a kitchen as in making a parlour: so, by the law of Christianity, we must be as exact in our worldly business as in duties of worship. "Be ye holy in all manner of conversation" (1 Pet. i. 15). We must not leave our religion, as some do their Bibles, at church.

The Christian is not to buy and sell as a mere man, but as a Christian man. Religion is not like that statesman's gown, which, when he went to recreate himself, he would throw off and say, "There lie, Lord Treasurer, awhile."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4192.) Some men's religion is like the electric jar, condensed and charged with electricity. On a Sunday it sparkles in its way, and every one says, "How religious such a one is!" But when we see the same man in the world, we find that his religion is like the same jar discharged, useless, cold.

—Cumming.

(4193.) A man is made a Christian that he may Christianise. A candle is lighted just that it may be luminous. We receive just that we may give. The monk, the nun, the anchorite, if lighted at all, which is questionable, goes each into a convent or nunnery, and thus hides his light under a bushel. The Christian, who is lighted, goes forth into the world, and lets his light so shine in daily life, that others seeing his good works may glorify, not him, but his Father who is in heaven. The believer is to be a light, and the light of all the world. And the world shone upon by such light, will cease to be a mere workshop in which man gains his bread, and will rise to the dignity of a porch and a vestibule of heaven, in which he is educated for God and glory.

If we be lights, and if Christians we are so, we are not responsible for the elevation at which we are placed. We are each a light, but God gives the candlestick; in one it may be a very high one, in another it may be a very low one; what we are responsible for is not the place where God in His providence has set us, or the elevation at which God in His wisdom has placed us, but for filling the sphere which we hold with the light we are.

—Cumming.

(4194.) We are to employ the world, and put our bodies into it, with the understanding that God has made all secular things as means of grace to us.

I would like to know what use there is in a man's learning navigation from books if he is never allowed to steer a ship. The ship is the place for him to practise the theories he gets in books. What is the use of what a man learns from lectures on organic chemistry and agriculture if he is never allowed to plough a furrow or cultivate a crop? The field is the place for him to practise the knowledge he has acquired in the laboratory. Of what advantage would be the drilling received by the cadet in a military academy if he was never to command a force, was never to lay down a camp, and was never to open a campaign? The campaign is the place for him to put into practice the things he has learned in the rooms of the academy.

God designed the sanctuary, the lecture-room, and the Bible as the places where we are to learn what we are to do and to be, and the world as the place where we are to do it and to be it. You are not to practise patience here—except the patience of sitting still during preaching. The world is the place God has provided in which you are to practise patience, where there are things to vex and try your patience. It is well enough to preach about patience, and pride, and vanity; but here is not the place for you to apply the precepts taught you concerning these things. You can never practise them till you go out into life; where your vanity is exoriated, your pride is touched, and your patience is taxed. The voice of God says, "Let patience have her perfect work;" but nowhere except in the world, where it is assailed on every hand, can patience have her perfect work. —Beecher.

4. The trials and temptations of life may be made helpful to it.

(4195.) We cannot become strong in Christian virtues without being exposed to the temptations and trials of life.

If you want to make a child strong and self-dependent, you push him out into the world to breast its storms; and when he comes back whimpering, and well-nigh discouraged, the father, the mother, the brothers, and the sisters all cry out, "For shame! for shame!" and he is sent forth again to meet the hardships that he dreads. And you ought to treat yourselves, in spiritual things, precisely as you treat your children in worldly things.

Your store, your office, your shop, your family, your neighbourhood, the street—these are not so many things that you must resist for the sake of grace; on the contrary, you must deal with them as the means of grace. I tell you that although there is great blessing in a prayer-meeting, no prayer-meeting on earth is such a means of grace as a man's own store. What do you talk about in prayer-meetings? About the theory of Christian life. The substance of it you must attain in your contact with the world. You come to the prayer-meeting on Friday night, and say, "My mind is obscured. I do not get that peace which I wish;" or something of that sort. It is all general. You go out into the world, and Satan says to you, "Be proud." Your minister says to you, "Be humble." You stand between God and the devil continually. One says, "Be meek;" the other says, "Be haughty." One says, "Forgive;" the other says, "Punish." One says, "Lift up;" the other says, "Sink down." Everywhere, and from morning till night, you have a prepared state of circumstances in which is arising, for evermore, for your adjudication, a question between right and wrong, purity and impurity, holiness and sin. Life itself is God's ordinance, and the world is God's cathedral, and affairs are God's ordained priests, and you are the members of God's great Church; and if you do not grow in grace in secular drill, you will not any way!

—Beecher.

5. It is not to be divorced from business.

(4196.) The stream of life forks; and religion is apt to run in one channel, and business in another.

—Beecher.

(4197.) Religion is the holiness of right action; and you are religious just in the proportion that you work up every part of your life into the one presiding practice of loving God and loving man. There is no such thing as making religion religion, and business business; there is no such thing as a man's being a holy man in the sanctuary and a cheating man in the store; there is no such thing as a man's being a pure spiritual man in the church, and a tricking politician in the caucus. If you are an impure man in the store, you are an impure man in the sanctuary. If you are without principle in the caucus, you are without principle in the church.

When you get an apple that is half rotten, the other half being as good as though the whole were sound, then you can get a Christian that is rotten on one side, who is as good on the other side as if both sides were good.

—Beecher.

(4198.) The tides come twice a-day in New York harbour, but they only come once in seven days in God's harbour of the sanctuary. They rise on Sunday, but ebb on Monday, and are down and out all the rest of the week. Men write over their store door "Business is business," and over the church door "Religion is religion;" and they say to religion, "Never come in here," and to business, "Never go in there." "Let us have no secular things in the pulpit," they say; "we get enough of them through the week in New York. There all is stringent and biting selfishness, and knives, and probes, and lancets, and hurry, and work, and worry. Here we want repose, and sedatives, and healing balm. All is prose over there; here let us have poetry. We want to sing hymns and to hear about heaven and Calvary; in short, we want the pure gospel, without any worldly intermixture." And so they desire to spend a pious, quiet Sabbath, full of pleasant imaginings and peaceful reflections; but when the day is gone, all is laid aside. They will take by the throat the first debtor whom they meet, and exclaim, "Pay me what thou owest! It is Monday." And when the minister ventures to hint to them something about their duty to their fellowmen, they say, "Oh, you stick to your preaching. You do not know how to collect your own debts, and cannot tell what a man may have to do in his intercourse with the world." God's law is not allowed to go into the week. If the merchant spies it in his store, he throws it over the counter. If the clerk sees it in the bank, he kicks it out at the door. If it is found in the street, the multitude pursue it, pelting it with stones, as if it were a wolf escaped from a menagerie, and shouting, "Back with you! You have got out of Sunday!" There is no religion in all this. It is mere sentimentalism. Religion belongs to every day; to the place of business as much as to the church.

High in an ancient belfry there is a clock, and once a-week the old sexton winds it up; but it has neither dial-plate nor hands. The pendulum swings, and there it goes, ticking, ticking, day in and day out, unnoticed and useless. What the old clock is, in its dark chamber, keeping time to itself, but never showing it, that is the mere sentimentality of religion, high above life, in the region of airy thought; perched up in the top of Sunday, but without dial or pointer to let the week know what o'clock it is, of 1 time, or of Eternity! —Beecher.

6. Is not incompatible with business.

(4199.) There are some who tell us that business and religion are two things that cannot be done together; that men cannot give their mind to the one without taking it from the other. And so, just as the Mohammedan leaves his slippers at the door of the mosque, they leave their religion outside their place of business, and do not take it with them into the office or behind the counter. With many it is simply a matter of periodical recurrence; an intermittent fountain that flows one day in seven, and, as the Lord's day ends, sinks and disappears. Or, perhaps, it is a matter for early morning, before the business of the day begins; and for the evening, when that business is over; but not for the time of business.

Had Daniel no press of business on his hands? Were the affairs of the vast Persian Empire a small matter? Were the accounts of a hundred and twenty provinces few or simple? Was it an easy task to overlook, and check, and control them, as was Daniel's daily business? and this, too, with men for his associates at the council-board who were bent on hindering and not on helping him, and with the head of every province his jealous, watchful enemy? Yet Daniel, in the midst of all this mass of important and difficult work, found time for daily prayer; and not only at evening and in the morning did he pray to his God, but at midday he got away from his press of work to give thanks to Him and seek the continuance of His help. If, then, Daniel, on whose shoulders the chief weight of the business of an empire rested, could be truly religious, any man can be so too; and business and religion are not incompatible.

—Champerns.

7. Its function is to sanctify and ennoble business.

(4200.) Piety does not retreat from business, but it seizes business, sanctifies it, and makes it sacred. The gospel of Jesus is not to be a voice crying in the desert, like that of John the Baptist; but if I understand religion, it is to open a shop, it is to freight ships, it is to keep accounts, it is to write up your ledgers, it is to wear an apron till it be as holy as a bishop's sleeve, and to wield a spade as responsibly and devoutly as a monarch sways a sceptre. The true characteristic of religion is to go down into everything, rise up to the highest, till, like the atmosphere, it embraces all in its beneficent and its beautiful folds.

—Cumming.

(4201.) The Christian is not to be a worse tradesman because of his religion, but a better; he is not to be a less-skilled mechanic, but he is to be all the more careful in his work. It were a pity indeed if Paul's tents were the worst in the store, and Lydia's purple of the poorest dye.

—Spurgeon.

(4202.) It is well known that Havelock's endeavours, when a lieutenant in the 13th regiment, to promote the social and spiritual welfare of the men under his care, brought down upon him showers of ridicule, and that he was jeered at for his "enthusiasm." But it was admitted on all hands that no soldiers were more orderly or steady, or more ready for duty than his. "This," says his biographer, "was singularly exemplified on one occasion. A sudden attack was made on an outpost at night, and Sir Archibald Campbell ordered up some men of another corps to support it. But they had been drinking to excess, and were not prepared. 'Then call out Havelock's saints,' he exclaimed; 'they are always sober, and can be depended on, and Havelock himself is always ready!'" The 'saints' got under arms with promptitude, and the enemy were at once repulsed." At a later period, and after he had joined the Baptist denomination, his religious meetings among the men excited both ridicule and enmity among his brother officers. A feeling of opposition to him grew up in his regiment; and when it was reported that one of the "saints" had been found drunk, it was readily made a theme for bitter jest against him. Havelock was ill at the time, but on his recovery he requested an investigation of the case, when it was discovered that there were two men of the same name in different companies, and that the man who was intoxicated neither belonged to his company, nor assembled with his congregation. Havelock was of course gratified and his enemies silenced by this discovery, but still more so by the words of the Colonel, afterwards Sir Robert Sale: "I know nothing about Baptists, but I know I wish the whole regiment were Baptists; for their names are never in the defaulters' roll, and they are never in the lock-up house." Such a testimony was worth winning, nor is it to be wondered at, if such were the results of his religious teaching combined with a strict attention to duty and discipline among his men, that even "worldly men tolerated the saint in their admiration of the soldier."

IX. IS OF UNIVERSAL OBLIGATION.

(4203.) Every man is bound to perform the duties which religion requires, and one man as much as another. Many men seem to feel that the obligations of religion are the result of a voluntary covenant, compact, or promise, like a contract for carrying the mail, or for excavating so many miles of a canal. They seem to suppose that there is nothing lying back of a profession of religion to oblige any one to attend to its duties, any more than there is to bind a man to enlist as a soldier, or to enter into a contract for building a bridge. When a profession of religion has been made, they admit it to be binding. They are disposed to hold professors to the most rigid fulfilment of the conditions of that profession; and they resolve that if they themselves ever enter into such a covenant with God, they will be as faithful to that compact as they are to others. Now, Christians do not object to being held to the most faithful performance of the duties of religion, growing out of the voluntary covenant which they have made with God. They believe that God Himself will hold them to it, and that a profession of religion, viewed in this aspect, and in all others, is a most serious matter. But it is not the profession of religion which creates the obligation, for that existed before any such profession was made. The profession of religion only recognises the obligation. To make such a profession is not like making a contract to build a house or to perform the duty of a day-labourer; it pertains to acts similar to the duty which a child owes to a parent, or a man to his country, or which we all owe to the poor and the oppressed. With, or without a covenant, we are bound to the performance of those duties; and though there are advantages in such a voluntary covenant and pledge, as there were in these "times that tried men's souls" in the American revolution, when our fathers pledged to their country "their lives and their fortune," yet the obligation to those duties is not originated by the covenant, but exists whether any such compact has been entered into or not. The worship of God, repentance, faith in the Redeemer, a life of piety, the grateful acknowledgment of mercies,—can any plead exemption from these duties?

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

X. ITS GROWTH IN THE SOUL.

1. Its feeble beginnings are not to be despised.

(4204.) They lead on to great and glorious attainments. The traveller who has just been journeying amidst the gloom of midnight despises not the little luminous streak above the eastern hills, for he knows that it is the glimmering token of advancing day. The husbandman who has sown the precious grain despises not the downy verdure which first appears just above the clods, for in that he sees the future harvest which is to repay his toil. The mother despises not the helpless babe to which she has given birth, for in that feeble and unconscious child she knows there are the germs of fancy, reason, will, and multiform affections, which shall grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength, and which, by the fruits of their maturity, may bless and astonish the world. So it is in religion; little things advance to great ones. Baxter and Owen, and Howe, and Doddridge were once babes in Christ, and so, indeed, were Paul, and Peter, and John. When the conversion of a sinner takes place, no mind but that which grasps eternity, can foresee the career of usefulness and holiness which a convert may have to run. In every case of real conversion, there will be a progress from a sinner to a penitent; from a penitent to a believer; from a believer to a saint; from a saint to a seraph. He shall "add to his faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity." The first dawn of spiritual knowledge in the understanding is the kindling of a holy luminary which shall receive, and reflect, as a satellite, the splendour of the fountain light, infinite ages after the sun is quenched in darkness. The first tasting that the Lord is gracious, is the incipient operation of a capacity for bliss, which shall continue to receive ineffable delight, when all the sources of sensual gratification shall have perished for ever. In the train of even weak grace, if it be real, shall follow all the more mature virtues of Christianity; all that the Father hath prepared for them that love Him; all that the Son hath procured by the agonies of the cross; all the mercies of the covenant of redemption; all the riches of grace; all the exceeding and eternal weight of glory; in short, blessings, infinite and eternal. Let not the commencement of religion, therefore, be treated with neglect.

—James.

2. The means by which it is fostered are on no account to be neglected.

(4205.) Were it not strangely absurd and unhand-some to say, I cannot wait on God, because I must speak with a friend; I cannot go to church, although God calleth me thither, because I must haste to market; I cannot stand to pray because I am to receive money, or to make up a bargain; I cannot discharge my duty to God, because a greater obligation than that doth lie upon me? How inconceivable an honour, how invaluable a benefit is it, that the incomprehensibly great and glorious Majesty of heaven doth vouchsafe us the liberty to approach so near unto Him, to converse so freely with Him, to demand and derive from His hand the supply of all our needs and satisfaction of all our reasonable desires! and is it then just or seemly, by such comparisons to disparage His favour, by such pretences to baffle with His goodness?

Put the case: our prince should call for us to speak with him about matters nearly touching his service and our welfare; would it be according unto duty, discretion, or decency, to reply that we are at present busy and have no leisure, and must therefore hold ourselves excused; but that, if he will stay awhile, at another time, when we have less to do we shall be perhaps disposed to wait upon him? The case is propounded by our Lord in that parable wherein God is represented as a great man that had hitherto prepared a feast and invited many guests thereto; but they excused themselves: One said that he had purchased land, and must needs go out to see it; another had bought five yoke of oxen, and must go to prove them; another had married a wife, and therefore could not come. These indeed were affairs considerable as this world hath any; but yet the excuses did not satisfy; for, notwithstanding, the great person was angry, and took the neglect in huge disdain.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

REPENTANCE.

L ITS NATURE.

(4206.) Repentance is a true returning unto God; whereby men, forsaking utterly their idolatry and wickedness, do with a lively faith embrace, love, and worship the true, living God only, and give themselves to all manner of good works, which by God's Word they know to be acceptable unto Him. Now there be four parts of repentance (contrition, confession, faith, amendment of life), which, being set together, may be likened to an easy and short ladder, whereby we may climb from the bottomless pit of perdition up into the castle or tower of eternal and endless salvation.

—Homilies of the English Church.

(4207.) None know what repentance is but a repentant sinner. All the books in the world cannot inform the heart what sin is or what sorrow is. A sick man knows what a disease is better than all physicians, for he feels it.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4208.) Repentance is a simple operation of the mind understood by all persons, and in some form practised by all. You cannot find a person who at some time has not exercised repentance. You cannot find a child who needs to be told what is meant by being required to repent when he has done a wrong thing; and in the emotions of a child, when he feels sorry that he has done wrong, and who resolves to make confession of it and to do so no more, you have the elements of all that God requires of man as a condition of salvation.

You have broken the commands of a father. His law was plain, his will was clear. When the deed is performed, you reflect on what you have done. You see that his commands were right; that you have done wrong by breaking his law; and have incurred his just displeasure. He has always treated you kindly; his commands have never been unreasonable; and you cannot justify yourself in what you have done. You see that you have done wrong. By a law of your nature you feel pain or distress that you did the wrong. You resolve that you will go and confess it, and that you will do so no more. This is repentance; and this is the whole of it.

You have a friend. He has a thousand times and in a thousand ways laid you under obligation. He has helped you in pecuniary distress, shared your losses; attended you in sickness; defended your reputation when attacked. He himself, in turn, suffers. Wicked men blacken and defame his character, and a cloud rolls upon him and overwhelms him. In an evil hour your mind is poisoned, and you forget all that he has done for you, and you join in the prevalent suspicion and error in regard to him, and give increased currency to the slanderous reports. Subsequently you reflect that it was all wrong; that you acted an ungrateful part; that you suffered your mind to be too easily influenced to forget your benefactor, and that you have done him great and lasting injury. You are pained at the heart. You resolve that you will go to him and make confession, and that you will implore forgiveness, and that you will endeavour as far as possible to undo the evil. This is repentance; and this is all. Let these simple elements be transferred to God and to religion, and you have all that is included in repentance.

—Barnes, 1798–1870.

(4209.) It is so important that you should rightly understand the nature of repentance that I must tell you of one more fact which seems to illustrate it. It is a part of the history of a good and faithful old servant, who told it to me himself. I will repeat it to you in the shortest and simplest way I can.

Said he: "When I was about sixteen years old, I had one of the kindest and best masters that ever lived. I was his dining-room servant, and attended to all his personal wants. One day, in the hot month of August, my master returned from a ride on the farm, very sick. He called me to help him from his horse, and told me I must put him to bed, and go for the physician. In a few days, my master grew worse, and the family began to be very uneasy about him. I loved my master, and stayed constantly in his room. One morning he turned to me, and said, 'George, I am very sick, I wish you would take that note on the table, and go off to the apothecary's in the village, and bring the medicines the physician has written for.' As I was about going, there were other commissions given me; some from my mistress, some from the young ladies, and some from the servants. In attending to all these, I by some means or other lost the note for the medicine. I was greatly troubled about it, and looked for it a long time. But I was obliged to come back without the medicine. As I was on the way home, I said to myself, 'What shall I tell my master? What excuse shall I give? To tell him that I have lost the note will make him think that I am very careless.' So I determined to say to him that there was no medicine of that kind to be had in the village. When I reached home," said George, "I went into my master's chamber. He turned his eyes toward me, and said in a kind tone, 'Well, George, I am glad you have come; I hope you have brought the medicine.' 'No, sir,' said I, 'the medicine is not to be had in the village. The apothecary said he had none of that kind.' 'I am sorry for it,' said my master, 'the want of that medicine may be the means of laying me in my grave.' That night my master's fever increased. The next morning the physician was sent for again. He gave other medicines. But they did not answer the purpose. It was too late. My master was certainly getting worse. I stood by his bedside," said George, "and watched his pale face, and the big drops of sweat that stood on his brow, and heard his short breathing as he was sinking rapidly into the arms of death. Then I began to see and feel the wickedness of the falsehood I had told him. I shall never forget one scene in my master's dying hour. Once he turned his eyes on me, and said, 'George, be a good boy. Be faithful and affectionate to your mistress, and when I am buried in the earth do not forget me.' My heart felt then as if it would burst with grief. I said to myself, 'I am the cause of my master's death. Had I told the truth, and taken back another note for the medicine, my master might have lived.' I thought of his kindness to me, and of my sin and ingratitude to him. I felt that, if the world were mine, I would give it to take back what I had done. I wanted to fall then on my knees and confess my crime unto him, and beg his forgiveness. But it was too late. He was dead. As I saw his eyes close, my conscience said, 'Your master died for the want of that medicine.' Many years have passed away since that day," said George, "and now I am an old man. But I have never forgotten that day. I never can forget it. I have mourned over it, and will go on to mourn over it. I have ever since hated a lie, and have never willfully told one. I have tried, in every way, to shun even the appearance of that sin. When I die, I hope I shall meet my master in heaven, that I may there ask his forgiveness for the injury I have done him."

Now this seems to me to be a picture of true repentance. This old man was deeply distressed because he had sinned against a good master. His distress did not arise from the mere fear of punishment, for no one knew that he had told the lie; no one wished to punish him for it. He was grieved because his sin had, probably, been the cause of his master's death. This is just what every sinner feels when he truly repents of his sins.

—Maude.

II. ITS NECESSITY.

1. To secure us against the judgments of God.

(4210.) There is no other fortification against the judgments of God but repentance. His forces be invisible, invincible; not repelled with sword and target; neither portcullis nor fortress can keep them out; there is nothing in the world that can encounter them but repentance. —Adams, 1653.

2. To our restoration to His favour.

(4211.) That man is not fit to be forgiven who is so far from being sorry for his fault that he goes on to offend. He is utterly incapable of mercy who is not sensible that he hath done amiss, and resolved to amend. No prince ever thought a rebellious subject capable of pardon upon lower terms than these. It is in the nature of the thing unfit that an obstinate offender should have any mercy or favour shown to him.

—Tillotson, 1630–1694.

(4212.) When wrong has been done among men, the only way to obtain again the favour of those who have been injured, is by repentance. No man who has done evil in any way can be restored to forfeited favour, but by just this process of repentance—by a process involving all the elements of grief, shame, remorse, reformation, confession, that are demanded in religion. Let us recur to some of the former illustrations. You are a father. A child does wrong. He violates your law, offends you, treats you with disrespect or scorn. He goes abroad and represents your government at home as severe, and gives himself up to unbridled dissipation. Towards that son you cherish still all a father's feelings, but I may appeal to any such unhappy parent to say whether he would admit him to the same degree of confidence and favour as before, without some evidence of repentance.

You have a friend. You thought him sincere, but he betrayed you; and in feeling, and property, in character you have been made to suffer by him. I ask any man whether he can receive such a friend again to his bosom, and press him to his heart, without some evidence of regret at what he has done, and some proof that he will not do it again? You cannot do it. You cannot force your nature to do it. The sea might as well break over the iron-bound shore, or the river flow back, and again climb up the mountain side where it leaped down in cascades, as for you to do it. You will convince yourself, in some way, that he regrets what he has done, and that he will not do it again, or you can never receive him again with the confidence of a friend. Your nature is as firm on this point as the everlasting hills, and is, in this respect, but the counterpart and image of God, who does the same thing.

In like manner it is with those who have committed offences against a community. Of the man who has been guilty of theft, burglary, arson, or forgery, and who has been sentenced and punished for these offences, the community demands evidence that he has repented of the crime, and that he purposes to do so no more, before it will admit him again to its favour. If you go into his cell and find him alone on his knees before God confessing the sin; if you see in him the evidence of regret and sorrow that it was done; if you believe that the reformation is entire and sincere, the community will again receive him to its bosom, and will forgive and forget the past; and he may rise to public confidence, and even to influence and honour. But if none of these things are seen, if he spends the years of his sentence sullen, and hardened, and profane, and without one sigh or tear, he is never forgiven. He may have paid the penalty of the law, but he is not forgiven, and he goes forth to meet the frowns of an indignant community, to be watched with an eagle eye, and to be excluded all his life from the affections and confidence of mankind.

Universally it is true, that where an offence has been committed, and there is evidence of repentance, the offender may be restored to favour, but where there is no regret, shame, the curse of man, and of his Maker, alike rest upon him.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

2. To our reaching heaven.

(4213.) Reader, didst thou never know of any that were in a journey, and coming to some deep, dirty, potchy lane, they thought to avoid it, and broke over the hedge into the field; but when they had rode round and round they could find no way out, but were forced to go out where they got in; and then, notwithstanding their unwillingness, to go through that miry lane, or else not go that journey? Truly so it is in thy journey to heaven;

thou art now come to this deep lane of humiliation, through which all must go that will reach that city "whose builder and maker is God." Do not think to avoid it, no, not the least part of it; for this is the narrow way and strait gate that leadeth to life.

—Swinnock, 1673.

III. ITS POWER.

1. It prevails with God.

(4214.) Great is the power of eloquence, but never is it so great as when it pleads along with nature, and the culprit is a child strayed from his duty, and returned to it again with tears.

—Sterne, 1713-1786.

(4215.) What man among you can stand against his children's tears? When King Henry II., in the ages gone by, was provoked to take up arms against his ungrateful and rebellious son, he besieged him in one of the French towns, and the son being near to death, desired to see his father, and confess his wrong-doing; but the stern old sire refused to look the rebel in the face. The young man being sorely troubled in his conscience, said to those about him, "I am dying, take me from my bed, and let me lie in sackcloth and ashes, in token of my sorrow for my ingratitude to my father." Thus he died, and when the tidings came to the old man outside the walls, that his boy had died in ashes, repentant for his rebellion, he threw himself upon the earth, like another David, and said, "Would God I had died for him." The thought of his boy's broken heart touched the heart of the father. If ye, being evil, are overcome by your children's tears, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven find in your bemoanings and confessions an argument for the display of His pardoning love through Christ Jesus our Lord? This is the eloquence which God delights in, the broken heart and the contrite spirit.

—Spurgeon.

2. It continues to the very end of life.

(4216.) Wretched as must ever be the case of the sinner who is trusting to a death-bed repentance, which too often is no repentance at all; yet, even as he who by one single step outran the avenger of blood, was safe in the City of Refuge; so he who, even in the last struggle of departing life, is truly led to cast himself on the mercy of God in Christ, may take comfort from the thought of the jailer, arrested by infinite grace when on the point of slaying himself, body and soul; and from the recollection of the expiring malefactor, who heard, almost as the last sounds which reached his ears in this world, "To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise."

—Kyle.

(4217.) With the blood of Christ to wash away the darkest guilt, and the Spirit of God to sanctify the vilest, and strengthen the weakest nature, I despair of none. Too late! It is never too late. Even old age, tottering to the grave beneath the weight of seventy years and a great load of guilt, may retrace its steps, and begin life anew. Hope falls like a sunbeam on the hoary head. I have seen the morning rise cold and gloomy, and the sky grow thicker, and the rain fall faster, as the hours wore on; yet, ere he set in night, the sun, bursting through heavy clouds, has broken out to illumine the landscape and shed a flood of glory on the dying day.

—Guthrie.

(4218.) If there was no remedy, if you were past redemption, I would no more seek to waken you than I would one who slept to-night and was to be hanged to-morrow. Poor wretch, let him sleep on and take his rest—sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. A boat was once seen sweeping along the rapid that hurries to the Falls of Niagara. To the horror of some that watched it from the shore they saw one aboard, and also asleep. Such a time and place for sleeping! They ran; they shouted; they cried. The sleeper woke; and at one wild, rapid glance took in all his danger. Yet, what won't a man do for his life? To seize the oars and pull the boat's head round to the shore was the work of an instant. With death in the thunders of the cataract, roaring loud and louder, near and nearer in his ear, how he pulled! But unless God had sent down the eagle that sailed in the blue skies overhead to bear him away upon her wings, there was no hope. The water, sweeping onward with resistless power, shot him like an arrow to the brink. It was cruel to waken him. But, as nigh to destruction, near hell as that, you may be saved; plucked from the very edge of ruin—just when you are going over. Jesus can save at the uttermost. He waits now to save; though how much longer He shall wait to hear from your lips the cry, "Save me," I know not. Beware! The patience of God is lasting, but not everlasting.

—Guthrie.

3. The folly of "turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness."

(4219.) Would any man be so simple as to set his house on fire because he has a great river running by his door, from whence he may have water to quench it; or wound himself, because there is an excellent plaster which has cured several.

—Charnock, 1620-1680.

(4220.) Satan also emboldeneth the sinner, by telling him how many have repented and sped well, that sinned as bad, or worse than this: he tells him of Noah, and Lot, and David, and Peter, and the thief on the cross, and Paul, a persecutor, yea, and Manasseh, &c.

But consider whether any of those did thus sin, because that others had escaped that sinned before them. And think of the millions that never repented and are condemned, as well as those few that have repented. Is repentance better than sin? why then will you sin? Is sin better than repentance? why then do you purpose to repent? Is it not base ingratitude to offend God wilfully, because He hath pardoned many offenders, and is ready to forgive the penitent? And should a man of reason wilfully make work for his own repentance; and do that which he knoweth he shall wish with grief that he had never done? If some have been saved that fell into the sea, or that fell from the top of steeples, or that drunk poison, or that were dangerously wounded, will you therefore cast yourself into the same case, in hope of being saved?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4221.) What would you say yourselves to the man that would not be dissuaded from setting his house on fire, and then would pray and cry importunately to God that He would keep it from being burnt? Or of the man that will not be dissuaded from taking poison, and then when it gripeth him, will cry to God to save his life? Or of the man that will go to sea in a leaky, broken vessel, yea, himself will make those breaches in it that shall let the water in, and when it is sinking will cry to God to save him from being drowned? And will you do this about so great a matter as the everlasting state of your immortal souls? Will you be worldlings, and sensualists, and ungodly, and then cry, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," at the last? What! receive an unholy spirit? Will you not knock till the door is shut? When He telleth you, that "it is not every one that will cry Lord, Lord, that shall enter the kingdom of heaven," but "he that doeth the will of His Father which is in heaven?"

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4222.) It is foolish to lay out money in the purchase of repentance.

—Benjamin Franklin, 1706-1790.

(4223.) The seeds of repentance are sown in youth by pleasure, but the harvest is reaped in age by pain.

—Colton, 1832.

(4224.) Would you indulge yourselves in a course of sin because you hope to be able hereafter to repent of it? Can anything exceed this extravagance of folly? Would any man in his senses continue in a business, because he hoped that at last it would fill him with painful regret and self-abhorrence; because he hoped—before his death to condemn himself for engaging in it, as having acted a part—the most foolish, base, and injurious?

—Jay, 1769-1853.

IV. IT IS NEITHER EXPIATORY NOR MERITORIOUS.

(4225.) If a man build a house which doth cost him much labour and great charges, and not having laid a sure foundation, when a tempest cometh his house doth fall, then will he be very sorry, and repent that he hath so unadvisedly bestowed his money and labour; notwithstanding, his great sorrow and repentance cannot set up his house again: even so, though thou repent never so much, yet that cannot get remission for thy sins that are past, but thou must be pardoned only by the faith of Christ's blood.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(4226.) It is strange that any should imagine repentance to be meritorious in the sight of God. Our blessed Lord has told us that obedience itself can lay no claim to merit; and that "when we have done all that is commanded us, we should confess ourselves unprofitable servants." Who does not see that an acknowledgment of a debt is a very different thing from a discharge of that debt; and that, if a condemned criminal be ever so sorry for his offences, and acknowledge ever so sincerely his desert of punishment, his sorrow cannot cancel the debt which he owes to the laws of his country; much less can it give him a claim to great rewards? It is not then on a ground of merit, that God pardons a repenting sinner. Nevertheless there is a connection between repentance and pardon: there is a meetness and suitableness in the exercise of mercy towards the penitent.

—Simeon, 1758-1836.

(4227.) When murder has been committed, no change in the murderer can recall the murdered man to life; when sentiments of infidelity have been scattered abroad, no act of the penitent sceptic can gather them up again; when morals and faith have been corrupted, no tears, no efforts of him who has done it, can rescue and restore the victims; when innocence has been ruined, the conversion of the betrayer and the seducer does not recall the seduced and the wronged from the low haunts of vice or from the grave. But the penitent and regenerated man may, in some degree, repair the evil which he has done to society.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

(4228.) Repentance qualifies a man for pardon, but it does not—cannot—entitle him to it. It is one of the most elementary and obvious truths of morality, that the performance of one duty cannot be any compensation for neglect to perform another duty. But when a sinner is penitent for his sins, he is merely doing what, as a sinner, he ought to do; and his feelings of contrition do no more to absolve him from his guilt, than the gratitude a man feels to a doctor who has cured him from a dangerous illness does to discharge the doctor's bill. As in this case, there ought to be both gratitude and payment, so in the case of the sinner there must be both penitence and atonement. The sinner's sorrow for his sin, while in itself a proper thing, is no more an atonement for his sin than is the remorse that fills the breasts of most murderers any atonement for the murders they have committed. Judas was sorry—profoundly and intensely sorry—for having betrayed our Lord Jesus Christ, but did that do away with the guilt of that betrayal? Was Peter not to be blamed for his denial of his Master, because afterwards "he went out and wept bitterly"? Did the tears he shed give him any right to say in after years, "Yes, I denied my Lord, but I was sorry for it, and so made it straight"? Do you think that, just as with soap and water you can wash the dirt off your hands, you can with a few tears, or with many tears, wash the guilt of sin from off your soul? No delusion could be more groundless. Oh no! You have the real fact and the true philosophy of the matter in the well-known verse:—

"Not the labours of my hands
Can fulfil Thy law's demands.
Could my zeal no respite know,
Could my tears for ever flow,
All for sin could not atone:
THOU must save, and THOU alone."

V. HOW IT IS PRODUCED.

(4229.) A stroke, from guilt, from wrath, broke Judas' heart into despair; a look from love, from Christ, broke Peter's into tears. That sap and moisture which in frost and snow lieth hid and buried in the earth, sheweth itself pleasantly in the fruits of the trees when it is called forth by the warmth of the sun. Even Saul himself will lift up his voice and weep when he seeth a clear testimony of the love and undeserved kindness of David. Hast thou never beheld a condemned prisoner dissolved in tears upon the unexpected and unmerited receipt of a pardon, who all the time before was as hard as a flint? The hammer of the law may break the icy heart of man with terrors and horror, and yet it may remain ice still, unchanged, but when the fire of love kindly thaweth its ice, it is changed and dissolved into water—it is no longer ice, but of another nature. Where the sun is most predominant, there are the sweetest spices, and richest mines, and the costliest jewels. Do thou therefore meditate much on the love of God and Christ.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4230.) From this incident (Luke vii. 37-50) we see what it is which produces true repentance. If you were going out into the open air on a frosty day, and were you taking a lump of ice, you might pound it with a pestle, but it would still continue ice. You might break it into ten thousand atoms, but so long as you continue in that wintry atmosphere, every fragment, however small, will still be frozen. But come within. Bring in the ice beside your own bright and blazing fire, and soon in that genial glow "the waters flow." A man may try to make himself contrite; he may search out his sins and set them before him, and dwell on all their enormity, and still feel no true repentance. Though pounded with penances in the mortar of fasts and macerations, his heart continues hard and icy still. And as long as you keep in that legal atmosphere it cannot thaw. There may be elaborate confession, a got-up sort of penitence, a voluntary humility, but there is no godly sorrow. But come to Jesus with His words of grace and truth. From the cold winter night of the ascetic come into the summer of the Great Evangelist. Let that flinty frozen spirit bask a little in the beams of the Sun of Righteousness. Listen for a little to those words which melted this sinner into a penitent—which broke her alabaster box and brimmed over in tears ecstatic sorrow and self-condemning devotion: for, finding that you too have much forgiven, you also will love much.
—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(4231.) There may be the most bitter and tormenting sense of guilt without any real godly repentance for it. The heart of stone may be crushed and remain stone in its every fragment; it can only be melted when the love of God is suffered to shine on it.
—Ker.

VI. MUST NOT BE DELAYED.

1. Because delay is foolish.

(4232.) If you be still resolved to delay this business, consider well with yourselves how long you intend to delay it. I hope not to the last, nor till sickness come and death make his approaches to you. This is next to madness to venture all upon such an after-game. It is just as if a man should be content to be shipwrecked in hope that he shall afterwards escape by a plank and get safe to shore.
—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4233.) All delay in this case is dangerous and as senseless as the expectation of the idiot described by the poet, who, being come to the river side, and intending to pass over, stays until all the water in the river be gone by and hath left the channel a dry passage for him:

"At ille

Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis œvum."

But the river runs and runs and will run, and if he should stay a thousand years will never be the nearer being dry. So that if the man should go over, and there be a necessity for it, as there is for repentance, the only wise resolution to be taken in this case is to wade or swim over as well as he can, because the matter will never be amended by tarrying.
—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4234.) Art thou convinced that thy eternal happiness depends upon following the advice which hath now been given thee? Why then do but behave thyself in this case as all prudent men are wont to do in matters of far less concernment. If a man be travelling to such a place, so soon as he finds himself out of the way, he presently stops and makes towards the right way, and hath no inclination to go wrong any farther. If a man be sick, he will be well presently if he can, and not put it off for the future. Most men will gladly take the first opportunity that presents itself of being rich or great; every man almost catches at the very first offers of a great place or a good purchase, and secures them presently, if he can, lest the opportunity be gone and another snatch these things from him. Do thou thus so much more in matters so much greater. Return from the error of thy way, be wise, save thyself as soon as possibly thou canst. When happiness presents itself to thee, do not turn it off and bid it come again to-morrow. Perhaps thou mayest never be so fairly offered again; perhaps the day of salvation may not come again to-morrow; nay, perhaps, to thee, to-morrow may never come. But if we were sure that happiness would come again, yet why should we put it off? Does any man know how to be safe and happy to-day, and can he find in his heart to tarry until to-morrow.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4235.) There is no greater argument of a man's weakness than irresolution in matters of mighty consequence, when both the importance of the thing and exigency of present circumstances require a speedy resolution. We should account it a strange folly for a man to be unresolved in the clearest and plainest matters that concern his temporal welfare and safety. If a man could not determine himself whether he should eat or starve; if he were dangerously sick and could not determine whether he should take physic or die; or if one that were in prison could not resolve himself whether he should accept of liberty and be content to be released; or if a fair estate were offered to him, he should desire seven years' time to consider whether he should take it or not:—this would be so absurd in the common affairs of life that a man would be thought infatuated. If a man were under the condemnation of the law and liable to be executed upon the least intimation of the prince's pleasure, and a pardon were graciously offered to him, with this intimation that this would probably be the last offer of mercy that ever would be made to him: one would think that in this case a man should soon be determined what to do, or rather that he should not need to deliberate at all about it: because there is no danger of rashness in making haste to save his life.

And yet the case of a sinner is of far greater importance, and much more depends upon it, infinitely more than any temporal concernment whatsoever can amount to, even our happiness or misery to all eternity. And can there be any difficulty for a man to be resolved what is to be done in such a case? No case surely in the world can be plainer than this—whether a man should leave his sins and return to God and his duty or not; that is, whether a man should choose to be happy or miserable, unspeakably and everlastingly happy, or extremely and eternally miserable.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4236.) This is a confidence of all the most ungrounded and irrational. For upon what ground can a man promise himself a future repentance, who cannot promise himself a futurity?

—South, 1633-1716.

2. Because delay is dangerous.

(4237.) Whoever delays his repentance does in effect pawn his soul with the devil, and leaves it in his hands, and says, "Here, Satan, keep my soul: if I fetch it not again by such a day, 'tis thine for ever."

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(4238.) If you did know but the danger and horrible misery of the life that you now live, you would make as much haste out of it, as a man would do out of a house that was on fire over his head; or as a man that was at sea in a leaking vessel, that if he did not bestir himself as for his life to get it to the shore, would sink and drown him.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4239.) Our common idea is that we are walking towards the precipice of death; and that we can calculate to-day we are so many miles distant, to-morrow so many fewer, the next day so many fewer, till we reach the very edge. But, this is not the fact. We do not walk towards the precipice, we are walking along the slippery edge of the precipice, and know not what step may place us where all recovery is beyond our reach, because all is fixed; and all repentance impossible, because no place is found for it, though sought with tears.

—Cumming.

(4240.) Better stop now. Some years ago, near Princeton, New Jersey, some young men were skating on a pond around an "air-hole," and the ice began to break in. Some of them stopped; but a young man said, "I am not afraid! Give us one round more!" He swung nearly round, when the ice broke, and not until next day was his lifeless body found. So men go on in sin. They are warned. They expect soon to stop. But they cry, "Give us one round more!" They start, but with wild crash break through into bottomless perdition. Do not risk it any longer. Stop now. God save us from the foolhardiness of the one round more!

—Talmage.

3. Because delay multiplies difficulties.

(4241.) If a man take, in the spring, three or four plants, and set them altogether at one time, if he come within a while after he may easily pull up one of them; if he stay a fortnight or a month, he may pull up another, but it will be somewhat harder; if he stay a year or two, till it have taken deep root, then he may pull and pull his heart out, his labour is all in vain, he shall never be able to move it. And thus it is that one sin, one offence, if we labour to pull it up in time, it may be forgiven, it may be taken away; and if we let that one go on to two or three, yet, with unfeigned repentance, with bleeding tears, with incessant outcries to a gracious God, they may be razed out and wiped away, but with greater difficulty; but if a man give up himself unto sin, accustom himself to do evil, so that it take deep root in the heart and be settled in the soul, he shall never be able to pull it up, nor arise from the death of sin, which hath so fast seized on him.

—Simson, 1629.

(4242.) That which makes men so loth to be brought to reflect upon their past lives, is the uneasiness and trouble they think they shall find in such a work. So a great trader that has good reason to think that he has run much behindhand in the world, of all things hates to look into his books, cannot endure to hear of stating his accounts; and yet the longer he defers this, his accounts will become more intricate, he will still run more in debt, his condition will every day grow worse and worse, till at last it is past all recovery. And thus it is with wicked men. They would fain defer their repentance as long as they can, they would not yet be interrupted with such grave and serious thoughts. But the mischief is, the longer they defer it, the more they have still to repent of; and not only so, but they become more unable and unfit for such a work; they are still more backward and averse, as having been longer used and accustomed to their sins, and as having contracted greater familiarity with and kindness for them; and by such delay their ill habits grow more confirmed, their lusts and passions become stronger and more potent, and even their very natural powers and faculties are by degrees weakened and disabled.

—Calamy, 1600-1663.

(4243.) The ways of virtue and righteousness are not like two roads that lie nigh or parallel one to the other, so that with ease and in a little time a man may step out of the one into the other; but they are perfectly opposite and directly contrary to each other. Suppose that a man for a great reward be obliged in one day, between sunrising and sunset, to travel so many miles northward, and moreover by a solemn oath (as all Christians are to the practice of Christianity) engaged to the performance of it; but that the man, freely presuming he has time enough to do this in, does not set out at the first rising of the sun, but loiters and trifles away all his time, nay, not only so, but that for his pleasure, or some little convenience, he travels quite the contrary way, and goes southward; and finding that road very smooth, broad, and full of company and diversion, is by any little temptations drilled on still further in it, wholly forgetting his bargain, till on a sudden the sun is just ready to set, night comes on apace, and then the wretch begins to consider how much he is out of his way, and finds himself weary and tired and unfit for travel, and curses his own folly, and promises if he were to begin again, he would go directly to the place commanded; but by the time he has thus resolved, the sun is set. Shall this man now obtain the promised reward? Alas! before he can challenge that, he must first return back all the way he has gone, even to the point from whence he first set out, and also after that will have his whole day's journey still to go, and all that task which he first engaged himself to perform. So a wicked man upon his death-bed is not only to unravel all his former works, to break off all his lewd customs, to mortify all his foolish passions and unruly lusts, to forsake all his deadly sins, and to repent of his past ill-spent life; but he is then to live a new life, he is then to accustom himself to the practice of goodness, and to make it habitual to him; his mind is then to be furnished with all Christian virtues and graces, he has his whole race still to run, and his salvation still to work out: and is the least part of this possible to be done on a languishing bed of sickness?

—Calamy, 1600-1673.

(4244.) By delay of repentance, sin strengthens, and the heart hardens. The longer ice freezeth, the harder it is to be broken: the longer a man freezeth in impenitency, the more difficult it will be to have his heart broken.

—Watson, 1696.

(4245.) The more we defer, the more difficult and painful our work must needs prove; every day will both enlarge our task and diminish our ability to perform it. Sin is never at a stay; if we do not retreat from it, we shall advance in it, and the further on we go, the more we have to come back; every step we take forward (even before we can return hither, into the state wherein we are at present) must be repeated; all the web we spin must be unravelled.

Vice, as it groweth in age, so it improveth in stature and strength; from a puny child it soon waxeth a lusty stripling, then riseth to be a sturdy man, and after awhile becometh a massy giant, whom we shall scarce dare to encounter, whom we shall be very hardly able to vanquish; especially seeing that as it groweth taller and stouter, so we shall dwindle and prove more impotent, for it feedeth upon our vitals, and thriveth by our decay; it waxeth mighty by stripping us of our best forces, by enfeebling our reason, by perverting our will, by corrupting our temper, by debasing our courage, by seducing all our appetites and passions to a treacherous compliance with itself: every day our mind groweth more blind, our will more rusty, our spirit more faint, our passions more headstrong and untamable; the power and empire of sin do strangely by degrees encroach, and continually get ground upon us, till it hath quite subdued and enthralled us. First we learn to bear it; then we come to like it; by and by we contract a friendship with it; then we dote upon it; at last we become enslaved to it in a bondage, which we shall hardly be able, or willing, to shake off; when not only our necks are fitted to the yoke, our hands are manacled, and our feet shackled thereby, but our heads and hearts do conspire in a base submission thereto, when vice hath made such impression on us, when this pernicious weed hath taken so deep root in our mind, will, and affection, it will demand an extremely toilsome labour to extirpate it.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

(4246.) The longer the heart and sin converse together, the more familiar they will grow; and then the stronger the familiarity, the harder the separation. Does any one think he has his heart so in his hand, as to say, "Thus far will I sin, and there will I leave off"? Such an one shows indeed that he neither understands the nature of sin nor of his heart.

How that which now creeps and begs for entrance, having once got admission, will command and domineer; and like that emperor, though it gets into power like a fox, yet it will manage it, and reign like a lion. Neither does he know those many windings and turnings, the sly excuses and glossing apologies that the heart will suggest to rescue its sin from the summons of repentance, being once endeared and bound fast to it by inveterate continuance.

The commission of sin is like the effusion of water, easily contained in its bounds, but uncontrollable in its course. We indeed may give it vent, but God alone knows where it will stop. Is not that man, therefore, stupidly ignorant who chooses to encounter his sin by a future repentance? Reason would argue and discourse thus: If I find that I have scarce power enough to resist my sin at present, shall I not have much less when time shall give it growth and strength, and, as it were, knit its joints and render it unconquerable?

It is here as with a man in a combat; every blow his adversary gives him disables him for the very next resistance. A man at first finds the beginnings and little inconveniences of a disease, but physic is unpleasant; and withal he finds himself in a good competence of strength at present, and therefore he resolves to wear it out: but in the meantime his distemper eats on its way and grows upon him, till at length he has not so much as strength to bear physic, but his disease quickly runs him down, and becomes incurable.

A man at first is strong, and his sin is weak, and he may easily break the neck of it by a mature repentance; but his own deluding heart tells him that he had better repent hereafter; that is, when, on the contrary, he himself is deplorably weak, and his sin invincibly strong.

Commission of sin may indeed wound, but it is continuance of sin that kills. A man by falling to the ground may perhaps get a bruise or a knock; but by lying upon the ground after he is fallen, he may chance to catch his death.

—South, 1633-1716.

4. Because delay is itself a grievous sin, and a sign that really we intend never to repent.

(4247.) To neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect Him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend Him; casting our hopes on the peace which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and even a contemptuous laughing to scorn and deriding of God, His laws and precepts.

—Sir Walter Raleigh, 1552-1618.

(4248.) He that resolves to be virtuous, but not till some time hereafter, resolves against being virtuous in the meantime; and as virtue at such a distance is easily resolved on, so it is as easy a matter always to keep it at that distance. "The next week," says the sinner, "I will begin to be sober and temperate, serious and devout;" but the true sense of what he says is this, "I am fully bent to spend this present week in riot and excess, in sensuality and profaneness, or whatever vice it is that I indulge myself in;" and if we do it thus often, if it be our common course to put off our repentance thus from time to time, this is a most shrewd sign that indeed we never intend to repent at all. This is not only a pitiful device and excuse to shift off the duty wholly; and so we should interpret it in any man who should deal with us after the same manner in our worldly affairs.

It is with wicked men in this case, as it is with a bankrupt: when his creditors are loud and clamorous, speak big and threaten high, he gives them many good words and fair promises, appoints them to come another day, entreats their patience but a little longer, and then he will satisfy them all, when yet the man really intends not to pay one farthing, nor ever thinks of compassing the money against the time. Thus do men endeavour to pacify and quiet their consciences, by telling them they will bear them another time; but this is only to delude and cheat their consciences with good words and specious pretences, making them believe they will certainly do what yet they cannot endure to think of, and what they would fain wholly excuse themselves from.

—Calamy, 1600-1663.

5. Because repentance is a divine gift.

(4249.) Saving repentance is the gift of God: and is it likely that those who have been insensible to the loud and earnest calls of the Word, that have been inflexible to the gracious methods of Providence leading them to repentance, should at last obtain converting grace? The gales of the Spirit are very transient, and blow where He pleases, and can it be expected that those who have wilfully and often resisted His pure motions, should by an exuberant favour receive afterwards more powerful grace to overrule their stubborn wills and make them obedient? Our Saviour tells us, "To him that hath shall be given," but from him that neglects the improving spiritual treasures, "that which he hath shall be taken away." There are special seasons of grace—as the passing of Christ in the way where the blind man sat—which neglected, are irrecoverably lost. God has threatened that His "Spirit shall not always strive" with rebellious sinners, and then their state is remediless. This may be the case of many even in this life who are insensible of their misery. As consumptive persons decline by degrees, lose their appetite, colour, and strength, till at last they are hopeless; so the withdrawals of the Spirit are gradual, His motions are not so frequent and strong, and upon the continued provocations of sinners finally leaves them under that most fearful doom: "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still; he that is unrighteous, let him be unrighteous still," and thus punishes them on this side hell, as He does the damned, by giving them over to sin. Nothing, therefore, is more dangerous than the usual excuses for the delays of repentance. It is written, as with a sunbeam, that God will graciously pardon repenting sinners; but it is nowhere promised that He will give repentance to those who securely break His laws upon a corrupt confidence they will repent at the last.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(4250.) Repentance is entirely in God's disposal. This grace is in the soul from God, as light is in the air from the sun, by continual emanation, so that God may shut or open His hands, contract or diffuse, set forth or suspend the influence of it as He pleases. And if God gives not repenting grace, there will be a hard heart and a dry eye, maugre all the poor frustaneous endeavours of nature. A piece of brass may as easily melt, or a flint bewater itself, as the heart of man by any innate power of its own resolve itself into a penitential humiliation. If God does not, by an immediate blow of His omnipotence, strike the rock, these waters will never gush out. The Spirit blows where it listeth, and if that blows not, these showers can never fall.

And now, if the matter stands so, how does the impenitent sinner know but that God, provoked by his present impenitence, may irreversibly propose within Himself to seal up these fountains, and shut him up under hardness of heart and reprobation of sense? And then farewell all thoughts of repentance for ever.

—South, 1633-1716.

6. Because repentance is a task too difficult to be accomplished in the hour of death.

(4251.) Were we to judge of the matter by the conduct of many, we should conclude it to be by no means a difficult thing to be a Christian. They seem to think it almost as easy to wash one's heart as their hands; to change their habits as their dress; to admit the light of divine truth into their souls as the morning into our chamber by opening the shutters;—in short, that it is not more difficult to turn the heart from evil to good, from the world to God, and from sin to Christ, than to turn a ship right round by help of her helm.

How else can we account for many, otherwise sensible people, putting off their salvation to a time confessedly unsuitable for any arduous task whatever—till, reduced to a state of mental and physical prostration, they lie languishing on a bed of sickness, or tossing on a bed of death? It ought to be an easy work that is deferred till then.

—Guthrie.

(4252.) Is it because death is a suitable and convenient period for seeking the pardon of sin and salvation of the soul that we propose to delay this matter till then? Suitable, convenient! Does death send us warning of his approach; giving due and timely notice that after so many weeks or days we may look for a visit from the King of Terrors? Like other kings, is he always preceded by messengers to prepare the way, and make all things ready for his reception? No. The robber comes under the cloud of night; steals quietly into your house; treads the floor with muffled feet; and before you wake to seize his hand, has you by the throat, and plants a dagger in your heart. So death may come. "I come," says our Lord, "as a thief in the night." "Behold, I come quickly." Coming so, the procrastinating die without hope. And though death should make no such stealthy attack, nor leap on us with the suddenness of a tiger's spring, whoever looked on a dying scene to make resolutions such as these—I will delay seeking the Lord till my body is racked with these pains, my mind reeling in this wild delirium; not till I cannot lift my head from its pillow, not till I cannot read a line of the Bible, not till I can neither pray nor listen to the prayers of others, will I seek the Lord! I venture to say that wherever man made such a resolution, no man in his sober senses ever made it by a dying bed. No. Death has enough to do with itself. It is a time not to seek, but to enjoy the comforts of religion; and if there is one impression which life's closing scene makes most strongly and deeply on the spectator, it is this, Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.

—Guthrie.

7. Because "death-bed repentances" are always to be suspected.

(4253.) It is much to be feared, that the repentance of a dying sinner is usually but like the sorrow of a malefactor, when he is ready to be turned off; he is not troubled that he has offended the law, but he is troubled that he must die.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4254.) Let us not deceive ourselves; heaven is not an hospital made to receive all sick and aged persons that can but put up a faint request to be admitted there; no, no, they are never like to "see the kingdom of God" who, instead of "seeking it in the first place," make it their "last refuge and retreat;" and when they find the sentence of death upon them, only to avoid present execution, do bethink themselves of getting to heaven, and since there is no other remedy, are contented to petition the great King and Judge of the world that they may be transported thither.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4255.) Whatever stress some may lay upon it, a death-bed repentance is but a weak and slender plank to trust our all upon.

—Sterne, 1713-1768.

8. Because a death-bed repentance may be inefficacious.

(4256.) I do not know a more awful part of Scripture than the parable of the ten virgins. We are always fearful of dwelling too strongly on the minuter parts of a parable; but there is something so singular in the fact, that the foolish virgins went to seek oil so soon as they heard of the bridegroom's approach, but were nevertheless excluded, that we dare not pass it by as conveying no lesson. If the parable admit of being applied, as we suppose it must in a modified sense, to the circumstances of our death, does it not seem to say that a repentance, to which we are driven by the approach of dissolution, will not be accepted? The foolish virgins sought not for oil till alarmed by tidings that the bridegroom was at hand; and many think that it will be enough if they give heed to religion when they shall have reason to apprehend that their last day is not distant. But the foolish virgins, although, as it would seem, they obtained oil, were indignantly shut out from the banquet; what, then, is to become of sinners, who, in the day of sickness, compelled by the urgency of their case, and frightened by the nearness of their end, show something like sorrow, and profess something like faith?

I own that nothing makes me think so despondingly of those who wholly neglect God till they feel themselves dying, as this rejection of the virgins, who would not begin to seek oil till they found the bridegroom at hand, and then obtained it in vain. It is as though God said, "If you will not seek Me in health, if you will not think of Me till sickness tells you that you must soon enter My presence, I will surely reject you; when ye knock at the door and say, 'Lord, Lord, open to us,' I will answer from within, 'I never knew you; depart, depart from Me.'" We dare not dwell upon this: we have a hundred other reasons for being suspicious of what is called death-bed repentance; but this seems to make that repentance—ay, though the death be that of consumption, and the patient linger for months with his senses about him, and his time apparently given to the duties of religion—of no avail whatever; for if the man obstinately neglected God till alarmed by the hectic spot on his cheek, that hectic spot was to him what the midnight cry was to the virgins, the signal that the bridegroom was near; and what warrant have we that God will admit him to the feast, if the five virgins were excluded with every mark of abhorrence, though they sought for oil, and bought it, and brought it?

—Melville, 1798-1871.

9. The case of the penitent thief affords no argument for delay.

2. (4257.) As a prince sometimes pardoneth a malefactor when he is come to the very place of execution, yet were it not for every malefactor to trust thereupon, for that this is but an extraordinary act of the prince's favour, and neither shown nor promised to all men; even so no man ought to flatter and deceive himself in deferring his conversion by alleging the example of the penitent thief, saved even at the last hour upon the cross, and carried to Paradise that same day with Christ, for this act was a special miracle, reserved for the manifestation of Christ's power and glory at that hour upon the cross; and, besides, this act was upon a most rare confession made by the thief at that instant when almost all the world forsook Christ.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(4258.) There is sometimes a tendency to regard the grace vouchsafed to this penitent as exceptional, as not to be brought within the ordinary laws of God's dealings with the children of men. We may sometimes hear it said, that at that moment when the Son of God hung upon the cross was a moment unlike every other in the moral and spiritual history of the world, so there were graces vouchsafed then unlike those of any other moment, larger, freer, more marvellous; such as were proper to that time and no other; the gates of mercy being, so to speak, thrown open more widely than at other times; and that therefore no conclusions can be drawn from what then found place as to what will find place when events have returned to their more ordinary course. This is sometimes urged, and chiefly out of a desire to withdraw the temptation to a deferred and late repentance, which the acceptance of this penitent at the closing moment of his life might else seem to hold out to others. I confess that even the desire to avert such an abuse cannot persuade me to accept this explanation of the grace which he obtained. The laws of God's kingdom, the conditions under which grace may be obtained, are unchangeable. This man was forgiven exactly on the same grounds as those on which any other will find pardon and acceptance, because he repented and believed, and obeyed. Time does not exist for God; and if only this repentance, faith, and obedience of his were genuine, whether they were spread over the forty or fifty years to which his life in the natural course of things might have been prolonged, or concentrated into the few hours upon the cross which he actually did survive, this made and could make no difference in God's sight. I have said "if only these were genuine," which in the present instance we know that certainly they were; for this is the fatal danger of all repentance postponed to the last, and thus withdrawn from all trial and proof, that the man, little as he may guess this, may be deceiving himself; that in all likelihood his repentance is not genuine, is not sincere; that almost certainly it is not so, when it has been deferred on so mean a speculation as this, of giving to God the least and obtaining from Him the most, grinding the corn of life, and, according to the old proverb, giving the flour to the devil, and only the bran to God. It is by the pressing of this, the almost universal self-delusion of death-bed repentances, that we most recue this scripture from dangerous abuse, from proving a temptation and a snare, not by excepting the dealing of God with this man from the category of His usual dealings in the kingdom of His grace and power.

—Trench.

VII. HOW ITS GENUINENESS IS TO BE TESTED.

1. Not by intensity of suffering.

(4259.) You must not place the chief part of your religion in humiliation, as if it were a life of mere sorrow that we are called to by the Gospel. But you must make it a servant to your faith, and love, and joy in the Holy Ghost, and other graces. As the use of the needle is but to make way for the thread, and then it is the thread and not the needle that makes the seam; so much of our sorrow is but to prepare for faith and love, and these are they that close the soul with Christ. It is therefore a sore mistake with some that are very apprehensive of their want of sorrow but little of their want of faith or love, and that pray and strive to break their hearts, or weep for sin, but not much for those higher graces which it tendeth to. One must be done, and not the other left undone.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4260.) Wouldst thou know when thou hast been humbled enough for sin?—When thou art willing to let go thy sins. Then the gold hath lain long enough in the furnace when the dross is purged out; so when the love of sin is purged out, a soul is humbled enough to divine acceptance, though not to divine satisfaction. Now if thou art humbled enough (though not so much as others), what needs more? If a needle will let out the imposthume, what needs a lance? Be not more cruel to thyself than God would have thee.

—Watson, 1696.

(4261.) It is the sincerity of your sorrow for sin at which God looks, not at the measure of it. If then you are really anxious to know whether you have been sufficiently humbled for sin, ask yourself, Are you so humbled for sin that you are willing to give it up? The refiner does not ask how long has the gold remained in the furnace; he asks, is the dross purged away?—is the baser metal burnt up? If it be so, then does he require nothing further to convince him that the gold has been sufficiently long in the crucible. So if humbling yourselves for sin has, by God's grace, purged away your love for sin, be content on this point, although many of the children of God may have been far more deeply tried, and far more painfully humbled for it than yourselves.

—Salter.

(4262.) Some well-meaning Christians tremble for their salvation, because they have never gone through that valley of tears and of sorrow, which they have been taught to consider as an ordeal that must be passed through before they can arrive at regeneration: to satisfy such minds it may be observed that the slightest sorrow for sin is sufficient if it produce amendment, and that the greatest is insufficient if it do not. Therefore, by their own fruits let them prove themselves: for some soils will take the good seed without being watered with tears or harrowed up by affliction.

—Colton, 1832.

(4263.) The pains of repentance are only good because there is something wrong in us: we take medicine to recover our health: repentance is a dark road through which we must pass of necessity, but we must not seek to dwell there; after having sincerely repented and made our peace with God, we should rejoice in this peace, for God has not called us to despondency and despair, but to joy and gladness and salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ.

2. But by its comprehensiveness and definiteness.

(4264.) Take heed thou prayest not with a reservation, be sure thou renouncest what thou wouldst have God remit. God will never remove the guilt so long as thou entertainest the sin. What prince will pardon his treason that means to continue a traitor? It is desperate folly to desire God to forgive what thou intendest to commit. Thou hadst as good speak out, and ask leave to sin with impunity, for God knows the language of thy heart, and needs not thy tongue to be an interpreter. Some princes have misplaced their high favours to their heavy cost, as the Emperor Leo Armenius, who pardoned that monster of ingratitude Michael Balbus, and was the same night in which he was delivered out of prison murdered by him. But the great God is subject to no mistake in His government; never got hypocrite a pardon in the disguise of a saint. He will call thee by thy own name, though thou comest to Him in the semblance of a penitent; "Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam," said the prophet. Hypocrisy is too thin a veil to blind the eyes of the Almighty. Thou mayest put thy own eyes out, so as not to see Him; but thou canst never blind His eyes that He should not see thee.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4265.) True repentance is the conversion of the soul from sin to God, and leaveth not any man in the power of sin. It is not for a man when he hath had all the pleasure that sin will yield him, to wish then that he had not committed it (which he may do then at an easy rate), and yet to keep the rest that are still pleasant and profitable to his flesh, like a man that casts away the bottle which he hath drunk empty, but keeps that which is full; or as men sell off their barren kine, and buy milch ones in their stead. This kind of repentance is a mockery, and not a cure for the soul.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4266.) People who are always lamenting their lack of feeling are, for the most part, those who crave some vague sense of the turpitude of human wrong-doing in general. But John was the most personal of preachers. He pointed out the specific sins of his hearers. He listened to specific confessions. He gave specific exhortations. Repentance of a general sort is not worth the while. If you will regret your sins, drag out your own particular wrong-doing and look at it. Do not weep over Adam's fall, nor repent of the general depravity of man, but turn with loathing and regret from that which defiles your own life. If you are stingy, or greedy, or envious, or lustful, or small selfish, or ill-tempered, or censorious, or lazy, remember that one tear over your specific sin is better than a thousand shed from a vague sense of general unworthiness.

—Eggleston.

3. By its continuance.

(4267.) Repentance has a purifying power, and every tear is of a cleansing virtue; but these penitential clouds must be still dropping; one shower will not suffice, for repentance is not one single action, but a course. We may here compare the soul to a linen cloth; it must be first washed, to take off its native hue and colour and to make it white; and afterwards it must be ever and anon washed to preserve and to keep it white. In like manner the soul must be cleansed, first from a state of sin by converting repentance, and so made pure, and afterwards, by a daily repentance, it must be purged from those actual stains that it contracts, and so be kept pure. It is an enjoyment and a privilege reserved for heaven, "not to need repentance," and the reason of this is, because the cause of it will be taken away. But here this pitch of perfection is not to be hoped for. We cannot expect that God should totally wipe these tears from our eyes till He has taken all sin out of our hearts. Till it be our power and privilege not to sin, it is still our duty to repent.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4268.) Let me remind you that repentance is a duty of greater extent than many are apt to suppose, who, confining their view on such occasions as these to a few of the grosser disorders of their lives, pay little attention to the heart: they are satisfied with feeling a momentary compunction and attempting a partial reformation, instead of crying with the royal penitent, "Create in me a clean heart!" They determine to break off particular vices,—a: excellent resolution as far as it goes,—without proposing to themselves a life of habitual devotion, without imploring, under a sense of weakness, that grace which can alone renew the heart, making, in the words of our Lord, the tree good, that the fruit may be good also.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

4. By its leading to amendment of life.

(4269.) Godly sorrow works a change and alteration to amendment of life; but the hypocrite, though he hangs down his head like a bulrush for a day, and blubbers his face with tears, yet either he leaves not his sin at all, or only as he leaves and puts off his clothes, with a purpose to resume and put them on the next day.

—Downham, 1644.

(4270.) Repenting is a sorrowful turning of the heart from sin to God. You repent not if you turn not. To mock God with such hypocritical praying and repenting, is itself a heinous sin. Will you take it for repenting if a man that spits in your face and beateth you, shall do it every day, and ask your forgiveness at night, and propose to do it still, because he asked forgiveness?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4271.) Some mistake a fruitless sorrow for sin to be repentance. And because they do not sit down altogether quiet and contented under sin, but are in motion, they judge that they are going forwards. But let a man put himself in any part of the circumference of a circle, and continue to move in it, it is undeniable that he is in motion, but it is as clear that he makes no progress in advancing forwards. So these men sin and repent, and alter repentance they sin; and walking in a continual circle of repentings and relapsings, take not one step towards heaven.

—Salter.

(4272.) John did not demand tears. He did not ask that a committee or a church-session should probe the hearts of his hearers to find out how deep their convictions of sin might be. He demanded outward and substantial evidence. "Bring forth fruits meet for repentance." He did not demand that they should sit every evening for weeks on an anxious seat, or that they should frequent inquiry-meetings for months. If you are sorry, show it by doing better, he said. Let honest, purer, and kindlier lives be proof of the sincerity of your penitence. If you have two coats, give one to some coatless man. That is better than any amount of anguish over sinfulness in general.

—Eggleston.

5. By its leading to watchfulness against sin.

(4273.) He that is truly resolved against any sin, is likewise resolved against the occasions and temptations that would draw him to it: otherwise he hath taken up a rash and foolish resolution, which he is not like to keep, because he did not resolve upon that which was necessary to the keeping of it. So he that resolves upon any part of his duty must likewise resolve upon the means which are necessary to the performance of it: he that is resolved to pay his debts must be diligent in his calling, because without this he cannot do the other, for nothing can be more vain than for a man to pretend that he is resolved upon doing his duty, when he neglects anything that is necessary to further him in the discharge of it. This is as if a man should resolve to be well, and yet be careless in observing the rules which are prescribed in order to his health. So for a man to resolve against drunkenness, and yet to run himself upon the temptations which naturally lead to it by frequenting the company of lewd and intemperate persons, this is as if a man should resolve against the plague and run into the pest-house.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

REPROOF.

1. A CHRISTIAN DUTY.

(4274.) Who is so kind and gentle as the surgeon with his knife? He that is to be cut cries, yet cut he is; he that is to be cauterised cries, but cauterised he is. This is not cruelty; on no account let that surgeon's treatment be called cruelty. Cruel he is against the wounded part, that the patient may be cured; for if the wound be softly dealt with, the man is lost.

Thus, then, I would advise, that we love our brethren, howsoever they may have sinned against us; that we let not affection toward them depart out of our hearts, and that, when need is, we exercise discipline towards them; lest by relaxation of discipline, wickedness increase.

—Augustine, 353-429.

(4275.) As he who seeth a man commit murder, and standeth by without giving forth anything to show the murderer his dislike of the deed, is worthy to be accounted accessory to the murder; or as he that seeth a blind man running into a pit, and neither stays him from running into it nor yet helpeth him out, but letteth him there be drowned, is guilty of his death: even so is he to be accounted who seeth his brother kill his soul by sinning and will not endeavour to do what he can, by rebuking him, to stay him from so doing.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(4276.) What love dost thou show to thy neighbour, if thou seest him wounding and piercing his inestimable soul, and thou dost not endeavour (though against his will) to boid his hand? If thou shouldest see him take a knife to stab himself at the heart, thou wouldest not stay to ask his leave, or fear his anger, but do thy utmost to hinder him; and canst thou see him destroying his soul, and not seek to prevent him?

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4277.) There is a special obligation upon friends to be helpful to one another herein. The laws of friendship require a discovery of that which endangers one another. You would count him unworthy the name of a friend who, knowing a thief or an incendiary to lurk in your family with a design to kill, or rob, or burn your house, would conceal it from you, and not acquaint you with it on his own accord. There is no such thief, murderer, incendiary, as sin; it more endangers us and those concerns that are more precious than goods, or house, or life; and that most endangers us by which the Lord's anger is already kindled against us. Silence or concealment in this case is treachery. He is the most faithful friend, and worthy of most esteem and affection, that deals most plainly with us in reference to the discovery of our sin. He that is reserved in this case is but a false friend, a mere pretender to love, whereas, indeed, he hates his brother in his heart (Lev. xix. 17).

—Clarkson, 1621-1686.

II. THINGS THAT HINDER MEN FROM PERFORMING IT.

1. Fear of presuming.

(4278.) In the way of our callings, every good Christian is a teacher, and hath a charge of his neighbour's soul. Let it be only the voice of a Cain to say, "Am I my brother's keeper?" I would have one of these men, that are so loth that private men should teach them, to tell me, what if a man fall down in a swoon in the streets, though it be your father or superior, would you not take him up presently, and use all means you could to recover him? or would you let him lie and die, and say, "It is the work of the physician, and not mine; I will not invade the physician's calling." In two cases every man is a physician. First, in case of necessity, and when a physician cannot be had. And secondly, in case the hurt be so small that every man can do as well as the physician. And in the same two cases every man must be a teacher.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. Fear of offending our friends.

(4279.) Another hindrance is, a base man-pleasing disposition that is in us. We are so loth to displease men, and so desirous to keep in credit and favour with them, that it makes us most unconscionably neglect our known duty. A foolish physician he is, and a most unfaithful friend, that will let a sick man die for fear of troubling him; and cruel wretches are we to our friends, that will rather suffer them to go quietly to hell, than we will anger them, or hazard our reputation with them. If they did but fall in a swoon we would rub them and pinch them, and never stick at hurting them. If they were distracted we would bind them with chains, and we should please them in nothing that tended to their hurt; and yet, when they are beside themselves in point of salvation, and in their madness posting on to damnation, we will not stop them for fear of displeasing them.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. A consciousness of personal imperfections.

(4280.) A person who objects to tell a friend of his faults because he has faults of his own, acts as a surgeon would who should refuse to dress another person's wounds because he had a dangerous one himself.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

III. DEMANDS RECTITUDE IN THE REPROVER.

(4281.) Nowadays men take upon them to reprove others for committing such things as themselves have practised, and do practise without amendment, notwithstanding their diligence in teaching others their duty. They can teach all the doctrine of Christ, saving three syllables—"Follow Me!" Therefore these are like some tailors, who are busy in decking and tricking up others, but go both bare and beggarly themselves.

—Henry Smith, 1592.

(4282.) Before thou reprehend another, take heed thou art not culpable in what thou goest about to reprehend. He that cleanses a blot with blotted fingers makes a greater blur.

—Quarles, 1592-1644.

(4283.) The eye which is filled with dust can never see clearly the spot that is in another's face; nor that hand which is besmeared with mire wash any other member clean; nor that man who is corrupted with sin do any good when he reproves his own sin in another. He must needs be clean himself that goes about to cleanse another.

—G. Williams, 1589-1672.

(4284.) If my carriage be unblamable, my counsel and reproof will be the more acceptable. Whole-some meat often is distasteful, coming out of nasty hands. A bad liver cannot be a good counsellor or bold reprove; such a man must speak softly for fear of awaking his own guilty conscience. If the bell be cracked, the sound must needs be jarring.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4285.) It behoves him that would counsel or reprove another, says Tertullian, to guard his speech, by the authority of his own good walk, lest, wanting that, what he says should put himself to the blush. We do not love one that hath foul breath to come very near us, and truly we count that one comes very near us that reproves us; such, therefore, had need have a sweet-scented life.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4286.) The vicious reproving vice, is the raven chiding blackness.

—Eliza Cook.

IV. HOW IT IS TO BE ADMINISTERED.

1. Seasonably.

(4287.) Use not liberty of reproof in the days of sorrow and affliction; for the calamity itself is enough to chastise the gaieties of sinning persons, and to bring them to repentance: it may be sometimes fit to insinuate the mention of the cause of that sorrow in order to repentance and a cure; but severe and biting language is then out of season, and it is like putting vinegar to an inflamed and smarting eye—it increases the anguish and tempts unto impatience. In the accidents of a sad person, we must do as nurses do to their falling children, snatch them up and still their cryings, and entertain their passion with some delightful avocation; but chide not then, when the sorrowful man needs to be refreshed.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(4288.) Reproof ought to be in season, neither when the brain is misted with arising fumes, nor when the mind is maddened with unreined passions. Certainly, he is drunk himself that profanes reason so as to urge it to a drunken man. Nature unloosed in a flying speed cannot come off with a sudden stop.

"Quis matrem, nisi mentis inops, in funere nati Flere vetat? non hoc ulla monenda loco est."

"He's mad that dries a mother's eyes' full tide
At her son's grave: there 'tis no time to chide:"

was the opinion of the smoothest poet. To admonish a man in the height of his passion is to call a soldier to counsel in the midst—in the heat of a battle. Let the combat slack, and then thou mayest expect a hearing. All passions are like rapid torrents; they swell the more for meeting with a dam in their violence. He that will hear nothing in the rage and roar of his anger will, after a pause, inquire of you—seem you to forget him, and he will the sooner remember himself. For it often falls out that the end of passion is the beginning of repentance. Then it will be easy to draw back a retiring man; as a boat is rowed with less labour when it has both a wind and tide to drive it. A word seasonably given, like a rudder, sometimes steers a man quite into another course. A blow bestowed in the striking time is better than ten delivered unseasonably.

—Felltham, 1668.

(4289.) Reprehension is not necessary or convenient at all seasons. Admonition is like physic, rather profitable than pleasant; now the best physic may be thrown away, if a fit time of giving it be not observed. Some unskilful physicians have wronged their patients in administering suitable potions out of season.

Sometimes a sudden reproof, upon the commission of the sin, has reformed the sinner; but this is not always safe. When men's spirits are hot, and their minds drunk with passion, they are more apt to beat the Christian than to hear his counsel. Abigail would not tell Nabal of his danger till he was sober.

But if there be no probability of a better season, after some ejaculations to heaven for assistance and success, take the present opportunity. Fabius conquered by delaying, but Cæsar overcame by expedition. Though it is not ordinarily so good to sow corn when the wind is high, yet the husband-man will rather do it in such weather than not at all, or than want his harvest. As the bird often flies away whilst the fowler still seeks to get nearer and nearer to her, so does a season of advantaging our brethren's souls whilst we wait still for a fitter. It is thy duty, therefore, to take hold of the present, where thou hast no likelihood of another; and to improve the first good opportunity, rather than adventure the loss of all by expecting a better.

—Swinnoek, 1673.

(4290.) When the earth is soft, the plough will enter. Take a man when he is under affliction, or in the house of mourning, or newly stirred by some moving sermon, and then set it home, and you may do him good. Christian faithfulness doth require us, not only to do good when it falls in our way, but to watch for opportunities of doing good.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. Privately.

(4291.) A monitor ought, in the first place, to have a regard to the delicacy and sense of shame of the person admonished. For they who are hardened against a blush are incorrigible.

—Epictetus, B.C. 60.

(4292.) A reprove is like one that is taking a mote out of his brother's eye; now this must be done very tenderly. For this purpose it would be convenient, where it may be, that reproofs be given privately.

"If thy brother offend thee, tell him his fault between him and thee." The presence of many may make him take up an unjust defence, who in private would have taken upon him a just shame. The open air makes sores to rankle—other's crimes are not to be cried at the market. Private reproof is the best grave to bury private faults in.

—Swinnoek, 1673.

(4293.) A man may, by a parable or an history pertinent to the purpose, convince a sinner's conscience and not openly injure his credit. Paul, in his sermon to Felix, seemed to shoot at random, not naming any, but his arrow pierced that unrighteous prince to the quick. A wise reprove in this is like a good fencer, who, though he strike one part, yet none that stand by could perceive from his eye, or the carriage of his arm, that he aimed at that more than the rest.

—Swinnoek, 1673.

3. Discreetly.

(1.) With due regard to the social position of the offender.

(4294.) It is an excellent example that Paul giveth us (Gal. ii. 2.) He communicateth the gospel to them, yet privately to them of reputation, lest he should run in vain. Some men would take this to be a sinful complying with their corruption, to yield so far to their pride and bashfulness as to teach them only in private, because they would be ashamed to own the truth in public. But Paul knew how great a hindrance men's reputation is to their entertaining of the truth, and that the remedy must not only be fitted to the disease, but also to the strength of the patient, and that in so doing, the physician is not guilty of favouring the disease, but is praiseworthy for taking the right way to cure it; and that learners and young beginners must not be dealt with as open professors.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2.) With due regard to the disposition of the offender.

(4295.) There must not be one uniform proceeding with all men in reprehension; but that must vary according to the disposition of the reprove. I have seen some men as thorns, which easily touched hurt not; but if hard and unwarily, fetch blood of the hand: others as nettles, which if they be nicely handled, sting and prick; but if hard and roughly pressed, are pulled up without harm. Before I take any man in hand, I will know whether he be a thorn or a nettle.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4296.) Some in their fainting fits are recovered easily with throwing some cold water on their faces; others must be beaten and rubbed very hard. "Of some have compassion, making a difference, and others save with fear." Some are like tiled houses, that can admit a brand of fire to fall upon them and not be burned; yet some again are covered with light dry straw, which with the least touch will kindle and flame about your ears. By screwing strings moderately, we may make good music, but if too high, we break them. All the strings of a viol are not of equal strength, nor will endure to be wound up to the same pitch. We may soothe a lion into bondage, but sooner hew him in pieces than beat him into a chain. A difference ought to be observed between party and party; an exhortation will do more with some than a severe commination with others. The sturdy oak will not be so easily bowed as the gentle willow.

—Swinnoek, 1673.

(3.) With due regard to the faults of the offender.

(4297.) Wise physicians will distinguish between a pimple and a plague-sore. Those that sin of infirmity are to be admonished more mildly than those that sin obstinately. Who would give as great a blow to kill a fly as to kill an ox? Old festered sores must be handled in a rougher manner than green wounds. Ordinary physic will serve for a distemper newly begun, but a chronic disease must have harsher and stronger purges. Some offend ignorantly, others out of contumacy; some offend out of weakness, being overcome by a sudden passion; others of premeditated contrived wickedness and perverseness; some sins are of a lower nature, of lesser moment and influence upon others; other sins overthrow the foundations of Christianity, and devour the vitals of religion. Now, according to the nature of the disease and constitution of the patients must be the prescription for their cure.

—Swinnoek, 1673.

(4.) With frank acknowledgment of the excellences of the offender.

(4298.) I see iron first heated red-hot in the fire, and afterwards beaten and hardened with cold water. Thus will I deal with an offending friend: first heat him with deserved praise of his virtue, and then beat upon him with reprehension. So good nurses, when their children are fallen, first take them up and speak them fair, and chide them afterwards. Gentle speech is a good preparative for rigour. He shall see that I love him by my approbation; and that I love not his faults by my reproof.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4299.) If we would reprove another with success, and convince him that he is in the wrong, we must observe in what point of view he looks on the affair; because in that way it generally is as he imagines, and acknowledge that he is so far in the right. He will be pleased with this, because it intimates, not that he was mistaken, but only that he had not considered the thing on all sides. For we do not feel it any disgrace not to see everything; but we do not like to acknowledge that we have been deceived; and perhaps the reason of this may be, that the understanding is not deceived in that point of view in which it actually considers the subject, just as the simple perceptions of the senses are always true.

—Pascal, 1622-1662.

(4300.) Give the offender his due praise as well as his deserved reproof; this will somewhat allay his passion, and make reproof the more prevalent. The iron when heated red-hot in the fire is bent and beaten afterwards, without breaking, which way the smith pleases. When I have heated him hot with the fire of commendation, I may then beat upon him with reproof in greater hopes of success. We take pills the better when they are well gilt; children lick up their medicines the more freely when they are sprinkled with a little sugar.

Wise commanders, when their soldiers are making a dishonourable retreat, do not presently upbraid them with cowardice, but often, by mentioning their former heroic courage, or their ancestors' noble carriage, inflame them with a desire to continue their repute and credit. Sometimes indirect reprehension has wrought much good.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(5.) So as not to discourage.

(4301.) In the lopping of these trees, experience and good husbandry hath taught men to leave one bough still growing in the top, the better to draw up the sap from the root. The like wisdom is fit to be observed in censures, which are intended altogether for reformation, not for destruction. So must they be inflicted, that the patient be not utterly discouraged and stripped of hope and comfort; but that, while he suffereth, he may feel his good tendered, and his amendment both aimed at and expected.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(6.) The importance of reproofing discreetly.

(4302.) The manner of the application may turn the benefit into an injury; and then it both strengthens error and wounds the giver. Correction is never in vain. Vice is a miry deepness; if thou strivest to help one out, and dost not, thy stirring him sinks him the further. Fury is the nadder for his chain.

—Felltham, 1668.

(4303.) Reproof must be warily given; for it is like a razor, whose edge is keen, and therefore the sooner rebated. It is dangerous to give a medicine stronger than the disease and constitution of the patient require.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4304.) There is hardly any work of Christianity which requires more wisdom than this of admonition. The temper and quality of the persons, the nature and difference of the crimes, the manner and way of delivering the reproof, the fittest season for it, ought all to be seriously and diligently considered. The rebuke of sin is aptly resembled to the fishing for whales: the mark is big enough, one can hardly miss hitting; but if there be not sea-room enough and line enough, and a dexterity in letting out that line, he that fixes his harping-iron in the whale endangers both himself and his boat. Reproof strikes an iron, as it were, into the conscience of the offender, which makes him struggle and strive to draw the reproof into the sea, to bring him into disgrace and contempt; but if the line be prudently handled, and not pulled too straight nor too quick, the sinner may be drawn to the reproof and saved.

Bone-setters must deal very warily; and physic is given with grave advice, and in dangerous cases not without a consultation. —Swinmock, 1673.

4. Faithfully and seriously.

(4305.) Severity and sharpness may in some cases well agree with the truest friendliness. "Rebuke them sharply," says Paul to Titus, of some, "that they may be sound in the faith." And, to use a heathen man's comparison; a surgeon had he two persons to cut for the stone, the one his dear friend, the other a mere stranger, would he be so foolish, think you, out of love and favour to his friend, as to cut him with a blunter tool or razor than he would cut the other with?

—Galaker, 1574-1654.

(4306.) Reprove seriously. Reproof is an edged tool, and must not be jested with. Cold reproofs are like the noise of cannons a great way off, nothing affrighting us. He that reproves sin merrily, as one that takes a pride to show his wit and to make the company laugh, will destroy the sinner instead of the sin.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4307.) The apostle enjoins Titus to "reprove sharply,"—the word is cuttingly,—"that they may be sound in the faith." He that minds his patient's health will not toy or trifle or play with his mortal diseases; the flesh must feel the plaster, or it will never eat up the corruption in it. Shouldst thou apply an healing plaster to skin the wound aloft, when there is need of a corrosive to take away the dead flesh, thou wouldest be false and unfaithful to thy friend. Reproof, like salt, must have in it both sharpness and savouriness.

Admonition without serious application is like an arrow with too many feathers, which, though we level at the mark, is taken by the wind and carried quite away from it.

Some men shoot their reprehensions, like pellets through a trunk, with no more strength than will kill a sparrow. Those make sinners believe that sin is no such dreadful evil, and the wrath of God no such frightful end. He that would hit the mark and recover the sinner, must draw his arrow of reproof home. Reproof must be powerful; the hammer of the Word breaks not the heart, if it be lightly laid on. It must also be so particular, that the offender may think himself concerned. Some in reproof will seem to aim at the sinner, but so order it, that their arrows shall be sure to miss him; as Domitian, when a boy held for a mark afar off his hand spread—with the fingers severed, he shot his arrows so that all hit the empty spaces between his fingers. Be the reproof never so gracious, the plaster so good, it will be ineffectual if not applied to the patient.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4308.) Alas! it is not a few dull words between jest and earnest, between sleep and waking, as it were, that will waken an ignorant, dead-hearted sinner. When a dull hearer and a dull speaker meet together, a dead heart and a dead exhortation, it is far unlike to have a lively effect. If a man fall down in a swoon, you will not stand trifling with him, but lay hands on him presently, and snatch him up, and rub him, and call aloud to him. If a house be on fire, you will not in a cold affected strain go and tell your neighbour of it, or go and make an oration of the nature and danger of fire; but you will run out, and cry, "Fire! fire!" Matters of moment must be seriously dealt with. To tell a man of his sins as softly as Eli did his sons, reprove him as gently as Jehosaphat did Ahab, "Let not the king say so," doth usually as much harm as good. I am persuaded the very manner of some men's reproof and exhortation hath hardened many a sinner in the way of destruction. To tell them of sin, or of heaven, or hell, in a dull, easy, careless language, doth make men think you are not in good sadness, nor do mean as you speak; but either you scarce think yourselves such things are true, or else you take them in such a slight and indifferent manner. Oh, sirs, deal with sin as sin, and speak of heaven and hell as they are, and not as if you were in jest. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

A. With evident reluctance.

(4309.) Let him that reproves a vice, as much as is possible, do it with words of meekness and commiseration. Let the reprehension come not as a dart shot at the offender's person, but at his crime. Let a man reprehend so that it may appear that he wishes that he had no cause to reprehend. Let him behave himself in the sentence that he passes, as we may imagine a judge would behave himself if he were to condemn his own son, brought as a criminal before him; that is, with the greatest reluctancy and trouble of mind imaginable, that he should be brought under the necessity of such a cruel accident, as to be forced to speak words of death to him whose life he tenders more passionately than his own. —South, 1633-1716.

(4310.) The most difficult province in friendship is the letting a man see his faults and errors; which should, if possible, be so contrived that he may perceive our advice is given him not so much to please ourselves as for his own advantage. The reproaches, therefore, of a friend should always be strictly just, and not too frequent. —Budgell, 1685-1736.

A. Affectionately.

(4311.) As physicians with their bitter drugs do mingle sweet spices, that the sick patient may the more willingly receive them: so ought bitter rebukes to be mingled with gentle admonitions, that the offender might be the better brought to amendment. —Cawdrey, 1609.

(4312.) If reproof doth not savour of humanity it signifieth nothing; it must be like a bitter pill wrapped in gold and tempered with sugar, otherwise it will not go down or work effectually. —Barrow, 1630-1667.

(4313.) To be plain, argues honesty; but to be pleasing, argues discretion. Sores are not to be anguished with a rustic pressure, but gently stroked with a ladies hand. Physicians fire not their eyes at patients, but calmly minister to their diseases.

Let it be so done as the offender may see affection without arrogance. Who blows out candles with too strong a breath does but make them stink, and blows them light again. —Felltham, 1668.

(4314.) Reprove compassionately. Soft words and hard arguments do well together. Passion will heat the sinner's blood, but compassion will heal his conscience. Our reprehension may be sharp, but our spirits must be meek. The probe that searches the wound will put the patient to less pain and do the more good if it be covered with soft lint.

Reproof should be as oils or ointments, rubbed in with the warm fire of love. The surgeon that sets the bone strokes the part. The reprover should have a lion's stout heart, or he will not be faithful, and a lady's soft hand, or he is not like to be successful. —Swinnoch, 1673.

(4315.) There is a hard, dry, and repelling mode of reproof which tends rather to shut up the heart than to open it. The tempest may roar and point its hail-shot at the traveller, but he will rather wrap himself closer in his cloak than quit it till the sun breaks out again. —Cecil, 1748-1810.

(4316.) Preaching on John xiii. 14.—the duty of disciples to wash one another's feet.—Mr. Finlayson of Helmsdale observed, "One way in which disciples wash one another's feet is by reproving one another. But the reproof must not be couched in angry words, so as to destroy the effect; nor in tame, so as to fail of effect. Just as in washing a brother's feet, you must not use boiling water to scald, nor frozen water to freeze them." —Spurgeon.

(4317.) "I remember many years ago," says one, "being struck by a little incident, in a parish where the incumbent, a man of most extraordinary Christian benignity, when in company with a clerical friend, rebuked in very plain terms one of his parishioners for gross misbehaviour on a recent occasion. The reproof was so severe as to astonish his friend, who declared that if he had addressed one of his flock in similar language, he should have expected an irreconcilable breach. The clergyman of the parish answered him with a gentle pat on the shoulder, and with a smile of Christian wisdom, 'Oh, my friend, when there is love in the heart, you may say anything.'"

V. THE MANNER IN WHICH IT IS RECEIVED IS A TEST OF CHARACTER.

(4318.) A man may know that he truly hates sin if he can endure admonition and reproof for sin. He that hates a venomous plant which troubles the ground, will not be displeased if a man come and tell him that he has such a plant in his ground, and will help him to dig it up; surely he cannot be displeased with the party. So here, if a man do truly hate sin, will he be angry with him that shall tell him he is obnoxious to such an evil, which will hurt him dangerously, and damn his soul if it be not helped? Surely no. —Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4319.) Though toads are no sooner touched, but they swell and are ready to spit out their poison in the face of him that handles them, yet sheep will be felt and shorn, and suffer their sores to be dressed with patience. Though fools hate him that "reproveth in the gate," yet "rebuke a wise man, and he will love thee." —Swinnock, 1673.

(4320.) Iron, which is one of the baser metals, may be hammered, and subjected to the most intense heat of the furnace; but though you may soften it for the time, you can never make it ductile like the precious metals. But gold, which is the most excellent of all, is the most pliant and easy wrought on, being capable of being drawn out to a degree which exceeds belief. So the most excellent tempers are the most easily wrought on by spiritual counsel and godly admonitions, but the viler sort, like the iron, are stubborn, and cannot be made pliant. —Salter.

VI. HOW IT IS TO BE RECEIVED.

1. With self-distrust.

(4321.) It may be you think that they are censorious in judging you to be unconverted when you are not; and to be worse and in more danger than you are, and speaking harder of you than you deserve. But it is you that should be most suspicious of yourselves, and afraid in so great a matter of being deceived. A stander-by may see more than a player: I am sure he that is awake may see more of you than you of yourselves when you are asleep.

But suppose it were as you imagine; it is his love that mistakenly attempteth your good; he intendeth you no harm: it is your salvation that he desireth; it is your damnation that he would prevent. You have cause to love him, and be thankful for his good-will, and not to be angry with him, and reproach him for his mistakes.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. Meekly.

(4322.) Oh, that I might never be so void of love to my fallen brother as not to give him a serious reproof, nor so void of love to myself as not to receive a serious reproof! The nipping frosts, though not so pleasant, are as profitable as the summer sunshine. There is no probable way of curing some diseases but by blisters and cupping glasses and painful medicines; is it not better for me to accept an admonition and amend, than to walk on in a wicked way to my destruction?

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4323.) Let us as wise men be patient in receiving admonition. The stomach of man naturally rises against this bitter physic, though it conduces so much to his health. Faithful reproof is the awakening a man out of sleep, and such are very apt to be angry. The hedgehog bristles up her prickles, and will pierce, if it be possible, those that come to take hold of her.

There are two things that cause men to rage against reproof.

1. Guilt of the sin objected. Guilt makes men angry when they are searched; and, like horses that are galled, to kick if they be but touched. The easiest medicines and mildest waters are troublesome to sore eyes. There is scarce a more probable sign that the crime objected is true, than wrath and bitterness against the person that charges as with it.

2. Love to sin makes men impatient under reproof. When a person's sin is to him as "the apple of his eye," no wonder if he be offended at any that shall touch it.

But grace will teach a Christian contentedly to take those potions that are wholesome, though they are not toothsome. —Swinnock, 1673.

(4324.) They that are dwarfs in religion may do service to the tallest, if they be willing to accept it. A rush-candle may give me some light if I do not wilfully shut my eyes; a brazen bell may call me to prayers, as well as one of silver, if I do not stop my ears. The smallest and meanest creatures were serviceable to the great God against the Egyptians; and shall my proud heart refuse the help of mean Christians against the enemies of my salvation? Did a damsel possessed with a devil bring her master much temporal gain, and may not a poor servant, filled with the Spirit, bring me much spiritual gain? What, or who, am I, that none must teach me but those that are eminent in grace and gifts? I am sure I have nothing that is good but what I have received; and this pride of my heart is too great an evidence that I am but poor in holiness. Those branches that are fullest laden bend most downwards. Those trees that abound in clusters of fruit do not disdain to receive sap from the mean earth which every beast tramples on. It is no wonder that a soul declines in strength, that refuses its food because it is not brought by the steward, but by some inferior person of the family. If Satan can keep me in this proud humour, he does not doubt but to keep me in a starving condition, and to hinder the efficacy of all means for my growth in grace. When this drowsy once seizes upon my vitals, I may expect a consumption of my whole body. Lord, it were my duty to hear Thy voice, though it were through the mouth of a Balaam! Thou hast sometimes conveyed the water of life through those pipes of lead, and sent considerable presents to Thy chosen by contemptible messengers. —Swinnock, 1673.

(4325.) Perhaps you think that the preacher, or private admonisher, is too plain with you; but you should consider that self-love is like to make you partial in your own cause, and therefore a more incapable judge than they. And you should consider that God hath commanded them to deal plainly, and told them that else the people's blood shall be required at their hands; and that God best knoweth what medicine and diet is fittest for your disease; and that the case is of such grand importance (whether you shall live in heaven or hell for ever!) that it is scarce possible for a minister to be too plain and serious with you; and that your disease is so obstinate that gentler means have been too long frustrated, and therefore sharper must be tried; else why were you not converted by gentler dealing until now? If you fall down in a swoon, or be ready to be drowned, you will give leave to the standers-by to handle you a little more roughly than at another time, and will not bring your action against them for laying hands on you, or ruffling your silks and bravery; if your house be on fire, you will give men leave to speak to you in another manner than when they modulate their voices into a civil and complimentary tone. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4326.) An angry, passionate disposition, impatient of reproof, deters men from doing the office of friends in a faithful reprehension. For some minds are more raging and tumultuous than the sea itself; so that if Christ Himself should rebuke them, instead of being calm, they would rage and roar so much the louder. That admonition that would reclaim others does but chafe and provoke them; as the same breath of wind that cools some things kindles and inflames others.

But few people are able, and fewer willing, to put themselves to so great an inconvenience for another's good, and to raise a storm about their own ears to do an odious, ungrateful piece of service for an ungrateful person; and therefore men usually deal with such currish, sharp natures, as they do with mastiffs, they are fain to stroke them, though they deserved to be cudgelled. They flatter and commend them to keep them quiet.

From the consideration of which we easily see the greater misery and disadvantage of passionate, angry persons; their passion does not only bereave them of their own eyes, but also of the benefit of other men's; which he that is of a gentle and a tractable nature enjoys in the midst of all his errors.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4327.) We may observe of brambles that they always grow crooked; for by reason of their briars and thorns no hand can touch them so as to bend them straight. And so it is with some dispositions: they grow into a confirmed, settled obliquity, because their sharpness makes them unfit to be handled by discipline and admonition. They are a terror and a grievance to those that they converse with; and to attempt to advise them out of their irregularities, is as if a surgeon should offer to dress a wounded lion; he must look to perish in the attempt, and to be torn in pieces for his pains.

It was surely of very great importance to Nabal (1 Sam. xxv.) to have been admonished of the rough, unadvised answer that he returned to David's soldiers; for it was like to have brought a ruin upon him and his family and his whole estate, yet none would do him that seasonable kindness, because of the rudeness and churlishness of his manners: for in the 17th verse that character is given of him, that he "was such a son of Belial, that a man could not speak to him."

To be foolish and to be angry too, is for a man first to cast himself into a pit, and then to hinder others from pulling him out.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4328.) It was a maxim of Bishop Griswold—"When censured or accused, to correct—not to justify—my error."

A certain minister with more zeal than discretion once became impressed with the thought that the bishop was a mere formalist in religion, and that it was his duty to go and warn him of his danger, and exhort him to "flee from the wrath to come." Accordingly he called upon the bishop, very solemnly made known his errand, and forthwith entered upon his reproof.

The bishop listened in silence till his visitor had closed a severely denunciatory exhortation, and then in substance replied as follows: "My dear friend, I do not wonder that they who witness the inconsistency of my daily conduct, and see how poorly I adorn the doctrine of God my Saviour, should think I have no religion. I often fear for myself that such is the case, and feel very grateful to you for giving me this warning."

The reply was made with such evidently unaffected humility, and with such deep sincerity, that if an audible voice from heaven had attested the genuineness of his Christian character, it could not more effectually have silenced his kindly-intending but misjudging censor, or more completely disabused him of his false impressions. He immediately acknowledged his error, begged the bishop's pardon, and ever afterwards looked upon him as one of the distinguished lights of the Christian world.

—Episcopal Record.

a. Thankfully.

(4329.) Had I a careful and pleasant companion that should show me my angry face in a glass, I should not at all take it ill. Some are wont to have a looking-glass held to them while they wash, though to little purpose; but to behold a man's self so unnaturally disguised and disordered, will conduce not a little to the impeachment of anger.

—Plutarch.

(4330.) Patients are displeased with a physician who doth not prescribe to them, and think he gives them over. And why are none so affected towards a physician of the mind, as to conclude he despairs of their recovery to a right way of thinking, if he tell them nothing which may be for their good?

—Epictetus, B.C. 60.

(4331.) Oh, it is a blessed thing to have others tell us of our faults, and as it were to pull us out of the fire with violence, as Jude speaks; rather to pull us out with violence, with sharp rebukes, than we should perish in our sins. If a man be to weed his ground, he sees need of the benefit of others; if a man be to demolish his house, he will be thankful to others for their help; so he that is to pull down his corruption, that old house, he should be thankful to others that will tell him, "This is rotten, and this is to blame;" who if he be not thankful for seasonable reproof, he knows not what self-judging means. If any man be so uncivil when a man shows him a spot on his garment to grow choleric, will we not judge him to be an unreasonable man? And so when a man shall be told, "This will hinder your comfort another day;" if men were not spiritually besotted, would they swell and be angry against such a man.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4332.) We should much esteem the private admonitions and reprehensions of our godly friends; for in nothing more than this, is the saying of the wise man verified: "Two are better than one, for if they fall, the one will help up his fellow: but woe be to him that is alone when he falleth, for he hath not another to help him up." When men are apt through their drowsy sloth to neglect their weighty business, or to forswear their journey by over-sleeping themselves, they hold it a great kindness in those that will call them up betimes, though it be not pleasant for the instant to be broken of their sleep. But what business so weighty as to make our calling and election sure? what journey more important than to travel towards our heavenly country? and wherein are we more sluggish and apt to lose our best opportunities by over-sleeping ourselves in carnal security, if we be not roused up with the reproofs of faithful friends?

Those that fall into a lethargy, after their recovery think themselves beholden to such about them as by their pricking and nipping them kept them waking, though it may be for the present it was a thankless office, being so distasteful to their humour and appetite. But we are prone to fall into the spiritual lethargy of carnal security, which is more dangerous and pernicious than ten thousand bodily deaths; and therefore by so much more are we to esteem the kind office of such a faithful friend who, by nips and pricks of admonitions and reproof, keeps from falling into or continuing in this sleep of death.

When our bodily sores begin to fester at the bottom, and to breed dead flesh, and when our bodies abound with hurtful humours, we not only voluntarily send for the surgeon and physician, but thank and reward them, though to our smart and pain they used to cure us corrosives and strong potions: and shall we not be as careful for the recovery of our souls, and as thankful to those who use these good means to effect the cure, although they be distasteful, yea, painful and loathsome to our carnal sense and appetite?

—Downham, 1642.

(4333.) Far be it from any here to be like those wicked wretches whom the prophet inveighs against, that hate those that reprove them: to hate their instructors, because they are sometimes also necessarily correctors, to hate them for that for which rather they ought to love them. You must not, as the psalmist speaks, be as the horse or mule without understanding. Horses and mules can well endure, and are wont to take notice of them that feed them, and stroke them, and make much of them; but they cannot endure those that come about to drench them, or bleed them, or to meddle with their sores, though they intend nothing therein but their good; or because they have sense, whereby they perceive some present good in the one, but they have no reason to apprehend any future good in the other. Creatures endued with reason must be wiser than they, and love their teacher as well reproving and correcting, when just occasion is, as speaking fair and commending.

—Galaker, 1574-1654.

RESURRECTION.

1. The moral reasonableness of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body.

(4334.) The body shall be awaked out of its dead sleep, and quickened into a glorious immortal life. The soul and body are the essential parts of man; and though the inequality be great in their operations that respect holiness, yet their concurrence is necessary. Good actions are designed by the counsel and resolution of the spirit, but performed by the ministry of the flesh. Every grace expresses itself in visible actions by the body. In the sorrows of repentance it supplies tears, in fastings its appetites are restrained, in thanksgivings the tongue breaks forth into the joyful praises of God. All the victories over sensible pleasure and pain are obtained by the soul in conjunction with the body. Now it is most becoming the Divine goodness not to deal so differently, that the soul should be everlastingly happy, and the body lost in forgetfulness; the one glorified in heaven, the other remain in the dust. From their first setting out in the world to the grave they ran the same race, and shall enjoy the same reward. Here the body is the consort of the soul in obedience and sufferings, hereafter in fruition. When the crown of purity or palm of martyrdom shall be given by the great Judge in the view of all, they shall both partake in the honour. Of this we have an earnest in the resurrection of Christ in His true body, who "is the first-fruits of them that sleep."

—Bates, 1625-1699.

2. "With what body do they come?"

(4335.) Little would an unbeliever think what a body God will make of this that now is corruptible flesh and blood! It shall then be loathsome and troublesome no more. It shall be hungry, or thirsty, or weary, or cold, or pained no more. As the stars of heaven do differ from a clod of earth, or from a carrion in a ditch, so will our glorified, immortal bodies differ from this mortal corruptible flesh. If a skilful workman can turn a little earth and ashes into such curious transparent glasses as we daily see; and if a little seed that bears no show of such a thing can produce the more beautiful flowers of the earth; and if a little acorn can bring forth the greatest oak; why should we once doubt whether the seed of everlasting life and glory, which is now in the blessed souls with Christ, can by Him communicate a perfection to the flesh that is dissolved into its elements? There is no true beauty but that which is there received from the face of God; and if a glimpse made Moses' face to shine, what glory will God's glory communicate to us, when we have the fullest, endless intuition of it? There only is the strength, and there is the riches, and there is the honour, and there is the pleasure; and here are but the shadows, and dreams, and names, and images of these precious things.

—Baxter, 1615-1591.

(4336.) "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." This is God's law concerning the seed. It must be dead, or it cannot be made alive. This is evidently true. So is it with the body. It must die, in order that it may be made alive.

Then, too, in the process of making the seed alive, there is also a resemblance to the way in which the body is to be made alive. "As for that which thou sowest," as to the seed, St. Paul says, "Thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat or of some other grain." You do not sow the very grain that shall rise. That seed which you sow is dissolved. It melts and disappears. And yet out of that seed, out of the substance of it, out of the particles of matter of which it was formed, God, by His mysterious and almighty power brings forth a body like the other, and belonging to the same class: for "to every seed" He gives "its own body." No one ever heard of a man sowing wheat and having barley spring up. The crop always follows the seed. So is it with the body of man. Like the seed, "thou sowest not that body that shall be." That body which thou sowest melts and disappears. Yet out of that body, out of the materials of which it was made, will God by His mysterious and almighty power raise up another of the same kind; just as the grain of wheat which springs out of the earth is like that which was sown in it, and as truly formed out of the other as that is: so that the risen man himself will know that he is the same man, and all who loved him will know it too.

—Chamneys.

(4337.) We may find it difficult to explain how the identity of the body can be preserved while the matter composing it is changed; we may be left to conjecture whether it is by sameness in the chemical composition, or by a germ of the matter of the old body forming the basis or groundwork of the new; but our difficulty in explaining can present no reason for denying the fact, for we meet with virtual exemplifications of it every day.

It is a well-known fact that we lose something like a seventh part of the matter of our bodies, and acquire a seventh of new matter, every year; or, in other words, that the matter of our bodies undergoes an entire change every seven years. That of which they are now composed was not connected with them ten years ago; that of which they were composed then has now passed away into other combinations; but while the matter has been changed the identity has been preserved. The body as it exists now is responsible for all that was done by the body as it existed then. A man in this country twenty years since, let us say, committed the crime of murder; shortly afterwards he escaped to Australia, and has contrived hitherto to elude the vigilance of the law. Suppose, however, that he is discovered and arraigned for the crime committed so long ago. It may be urged that the matter of his body has undergone several changes since then; that the hand which committed the murder, as regards the particles of matter composing it, has now no existence; that that hand of his is composed of matter entirely new, and so with his whole material system; that, therefore, the man cannot be held responsible for the crime committed by a different body; and that it would be absurd and unjust to punish this body for that which was done by another. Would the plea be deemed valid in any court of law? Certainly not; for though the matter of the body has been so entirely changed, the body is the same.

And so will it be in the resurrection of the dead: though the matter of the body be changed, its identity will be preserved, and the body raised will be responsible for all that was done by that which lived and was laid in the grave.

Or take another illustration. Look at a child in the playfulness of infancy; then trace in imagination that child's growth until it has attained the strength and stature of manhood; then follow it onward until it reaches the decrepitude of old age. How different it is in its different stages! How the full-grown man contrasts with the playful child, and the feeble old man with both! How different, both in the matter composing, and the form which it assumes, is the body in its infancy from the body in its manhood! how different in its vigorous manhood from its old age! And yet, as regards identity it is throughout the same body. That which age has withered is the same which in manhood was full of strength; that which in manhood was full of strength is the same which lay once in the feebleness of infancy. So the body raised from the dead, though differing in the matter composing it, and in the form which it assumes, will, as regards identity, be the same with that which lived and died.

—Landels.

(4338.) "Some men may say, How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" How can the same body which falls into dust be raised again, to become anew the tabernacle of the immortal spirit? The particles of which it is composed may be scattered to the four winds, they may assume new forms, they may be made to contribute to the formation of other beings—of plants, of animals, of men. How can each several particle be disentangled, how shall each be brought together again to constitute the same body which was dissolved at death?

Now we presume to put no limits upon the almighty power of God. We do not doubt that amid all the ceaseless infinite fluctuations of the material particles, His eye could trace each grain of dust, and His hand collect it, and bring it back to reconstitute the body. But we contend that any such process is as unnecessary as it is improbable. We maintain that the same body which has been laid in the grave may be raised at the last day; though not one single material particle which went to constitute the one body, shall be found in the other.

For what is it that is necessary to the identity of the body? The identity of the body does not depend on the identity of the material particles of which it is composed. These are in a state of perpetual flux. The body of our childhood is not the body of our youth, nor the body of our youth that of our manhood, nor the body of our manhood that of our old age. Every particle has changed, and yet it is the same body: the person to whom it belongs still continues the same person.

If you insist upon it that every particle of matter of which my body is built must be brought together to form my new resurrection body, then I ask, What body during this present life is my true body? Is it the body of my childhood, or of my youth, or of my old age? The body in which I die is no more truly mine than the body with which I came into the world. Both are mine, both are in some sense the same, and yet they have not a single material particle in common. What possible reason is there, then, for contending that the body which is laid in the grave must be brought together again, particle for particle, at the resurrection, when it is no more essentially a part of myself, than my body at any other stage of existence.

The only thing of which we need to be assured is, that the principle of identity which governs the formation of the body in this life, shall govern its formation at the resurrection. In the ever-flowing torrent of life, as wave after wave passes through our bodily frame, bringing with it growth and variety in the structure, there is some principle, or law, or specific form, call it what you will, which remains ever the same. The organism is essentially one, despite the modifications of size, of form, of inward constitution.

This holds in every reign of nature where there is life. From the acorn buried in the earth there springs first the little slender stalk, the germinant shoot hidden between its two cotyledons, then the sapling, then the monarch of the forest. But the oak and the germinant shoot are one and the same vegetable existence. The butterfly which unfolds its wings of purple and gold in the summer's sun is the same creature which was but lately a chrysalis, and before that a crawling worm, and before that an embryo in a tiny egg. And is it not the same with man? Is not the human embryo the same individual when it becomes child, youth, old man? And yet does there remain in the oak, in the butterfly, in the man, a single one of the ponderable molecules which existed in the germ, the egg, the embryo? What physiologist would venture to affirm there is? And still we repeat, it is the same vegetable, the same insect, the same man.

What, then, is this thing which remains ever the same, the same in the vegetable in all its developments, the same in the insect in all its metamorphoses, the same in the human body in every phase of its existence? What is this, which never perishes, is never destroyed, in all the changes and fluctuations of the material organism? It escapes all our investigations; we see it only in its manifestations, in the phenomena of life; but that it is a reality all observation goes to show: and if through all the changes of the body during this life, this principle continues in all its force, why may it not survive the shock of death? Why may not this specific form, as Gregory of Nyssa terms it, remain united to the soul, as he conjectured (and as other thinkers like Leibnitz have supposed), after its separation from the body, and thus become at length the agent in the resurrection, by reconstituting, though in a new and transfigured condition, the body which was dissolved at death? Why may not the same body, which was sown in corruption, be raised to incorruption, and that which was sown a natural body, be raised a spiritual body? There is at least nothing improbable in such a supposition; there is everything in the analogies of Nature to confirm it; and when Revelation is silent, we may be thankful for such glimpses of probability as come to us in aid of our faith. —Perowne.

3. Is less inexplicable than the creation of the body.

(4339.) Creation is more inexplicable than resurrection. For it is not the same thing to rekindle an extinguished lamp, and to show fire that has never yet appeared. It is not the same thing to raise up again a house that has fallen down, and to produce one which has never at all had an existence. —Chrysostom, 347-407.

[Modern preachers will probably prefer to use this argument, drawn from the creation of the body, as an illustration of the fact that our inability to explain the method of the resurrection of the body is no reason for refusing to believe in it.]

4. Analogies in nature and art.

[See next section of this article: "§. A necessary caution as to the use of the foregoing illustrations."]

(4340.) Trees, in the winter-time, appear to the view of all men as if they were withered and quite dead, yet, when the spring-time comes, they become alive again, and, as before, do bring forth their buds, blossoms, leaves, and fruit. The reason is, because the body, grain, and arms of the tree are all joined and fastened to the root, where the sap lies all the winter-time, and from thence, by reason of so near conjunction, it is derived in the spring-time to all the parts of the tree. Even so the bodies of men have their winter also, and that is in death, in which time they are turned into dust and so remain for a time dead and rotten; yet, in the spring-time, that is, in the last day, at the resurrection of all flesh, then, by means of the mystical union with Christ, His divine and quickening virtue shall stream from thence to all the bodies of His members, and cause them to live again, and that to life eternal.

—Strode.

(4341.) Let us not be like them without faith, that think the bodies are lost for ever that are cast into the grave; like children seeing the silver cast into the furnace, think it utterly cast away, till they see it come out again a pure vessel.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4342.) I have stood in a smith's forge, and seen him put a rusty, cold, dull piece of iron into the fire, and after a while he has taken the very same individual piece of iron out of the fire, hot, bright, sparkling: and thus it is with our bodies; they are laid down in the grave dead, heavy, earthly, but at the resurrection this mortal shall put on immortality; at the general conflagration this dead, heavy, earthly body, shall arise living, lightsome, glorious: which made Job so confident, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, . . . and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." —Fuller, 1608-1661.

(4343.) Paper—that article so useful in human life, that repository of all the arts and sciences, that minister of all governments, that broker in all trade and commerce, that second memory of the human mind, that stable pillar of an immortal name—takes its origin from vile rags. The rag-dealer trudges on foot, or drives his cart through the towns and villages, and his arrival is the signal for searching every corner, and gathering every old and useless shred. These he takes to the mill, and there they are picked, washed, mashed, shaped, and sized, in short, formed into a fabric beautiful enough to venture unabashed even into the presence of monarchs and princes.

This reminds me of the resurrection of my mortal body. When deserted by the soul, I know not what better the body is than a worn and rejected rag. Accordingly it is buried in the earth, and there gnawed by worms, and reduced to dust and ashes. If, however, man's art and device can produce so pure and white a fabric as paper from filthy rags, what should hinder God by His mighty power to raise this vile body of mine from the grave, and refine and fashion it like unto the glorious body of the Lord Jesus Christ?

—Scriven, 1629-1693.

(4344.) There are things in nature which suggest a resurrection of the dead.

Such is the well-known analogy presented by the changes which many creatures undergo. The insect, at first a creeping worm, crawls on the earth, its home the ground, or some humble plant or decaying matter, which feeds its voracious appetite. The time of its first change arrives. It weaves itself a shroud; it makes itself a coffin; and under the soil, in some cranny of the wall, in a convenient fissure of rock or tree, as in a catacomb, it finds a quiet grave. There, shrouded and confined and buried, and to all appearance dead, it lies till its appointed change. The hour arrives. It bursts these ceremonies; and a pure, winged, beautiful creature, it leaves them to roam henceforth in sunny skies, and find its bed in the soft bosom, and its food in the nectar of odorous flowers.

Paul saw our grave in the furrow of the plough; our burial in the corn dropped into the soil; our decay in the change undergone by the seed; and our resurrection, when, bursting its sheath and pushing aside the clod, it rises green and beautiful, to wave its head in summer days, high above the ground that was once its grave.

—Guthrie.

(4345.) Why should it be thought incredible that God should raise the dead? The power required for this is not greater, after all, than is exercised in the productions and changes which are constantly taking place. Natural processes and phenomena do not prove the fact, but they may certainly illustrate the possibility of a resurrection. You see the oak springing from the acorn—the plant from the seed which perhaps has lain in a state of death for many centuries—the worm leaving the chrysalis state, and emerging from it a “creature aerial, winged, glorious, radiant with beauty, endowed with new senses and new faculties, to seek in a higher element purer food and nobler enjoyments.” Is not the power requisite to produce these changes competent to raise the dead? They are not the less wonderful that they are so common, and their very commonness should rather strengthen our faith in the doctrine of the resurrection; for if such exercises of power are frequent, why should we find it hard to believe that one may be added to the many for the purpose of recalling the dead to life?

It is true, that if we take the popular view of the resurrection, or more correctly the view which was at one time popular—that the body raised from the dead will be composed of the very same matter as the body which was laid in the grave;—if we take this view of the resurrection, I say, the objections which are brought against it cannot be so summarily disposed of. It is in vain that we appeal to the power of God; for the objectors will tell us that such a resurrection involves a contradiction—what is absolutely impossible—impossible even to God. The body, they say, and say truly, mingles with the soil in which it is laid; it is drawn up into the plant which grows on the surface; the plant is soon devoured by some animal, and affords nutriment to its system; that animal, and the plant also, it may be, become food for man. Thus, the matter of one man's body becomes long afterwards part of another man's, so that, at death, the body of the two may have been composed of precisely the same matter. Now it is impossible that in the resurrection the same matter can be in two bodies at the same time; hence the resurrection of the body cannot take place.

To this objection we need only reply, that the resurrection you describe is not the resurrection of Scripture. In so far as the Bible gives an explanation of the event, it discountenances the supposition that the body which rises from the grave will be composed of the very same matter as the body which was laid there. “Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die. And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be.”

—Landels.

(4346.) I see before me an old and battered cup which many a black lip hath touched, out of which many a villain's throat has received moisture. It is battered and covered with filth. Who could tell what metal it is? It is brought in and given to the silversmith; he no sooner receives it than he begins to break it into pieces; he dashes it into shivers again and again; he pounds it until he has broken it, then he puts it into his fining pot and melts it. Now you begin to see it sparkle again, and by and by he beats it out and fashions it into a goodly chalice out of which a king may drink. Is this the same? the very same thing. This glorious cup; is this the old battered silver we saw just now? silver, did I say, it looked like battered filth. Yes, it is the same, and we who are here below like vessels, alas! too unfit for the Master's use; vessels which have even given comfort to the evil ones, and helped to do the work of Satan, we shall be put into the furnace of the grave, and be there melted down and fused and fashioned into a glorious wine-cup, that shall stand upon the banqueting table of the Son of God.

—Spurgeon.

5. A necessary caution as to the use of the foregoing illustrations.

(4347.) We are accustomed in our arguments on this subject to appeal to natural phenomena; but these are by no means such as to afford proof of the event. The apostle introduces into his argument on the resurrection the grain of wheat, which is not quickened except it die; but he does not introduce it as a proof (he was too good a logician for that), but only to illustrate what he had otherwise proved, and to obviate a supposed objection.

The plant springs from the grain of seed, and the oak from the acorn, but these are by no means analogous to the resurrection of the body. The points of discrepancy are numerous and striking. In these cases, one oak or one plant proceeds from another very much as men are propagated by natural generation, not as when the identical body is raised from the dead. Then the plant or the oak does not decay, and another plant or oak spring out of its ashes, as the resurrection body rises out of the ashes of the body which was laid in the tomb. Even the acorn does not become dust before it germinates, like as the dead body is dissolved. And, moreover, there is not that identity between the oak which produced the acorn and the oak which sprang out of it, that there is between the body which is buried and the body which comes forth from the grave.

Take another case: the worm enters the chrysalis state, remains apparently dead for a time, then emerges a winged insect, glorious as compared with what it was; the repulsive has become beautiful, the weak comparatively strong; doomed to crawl slowly along before, it now flutters in the sunbeam, and floats on the breeze; is susceptible of new sensations, and endowed with new powers. It is a wonderful transition, certainly, and may well illustrate the possibility of a resurrection, but still they are not analogous. The identity between the butterfly and the worm is preserved, and the chrysalis state somewhat resembles the state of death, but there is no corruption or dissolution, as in the case of the body.

Again: the earth during winter, frost-bound and covered with snow, is often said to resemble the state of death; and we know how in spring it again teems with life, how plants spring up in the place of, and of the same species as others which have decayed; but neither in this case is the analogy complete. The reanimated earth has not been dissolved like the body; and though the new plants are of the same species as their decayed predecessors, sors, they are not identical. Thus, in all the phenomena of nature you can find nothing strictly analogous to the resurrection of the dead; and though you could, I need not tell you that analogy is not proof, and that, though it could be found in nature, it would afford no reason for the conclusion that the body will be raised. —Landels.

6. Replies to objections.

(4348.) There are some who, observing that the spirit is parted from the flesh, that the flesh is turned into corruption, that its corruption is reduced to dust, that this dust is so dissolved into elementary parts that it is incapable of being seen by the eyes of man, despair of the possibility of the resurrection being brought to pass, and whilst they gaze upon the dry bones, they distrust its being possible for these to be clothed with flesh, and again flushing into life; which persons, if they do not hold the resurrection of the body on the principle of obedience, ought certainly to hold it on the principle of reason.

For what does the universe every day but imitate in its elements our resurrection? Thus, by the lapse of the minutes of the day, the temporal light itself, as it were, dies, when, the shade of night coming on, that light which was beheld is withdrawn from sight, and it daily rises again, as it were, when the light that was withdrawn from our eyes, upon the night being suppressed, is renewed afresh.

From the progress of the seasons, too, we see the shrubs lose the greenness of their foliage and cease from putting forth fruit; and on a sudden, as if from dried-up wood, by a kind of resurrection coming, we see the leaves burst forth, the fruit grow big, and the whole tree clothed with renewed beauty.

—Gregory, 354-604.

(4349.) We unceasingly behold the small seeds of trees committed to the moistness of the ground, wherefrom not long afterwards we behold large trees arise, and bring forth leaves and fruit. Let us then consider the little seed of any tree whatever, which is thrown into the ground, for a tree to be produced therefrom, and let us take in, if we are capable of it, where in that exceeding littleness of the seed that most enormous tree was buried which proceeded from it? Where was the wood? where was the bark? where the verdure of the foliage? where the abundance of the fruit? Was there anything of the kind perceived in the seed when it was thrown into the ground? And yet, by the secret Artificer of all things ordering all in a wonderful manner, both in the softness of the seed there lay buried the roughness of the bark, and in its tenderness there was hidden the strength of its timber, and in its dryness, fertility of productiveness.

What wonder, then, if that finest dust which to our eyes is resolved into the elements, He, when He is minded, fashions again into the human being, who from the finest seeds resuscitates the largest trees? And so, seeing that we have been created reasoning beings, we ought to collect the hope of our own resurrection from the mere aspect and contemplation of the objects of nature.

—Gregory, 354-604.

(4350.) What is the wise argument of the gainsayers; rather, I should say, their exceeding simple one? "Why, how, when the body is mixed up with the earth, and is become earth, and this again is removed elsewhere, how," say they, "shall it rise again?" For to thee this seems impossible, but not to the unsleeping Eye. For unto that all things are clear. And thou in that confusion seest no distinction of parts; but He knows them all. Since also the heart of thy neighbour thou knowest not, nor the things in it; but He knows all. If, then, because of thy not knowing how God raises men up, thou believest not that He does raise them, wilt thou disbelieve that He knows also what is in thy mind? for neither is that obvious to view. And yet in the body it is visible matter, though it be dissolved; but those thoughts are invisible. Shall He, then, who knows with all certainty the invisible things, not see the things which be visible, and easily detach the scattered parts of the body?

Chrysostom, 347-407.

(4351.) It is objected that the resurrection of these numerical bodies, when they are devoured and turned into the substance of other bodies, is a thing incredible.

*Answers:—*1. If it be neither against the power, the wisdom, or the will of God, it is not incredible at all; but it is not against any of these. Who can say that God is unable to raise the dead, who seeth so much greater things performed by Him in the daily motion of the sun, or earth, and in the support and course of the whole frame of nature? He that can every spring give a kind of resurrection to plants and flowers and fruits of the earth, can easily raise our bodies from the dust; and no man can prove that the wisdom of God, nor yet His will, are against our resurrection; but that both are, for it may be proved by His promises. Shall that which is beyond the power of man be, therefore, objected as a difficulty to God?

2. Yea, it is congruous to the wisdom and governing justice of God, that the same body which was partaker with the soul in sin and duty should be partaker with it in suffering or felicity.

3. The Lord Jesus Christ did purposely die and rise again in His human body, to put the resurrection out of doubt, by undeniable, ocular demonstration, and by the certainty of belief.

4. There is some natural reason for the resurrection in the soul's inclination to its body. As it is unwilling to lay it down, it will be willing to re-assume it when God shall say the time is come. As we may conclude at night when they are going to bed, that the people of city or country will rise the next morning and put on their clothes, and not go naked about the streets, because there is in them a natural inclination to rising and to clothes, and a natural averseness to lie still, or to go unclothed; so may we conclude, from the soul's natural inclination to its body, that it will re-assume it as soon as God consenteth.

5. And all our objections, which reason from supposed contradictions, vanish, because none of us all have so much skill in physics as to know what it is which individualeteth this numerical body, and so what it is which is to be restored; but we all confess that it is not the present mass of flesh and humours which, being in a continual flux, is not the same this year which it was the last, and may vanish long before we die.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4352.) Some have said, "But when men's bodies are dead, and are committed to the grave, they are often digged up, and the careless sexton mixes them up with common mould; nay, it sometimes happens that they are carted away from the churchyard, and strewn over the fields, to become a rich manure for wheat, so that the particles of the body are absorbed into the corn that is growing, and they travel round in a circle until they become the food of man. So that the particle which man have been in the body of one man enters into the body of another. Now," say they, "how can all these particles be traced?" Our answer is, If it were necessary, every atom could be traced. Omnipotence and Omniscience could do it. If it were needful that God should search out and find out every individual atom that ever existed, He would be able to detect the present abode of every single particle. The astronomer is able to tell the position of one star by the aberration of the motion of the other; by his calculation, apart from observation, he can discover an unknown orb; its hugeness puts it within his reach. But to God there is nothing little or great; He can find out the orbit of one atom by the aberration in the orbit of another atom, He can pursue and overtake each separate particle. But recollect this is not necessary at all, for the identity may be preserved without their being the same atoms. Just go back to the excellent illustration of our text. The wheat is just the same, but in the new wheat that has grown up there may not be one solitary particle of that matter which was in the seed cast into the ground. A little seed that shall not weigh the hundredth part of an ounce falls into the earth, and springs up and produces a forest tree that shall weigh two tons. Now, if there be any part of the original seed in the tree, it must be but in the proportion of a millionth part, or something less than that. And yet is the tree positively identical with the seed—it is the same thing. And so there may be only a millionth part of the particles of my body in the new body which I shall wear, but yet it may be still the same. It is not the identity of the matter that will make positive identity.

—Spurgeon.

7. Its diverse issues.

(4353.) When the archangel's trumpet sounds, then the saints shall sing; the bodies of believers shall come out of the grave to be made happy, as the chief butler came out of the prison, and was restored to all his dignity at the court; but the bodies of the wicked shall come out of the grave, as the chief baker out of prison, to be executed (Gen. xl. 22).

—Watson, 1696.

8. Easter Sunday.

(4354.) Surely, even the angels in heaven keep these pascal solemnities with joy: the glory of that victorious Lion who hath triumphed over death and hell is even to them matter of rejoicing. It is the Sabbath of the new world, our passover from everlasting death to life; our true jubilee, the first day of our week, and the chief in our calendar. Herein our Phoenix rose from His ashes, our Eagle renewed His feathers, the First-begotten of the dead was born from the womb of the earth. Christ, like the sun eclipsed by the moon, got Himself out by His resurrection; and, as the sun by the moon,

He was darkened by them to whom He gave light. His death did justify us, His resurrection did justify His death. He buried the law with Himself, and both with honour; He raised up the gospel with Himself, and both with glory. His resurrection was the first stone of the foundation, "In Christ shall all be made alive," and the last stone of the roof, for God assures us He shall come to judgment, by this token, that He raised Him up from the dead (Acts xvii. 31). Satan danced on His grave for joy; when he had Him there once, he thought Him sure enough; but He rose again and trampled on the devil's throne with triumph. This is the faith peculiar to Christians: the Jews believe Him dead, not living; we believe that He is risen, and sits at the right hand of God. As Moses led the people to Canaan through the wilderness, so Christ leads us to heaven through the grave. His resurrection is not only the object of our faith, but the example of our hope. We all carry mortality about us, and the strongest man is but like Nebuchadnezzar's image; though his head be of gold, and his ribs of brass, yet his feet are of clay: a stone thrown at the feet overturns this great image, and down falls man. But, "O death, I will be thy death." Durst death kill Christ? Christ therefore shall kill death. "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." But, as one saith, the hope of life immortal is the life of our life mortal. Death and the grave swallow all, and then burst; as crammed covetousness disgorgeth itself by a prodigal heir.

The Jews craved a sign, and had it (Matt. xii. 38, 39); yet then spake against it, or wondered at it. To us it shall be more than a sign, it shall have wonder, and wonder enough; but we will not lose our fruit or part therein for a world. Him, that this day rose from the clods, we expect from the clouds, to raise our bodies, to perform His promises, to finish our faith, to perfect our glory, and to draw us unto Himself. I do not say, Come, see the place where they laid Him, that is empty; but, Come, see the place where He is; here is the Lord. I say not with Mary, They have taken away the Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him; He is personally in heaven, He is mystically, sacramentally, yea, in a spiritual sense, He is really here. Himself said, I have earnestly desired to eat this passover with you: let us earnestly desire to eat this sacrament with Him. God said once, Take and eat of every tree but one; but man then mistook the fruit, he did eat and fell. He now says again, Take and eat; this is My body, which is given for you: let us not mistake, but eat and live for ever. And the body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for us, preserves our bodies and souls into everlasting life.

As God spake to the fish, and it cast up Jonah, commanded the earth, and it delivered up Jesus; so He will speak to all creatures, and they shall not detain one dust of our bodies. There shall be a dry ground for this valley of tears, a land of the living for this Golgotha of the dead, a settled mansion for this movable pavilion. Christ had His Easter-day by Himself; there shall be one general Easter-day for us all, when the wicked shall rise to contempt, the faithful to eternity of days. Here shall be no terror to affright us, no sorrow to afflict us, no sickness to distemper us, no death to dissolve us, no sin to endanger, nor evermore.

—Adams, 1654.

RICHES.

1. Riches and virtue are not incompatible.

(4355.) The declaimers on the incompatibility of wealth and virtue are mere declaimers, and nothing more. For you will often find them, in the next breath, applauding or condemning every measure or institution according to its supposed tendency to increase or diminish wealth. You will find them not only readily accepting wealth themselves from any honourable source, and anxious to secure from poverty their children and all most dear to them (for this might be referred to the prevalence of passion over principle), but even offering up solemn prayers to heaven for the prosperity of their native country, and contemplating with joy a flourishing condition of her agriculture, manufactures, or commerce,—in short, of the sources of her wealth. Seneca's discourses in praise of poverty would, I have no doubt, be rivalled by many writers of this island, if one-half of the revenues he drew from the then inhabitants of it, by lending them money at high interest, were proposed as a prize. Such declaimers against wealth resemble the Harpies of Virgil, seeking to excite disgust at the banquet of which they are themselves eager to partake.

—Whately, 1787-1863.

(4356.) In each successive age Christians have, as a matter of fact, risen, on the whole, in the possibility of wielding secular elements by their spiritual power; and all reasonings and analogies point to a day when humility, purity, justice, love, faith, and devotion, shall be just as possible with secular wealth and worldly power as without them; nay, more possible. I believe that when the time of ripeness comes, it will be found that beauty and power are the only appropriate garments of piety, of moral excellence. They have been stolen by the passions and the appetites; but they are to be worn in their fullest glory only by the highest sentiments that are in man. I do not believe, except as a temporary thing, as an expedient, that men are appointed to suffering and limitation. A man that is travelling home may submit to the necessity of sleeping under trees, without thinking that it is best always to sleep under trees. A man may feed himself out of a wallet while he is in a wilderness seeking a city of refuge, without thinking that every man ought to live from hand to mouth. And although it is true that, regarded as a wayfarer, man is, in the whole line of development, subject to cross-bearing and exclusion; yet, I believe that characteristically he is a creature that was made to be rich, and wise, and influential, and active; and that all the powers of nature are to be his, and that he is to rule them; and that we come near to the millennial glory in proportion as multitudes of men know how to govern all things, and not to be governed by them. In other words, amplitude is my conception of the Christian man—not poverty. Joy is the key-note of Christian experience—not sorrow. Sorrow is the medicine by which we come to it.

Did you never hear, when the harpist was preparing for sweet melodies, how he took the chords that were out of tune, and commenced screwing them and fingering them, and how a wail went up from them, till, one by one, they had all been brought to the right key, and how then he swept his hands over them, and brought exquisite harmonies forth from them? The process of chording was one of hideous sounds; but the sounds that were produced after the instrument was put in order were sweet and agreeable to the ear. And I believe that the proper condition of man is one in which his soul gives forth music, and an abundance of it.

—Becker.

2. Are in themselves desirable.

(4357.) Riches are the stairs whereby men climb up into the height of dignity, the fortification that defends it, the food it lives upon, the oil that keeps the lamp of honour from going out. Honour is a bare robe if riches do not lace and flourish it, and riches a dull lump till honour give a soul to quicken it.

—Adams, 1654.

3. Yet they are not to be too earnestly desired.

(4358.) When a man is to travel into a far country, a great burthen at his back will but hinder him in his journey; one staff in his hand may comfortably support him, but a bundle of staves would be troublesome. Thus a competency of these outward things may happily help us in the way to heaven, whereas abundance may be hurtful, and, like long garments to a man that walks on in the way, will trip up our heels too, if we look not well about us.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4359.) Abundance of wealth is the foundation and ground of many dangerous temptations, whereby Satan chokes in us the seed of God's Word, weans us from the love of heavenly things, puffs us up with pride, and makes us forgetful of God and of all duties which we owe unto Him. So that like as our bodies when they excessively abound in any humour, though it be never so good in itself, are thereby cast into separate diseases, if it be not abated and purged; so it fares with us in respect of our states—for when they abound with superfluity of these good things which are earthly and temporal, and are not abated by employing them to good uses, they make our souls dangerously sick in sin, and betray them to be overcome by the temptations of the devil. And therefore as the discreet merchant, though his wares be never so good, fits his burden to his ship, not overloading it with more than it can well carry, for fear lest all should sink; and if a storm happen, is ready to lighten his ship by casting out a part of this also, that so the residue with himself may escape the danger; so we are to use the like wisdom, and not overburden our souls and minds with a greater load of these earthly things than they can well bear, but allow unto them only a fit and competent proportion; and if Satan, taking advantage of our plenty, do endanger us with the storms of his temptations, we are to ease ourselves by giving part of that, which otherwise we might well use, to the poor, to preserve our souls from suffering shipwreck, and so shall we not only save the rest for our own use, but casting our wares upon the face of these waters, we shall after many days find them, with no small advantage. (Eccles. xi. 1.)

—Downham, 1644.

(4360.) In an artichoke there is a little picking meat, not so wholesome as delicious, and nothing to that it shows for; more than the tenth part is unprofitable leaves; and besides, there is a core in the midst of it, that will choke a man if he take not good heed. Such a thing is wealth that men so covetously desire; it is like some kind of fish, so fall of bones, and unseen, that no man can eat of them without danger. The rich man's wealth is very troublesome to the outward man, like a long garment that is too wide, if he tread upon it he may chance to catch a fall, a fall into much discontent and envy of the world; but to the soul, riches, if not well employed, prove very pernicious, making a man vainly confident; thinking that he is so walled and moated about that he is out of all gunshot, when he is more open to danger than a poorer man; then they make him proud, and pride, says St. Bernard, is the rich man's coffin; it blows him like a bladder with a quill, then he grows secure, and so falls into sudden ruin. —Otes.

(4361.) As the children of Israel passing along the wilderness, marched forward on their way when the cloud went that conducted them, but there stood still where it stayed; so may our affections walk on while God's hand goes before them; but look where God stays His hand and ceases to give, there should our heart stay likewise, and we cease to desire. —Gataker, 1574-1656.

(4362.) Since "Riches are not for ever, nor doth the crown endure to every generation;" yes, since they must be left very soon, nor is there any certainty of keeping them any time; that one day may consume them, one night may dispossess us of them and our life together with them, there can be no reason why we should be so solicitous about them; no account given of our setting so high a rate upon them. For who would much regard the having custody of a rich treasure for a day or two, then to be stripped of all, and left bare? To be to-day invested in large domains, and to-morrow to be dispossessed of them? No man surely would be so fond, as much to affect the condition. Yet this is our case; whatever we call ours, we are but guardians thereof for a few days. This consideration, therefore, may serve to repress or moderate in us all covetous desires, proud conceits, vain confidences and satisfactions in respect to worldly wealth. —Barrow, 1630-1677.

(4363.) You desire not the biggest shoes or clothes, but the meetest; so do by your dignity and estate. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4364.) Plutarch tells us, that when Cæsar passed by a smoky, nasty village at the foot of the Alps, some of his commanders merrily asked him whether there was such a stir for commands and dignities and honours among those cottages as there was at Rome? The answer is easy. Do you think that an Antony, a Mark, a Jerome, or such other of the ancient retired Christians, were not wiser and happier men than a Nero or a Caligula, yea, or a Julius or Augustus Cæsar? Is it a desirable thing to be a lord or ruler, before we turn to common earth; and as Marius that was one day made emperor, and reigned the next, and was slain by a soldier the next; so to be worshipped to-day, and laid in the dust, if not in hell, to-morrow? It was the saying of the Emperor Severus, "Omnia fuit, sed nihil expedit;" and of King David, "I have seen an end of all perfection." Oh, value these things but as they deserve. Speak impartially. Are not those that are striving to get up the ladder foolish and ridiculous, when those that are at the top have attained but danger, trouble, and envy, and those that fall down are accounted miserable? There are more draughts of poison given in golden than in earthen vessels, saith the poet. The Scythian, therefore, was no fool, who, when the Emperor Mich. Paleologus sent him precious ornaments and jewels, asked what they were good for; whether they would preserve him from calamity, sickness, or death, and sent them home when he heard they were of no more use. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4365.) Do not be over-anxious about riches. Get as much of true wisdom and goodness as you can; but be satisfied with a very moderate portion of this world's good. Riches may prove a curse as well as a blessing.

I was walking through an orchard, looking about me, when I saw a low tree laden more heavily with fruit than the rest. On a nearer examination, it appeared that the tree had been dragged to the very earth, and broken by the weight of its treasures. "Oh!" said I, gazing on the tree, "here lies one who has been ruined by his riches."

In another part of my walk, I came up with a shepherd, who was lamenting the loss of a sheep that lay mangled and dead at his feet. On inquiry about the matter, he told me that a strange dog had attacked the flock, that the rest of the sheep had got away through a hole in the hedge, but that the ram now dead had more wool on his back than the rest, and the thorns of the hedge held him fast till the dog had worried him. "Here is another," said I, "ruined by his riches."

At the close of my ramble, I met a man hobbling along on two wooden legs, leaning on two sticks. "Tell me," said I, "my poor fellow, how you came to lose your legs?" "Why, sir," said he, "in my younger days I was a soldier. With a few comrades I attacked a party of the enemy, and overcame them, and we began to load ourselves with spoil. My comrades were satisfied with little, but I burdened myself with as much as I could carry. We were pursued; my companions escaped, but I was overtaken and so cruelly wounded, that I only saved my life afterwards by losing my legs. It was a bad affair, sir; but it is too late to repent of it now." "Ah, friend," thought I, "like the fruit tree and the mangled sheep, you may date your downfall to your possessions. It was your riches that ruined you."

When I see so many rich people, as I do, caring so much for their bodies and so little for their souls, I pity them from the bottom of my heart, and sometimes think there are as many ruined by riches as by poverty. "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition." The prayer will suit you, perhaps, as well as it does me, "Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: lest I be full and deny Thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor and steal, and take the name of my God in vain." —Old Humphrey.

4. Insatiability of the desire for them.

(4366.) The second evil which attends the possession of riches is an insatiable desire of getting more (Eccles. v. 10). "He who loves money shall not be satisfied with it," says Solomon. And I believe it would be no hard matter to assign more instances of such as riches have made covetous, than of such as covetousness has made rich. Upon which account a man can never truly enjoy what he actually has through the eager pursuit of what he has not ; his heart is still running out ; still upon the chase of a new game, and so never thinks of using what it has already acquired. And must it not now be one of the greatest miseries for a man to have a perpetual hunger upon him, and to have his appetite grow fiercer and sharper amidst the very objects and opportunities of satisfaction ? Yet so it is usually with men hugely rich. They have, and they covet ; riches flow in upon them, and yet riches are the only things they are still looking after. Their desires are answered, and while they are answered they are enlarged ; they grow wider and stronger, and bring such a dropsy upon the soul, that the more it takes in, the more it may ; just like some drunkards, who even drink themselves athirst, and have no reason in the world for their drinking more but their having drank too much already.

—South, 1633-1716.

5. Are not to be too ardently loved.

(4367.) A garment that hangs loose about a man is put off with ease ; but so is not the skin that sticks fast to the flesh, nor the shirt that cleaves fast to the ulcerous leper ; a tooth if it be loose, it comes out with ease, but if it stick fast in the head it is not pulled out but with pain, yea, many times it brings away some piece of the gum or jaw with it. So here, a man is content willingly to part with his riches, when his heart is not set upon his wealth ; but if his heart be glued to it, it even rends his heart in two to part with it. And that is the reason why Job blessed God, when He took away all that ever he had from Him ; whereas most men, if God take from them but a small pittance of that they have, are ready, as the devil untruly said that Job would do, even to curse Him to His face.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(4368.) Riches are like a rose in a man's hand : if he use it gently, it will preserve its savour and its scent and colour a great while ; but if he crush it and handle it roughly, it loseth both its colour and sweetness. Thus, if a rich man employ his wealth well, he will possess it the longer ; but if he set his heart too much upon it, he will quickly lose it : he may possess it, but by no means must he let his wealth possess him.

—Spencer, 1658.

(4369.) As the kingdoms and glory of the world were condemned by Christ in the hour of His temptation, so they are inconsiderable to procure His approbation. Trust not, therefore, to uncertain riches ; value them but as they will prove at last. As you stand on higher ground than others, it is meet that you should see further. The greater are your advantages, the wiser and better you should be ; and therefore should better perceive the difference between things temporal and eternal. It is always dark where these glowworms shine, and where a rotten post doth seem a fire.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

6. Are loved by many who flatter themselves that they are free from avarice.

(4370.) As sick men use to love health better than those that never felt the want of it ; so it is too common with poor men to love riches better than the rich that never needed. And yet, poor souls, they deceive themselves, and cry out against the rich, as if they were the only lovers of the world, when they love it more themselves though they cannot get it.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

7. Reasons for which they are sought.

(4371.) The devil spins silk as well as hemp or flax ; and when he wants to catch a trout that will not bite where it can see the line, he spins a line so small that it cannot be seen, and puts the bait upon it, and the fish is caught. And if ever there is an invisible line with bait at the end of it, and with the devil at the end of the rod, it is when a man is going to make money for the sake of using it to do good with. If there is ever a time when Satan laughs, and says, "I have caught a gudgeon !" it is then.

—Beecher.

8. Do not of themselves make us honourable.

(4372.) As fair tapestry covereth foul and broken walls ; even so riches may well make a man more honourable in the sight of the world.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(4373.) Prize not thyself by what thou hast, but by what thou art. He that values a jewel by its golden frame, or a book by its silver clasps, or a man by his vast estate, errs. If thou art not worth more than the world can make thee, thy Redeemer had a bad pennyworth, or thou an uncuring Redeemer.

—Quarles, 1592-1644.

(4374.) It is against reason, indeed, that metals should make difference of men ; against religion that it should make such a difference of Christian men. Yet commonly reputation is measured by the acre, and the altitude of the countenance is taken by the pole of advancement.

—Adams, 1654.

(4375.) Gold and silver are heavy metals, and sink down in the balance ; yet, by a preposterous inversion, they lift the heart of a man upwards, as the plummet of a clock, which, while itself passeth downwards, lifts up the striking hammer.

—Adams, 1654.

(4376.) It is poor to love a man for that is about him : he must be loved for that is within him. If we should account of men as we do of bags, prize them that weigh heaviest ; and measure out our love by the subsidy-book, honouring a man because he is well clothed ; I see then no reason but we should do greater reverence to the basin and ewer on the stall, than to the goldsmith in the shop, and most humbly salute satin and velvet in whole pieces, because their virgin-glory was never yet ravished and abused into fashion.

—Adams, 1654.

9. Do not necessarily secure happiness.

(4377.) Many rich men understand their own riches no more than the oaks of the forest do their own acorns.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

(4378.) A man diseased in body can have little joy of his wealth, be it never so much. A golden crown cannot cure the headache, nor a velvet slipper give ease of the gout, nor a purple robe fray away a burning fever. A sick man is alike sick wheresoever you lay him, on a bed of gold or on a pad of straw, with a silk quilt or a sorry rag on him. So no more can riches, gold or silver, land and livings, had a man much more than ever any man had, minister unto him much joy—yea, or any true or sound joy at all—where the mind is distract and discontent. Without contentment there is no joy of aught; there is no profit, no pleasure, in anything.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(4379.) As poverty and a mean estate are never without a train of fretful sorrows and cares, likewise riches and honour are never without fears and disturbances. And as there is no flame ever so pure but sends up a smoke, nor a rose so beautiful but has its prickles; so there is no condition so splendid or glorious, nor any prosperity so flourishing, but has its troubles or sharp thorns. Every man upon earth without exception bears his cross, or has a grievous thorn in his side. The moth sticks to the richest stuffs, the worm gets into the heart of the fairest flowers and fruits, and the thunderbolt strikes down the loftiest oaks, the highest steeples, and the most magnificent palaces: likewise care and grief commonly eat up the flower of the greatest prosperities, and the noblest dignities are often subject to the strangest alterations and to the most terrible downfalls. The richest crowns cast all their splendour and glory outwardly, but inwardly they are felt to be weighty upon the heads of such as bear them.

—Drelincourt, 1666.

(4380.) A man who has true benevolence, and has the means of gratifying it, is, or may be, one of the most happy men in the world. His riches make him happy—and they ought to. But when I look at rich men as a class, I find that they are not the happiest of men by any means. They do not enjoy home more than other men, nor as much as other men.

I tell you, there are two things which go to make fine playing on a violin. The first is a master's hand. The second is a good violin; and the quality of the instrument is fully as important as the player's touch. If you take a violin and first break the highest string, and by and by snap the next one, and finally break the next one, leaving the bass string, and that only, and that a great deal the worse for wear, Paganini himself could not bring very much out of that instrument except for surprise. Men take their hearts, which are musical instruments, and snap this cord, and that, and that, reducing themselves to one or two points of sentient enjoyment, and then expect, because they are rich, that they shall be happy. What you are in yourself is to determine whether you are happy or not. You will not be made happy by external things. It is inside that happiness lives. It is that which is fresh and fruitful in you that is to make you happy. I would rather be a man with a sanguine temperament, with average good health, and in moderate business, who sees everything on the bright side, and has a quiet hope of immortality through Jesus Christ—I would rather be such a man than many a rich man. Inconspicuous as he is, and small as his material resources are, he will shake more blossoms and more fruit off from the boughs of the tree of happiness in one year than you will, old curmudgeon, probably in your whole life. And yet you and he are living for the same general end—to be happy. He is happy because he keeps strong and fresh those notes which vibrate joy; and you are unhappy because you despoil yourself of all power of enjoyment for the sake of that arch-deceiver, riches, which glazes, and whispers, and promises, and betrays you.

—Becher.

10. Render it difficult for us to discern our friends.

(4381.) The great one bristles up himself, and conceits himself higher by the head than all the rest, and is proud of many friends. Alas! these dogs do but hunt the bird of paradise for his feathers. These wasps do but hover about the gallipot because there is honey in it. The proud fly, sitting upon the chariot wheel, which, hurried with violence, huffed up the sand, gave out that it was she which made all that glorious dust. The ass, carrying the Egyptian goddess, swelled with an opinion that all those crouches, cringes, and obeisances were made to him. But it is the case, not the carcass, they gape for. So may the chased stag boast how many hounds he hath attending him. They attend, indeed, as ravens a dying beast. Actæon found the truth of their kind attendance. They run away as spiders from a decaying house; or, as the cuckoo, they sing a sorry note for a month in summer, and are gone in June or July; sure enough before the fall.

—Adams, 1654.

11. How little they can do for us.

(4382.) What is there that the rich man hopes not to do? He can buy honours and offices, he can buy out faults and offences; yea, foolish Magus thought the Holy Ghost Himself might be had for money; and Satan presumed that this bait would even catch the Son of God. Yet what can riches do? Can they put off the goot, assuage grief, thrust out cares, suspend death, prevent hell, or bribe Satan? A satin sleeve can as well heal a broken arm. Indeed this they can do; they can anger God, hurt men, bar the gates of heaven, open the gates of hell, and forward souls to confusion. They are false friends, that will be sure never to fail men but when they have need of them. Sickness will besiege thee, death will summon thee, God will pass His doom on thee: in all this, what can riches avail thee? our manifold receipts shall but greatness our accounts; and the moderate estate will have the easier reckoning. Riches are a pit whereinto we soon slip, but can hardly scramble out. Æsop hath a fable of the two frogs that, in the time of drought, when the marches were dry, consulted what was best to be done. One advised to go down into a deep well, because it was likely the water would not fail there. The other answered, But if it do fail, how shall we get up again? Small puddles, light gains, will not serve some; they must plunge into deep wells, excessive profits; but they do not consider how they should get out again. So it comes to pass that either they are famished for want of grace, or drowned in a deluge of riches. If this world be a sea over which we must swim to the land of promise, I do not see what use there is of this abundant luggage, unless it be to sink us in the waters.

—Adams, 1654.

(4383.) What security is in money. Doth the devil balk a lordly house as if he were afraid to come in? Dares he not tempt a rich man to lewdness? Let experience witness whether he dares not bring the highest gallant both to sin and shame. Let his food be never so delicate, he will be a guest at his table; and perhaps thrust in one dish to his feast—drunkenness. Be his attendance never so complete, yet Satan will wait on him too. Wealth is no charm to conjure away the devil; such an amulet and the Pope's holy water are both of a force.

lward vexations forbear not their stings in awe of riches. An evil conscience dares perplex a Saul in his throne, and a Judas with his purse full of money. Can a silken sleeve keep a broken arm from aching? Then may full barns keep an evil conscience from vexing. And doth hell-fire favour the rich man's limbs more than the poor's? Hath he any servant there to fan cold air upon his tormented joints? Nay, the nameless Dives goes from soft linen to sheets of fire; from purple robes to flames of the same colour, purple flames; from delicate morsels to want a drop of water. Herod, though a king on earth, when he comes to that smoky vault hath not a cushion to sit on, more than the meanest parasite in his court. So poor a defence are they for an oppressed soul.

—Adams, 1654.

(4384.) Let us consider the miseries which affect the body, and we shall find that the greatest pleasure, arising from any degree of wealth or plenty whatsoever, is so far from reaching the soul that it scarce pierces the skin. What would a man give to purchase a release, nay, but a small respite, from the extreme pains of the gout or stone? And yet if he could fee his physician with both the Indies, neither art nor money can redeem, or but relieve him from his misery. No man feels the pangs and tortures of his present distemper (be it what it will) at all the less for his being rich. His riches indeed may have occasioned, but they cannot allay them. No man's fever burns the gentler for drinking his juleps in a golden cup. Nor could Alexander himself, at the price of all his conquests, antidote or recall the poisonous draught when it had once got into his veins.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4385.) Heaps of silver and gold may intercept the rich man's sight of death, but they can neither intercept death's sight of the rich man, nor prevent his forcing the feeble entrenchments in which he may attempt to hide himself.

—Saurin.

(4386.) Money, no doubt, is a power; but a power of well-defined and narrow limits. It will purchase plenty, but not peace; it will furnish your table with luxuries, but not you with an appetite to enjoy them; it will surround your sick-bed with physicians, but not restore health to your sickly frame; it will encompass you with a cloud of flatterers, but never procure you one true friend; it will bribe into silence the tongues of accusing men, but not an accusing conscience; it will pay some debts, but not the least one of all, your debts to the law of God; it will relieve many fears, but not those of guilt—the terrors that crown the brows of Death. He stands as grim and terrible by the dying bed of wealth as by the pallet of the poorest beggar whom pitiless riches has thrust from her door.

—Guthrie.

12. Expose us to the envy and hostility of our fellow-men.

(4387.) We hope wealth can stop the invasion of these miseries. Nothing less: it rather mounts a man, as a wrestler does his combatant, that it may give him the greater fall.

—Adams, 1654.

(4388.) So long as malice and envy lodge in the breasts of mankind, it is impossible for a man in a wealthy, flourishing condition not to feel the stroke of men's tongues, and of their hands, too, if occasion serves. The fuller the branches are, the more shall the tree be flung at. What impeached Naboth of treason and blasphemy but his spacious vineyard, too convenient for his potent neighbour to let the owner enjoy it long? What made the king of Babylon invade Judea, but the royal stores and treasures displayed and boasted of by Hezekiah before the Chaldean ambassadors, to the supplanting of his crown and miserable captivity of his posterity? In Sylla's bloody proscription matters came to that pass in Rome, that if a man had but a fair garden, a rich jewel, or but a ring of value, it was enough to get his name posted up in the cut-throat roll, and to cost him his life, for having anything worth the taking from him. Seldom do armies invade poor day-labouring countries; they are not the thin weatherbeaten cottages, but the opulent trading cities which invite the plunderer; and war goes on but heavily where there is no prospect of spoil to enliven it. So that, whether we look upon societies or single persons, still we shall find them both owing this to their great wealth, that it gives them the honour to be thought worth ruining, and a fit prey for those who shall think they deserve that wealth better than themselves; as, they may be sure, enough will.

—South, 1633-1716.

13. Are perilous to the soul.

(4389.) As those mountains that contain mines of gold and silver are otherwise barren: so they that have riches and veins of gold and silver are, for the most part, in their hearts, made unprofitable to the service of God and man.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(4390.) Thorns are the shelter for serpents, and riches the den of many sins.

—Adams, 1654.

(4391.) Riches is a warm nest where lust securely sits to hatch all her unclean brood.

—Adams, 1654.

(4392.) Christ telleth us "it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." Our Saviour, indeed, doth not speak of an impossibility, but of the difficulty of it and the rareness of it. Job unfolded the riddle, and got through the needle's eye with three thousand camels. But it is hard to be wealthy, and not wanton: too often are riches, like bird-lime, hindering the soul in its flight towards heaven.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4393.) To the love of money we trace the melancholy apostasy of Demas, the awful perfidy of Judas, the fatal lie of Ananias and Sapphira—all, and some of them distinguished, professors of religion. Be on your guard. Watch and pray. Their history is written for our instruction. Nor need any of His people who allow the love of money to entwine itself around their hearts, expect that in saving them God will do otherwise than the woodman who, seeking to save a tree, applies his knife to the canker that eats into its heart, or the ivy that has climbed its trunk and is choking it in its close embraces.

—Guthrie.

(4394.) Though, as these cases prove, money may be found in the hand where the love of it is not eating, like a cancer, into the heart, there is danger of gold stealing our affections from God. The larger and more sudden the accession of wealth, the greater the danger,—it being with riches as with rain. When showers fall slow and soft, they penetrate the soil and refresh the ground without disturbing it; but, falling in waterspouts, descending in a deluge from the loaded air, they fill the river to the brim, and, bursting its banks, carry havoc and destruction along their tumultuous course.

—Guthrie.

(4395.) A holy woman was wont to say of the rich—"They are hemmed round with no common misery; they go down to hell without thinking of it, because their staircase thither is of gold and porphyry."

—Spurgeon.

(4396.) Many of you are in imminent peril. God is multiplying the sources of your power. Your resources are becoming numerous as the sands of the sea. I am not sorry: I am glad; but I am anxious that you should rise up in the midst of these things, and show yourselves greater than prosperity, and stronger and better on account of it. I dread to see a man smothered under his wealth.

When a man, driving from the meadow, sits and sings cheerily upon his vast load of fragrant hay, how every one, looking upon him, thinks of his happiness and content! But by and by, at an unlucky jog, down goes the wheel, and over goes the load, and the man is at the bottom with all the hay on him. And now he cannot halloo so that you can hear him. And if somebody does not extricate him he will be smothered.

Just in that way rich men are in danger of being smothered. The whole wain of your prosperity may capsize, and the superincumbent mass may hide you from the air and sun of a true life.

—Becher.

(4397.) The ship "Britannia," which struck on the rocks off the coast of Brazil, had on board a large consignment of Spanish dollars. In the hope of saving some of them, a number of barrels were brought on deck, but the vessel was sinking so fast that the only hope for life was in taking at once to the boats. The last boat was about to push off, when a midshipman rushed back to see if any one was still on board. To his surprise, there sat a man on deck with a hatchet in his hand, with which he had broken open several of the casks, the contents of which he was now heaping up about him.

"What are you doing?" shouted the youth. "Escape for your life! Don't you know the ship is fast going to pieces?"

"The ship may," said the man. "I have lived a poor wretch all my life, and I am determined to die rich."

His remonstrances were answered only by another flourish of the hatchet; and he was left to his fate. In a few minutes the ship was engulfed in the waves.

We count such a sailor a madman; but he has too many imitators. Many men seem determined to die rich at all hazards. Least of all risks do they count the chance of losing the soul in the struggle.

14. Often debase the character.

(4398.) Nothing is so hard for those who abound in riches, as to conceive how others can be in want.

—Swift, 1667-1745.

(4399.) See yonder lake! The bigger the stream that runs into it—lying so beautiful and peaceful in the bosom of the shaggy mountains—the bigger the stream it discharges to water the plains, and, like the path of a Christian, wend its bright and blissful way on to its parent sea. But in sad contrast with that, the more money some men gain, the less they give; in proportion as their wealth increases, their charities diminish. Have we not met it, mourned over it, and seen how a man, setting his heart on gold, and hasting to be rich, came to resemble a vessel with a narrow, contracted neck, out of which water flows less freely when it is full than when it is nearly empty? As there is a law in physics to explain that fact, there is a law in morals to explain this. So long as a man has no hope of becoming rich; so long as in enough of bread to eat, of raiment to put on, of health and strength to do his work and fight his honest way on in the world, he has all man really needs. Having that, he does not set his heart on riches. He is a noble, unselfish, generous, large-hearted, and, for his circumstances, an open-handed man. But by success in business, or otherwise, let a fortune come within his reach, and he clutches at it—grasps it. Then what a change! His eye, and ear, and hand close; his sympathies grow dull and blunt; his heart contracts and petrifies. Strange to say, plenty in such cases feeds not poverty but penuriousness; and the ambition of riches opens a door to the meanest avarice.

—Guthrie.

15. The vanity of heaping up riches.

(4400.) It is a great deal of care and pains that the spider takes in weaving her web: she runneth much, and often up and down; she fetcheth a compass this way and that way and returneth often to the same point; she spendeth herself in multitudes of fine threads to make herself a round cabinet; she exenterateth herself, and worketh out her own bowels, to make an artificial and curious piece of work which, when it is made, is apt to be blown away with every puff of wind; she hangeth it up aloft, she fasteneth it to the roof of the house, she strengtheneth it with many a thread, wheeling often round about, not sparing her own bowels, but spending them willingly upon her work; and when she hath done all this—spun her fine threads, weaved them one within another, wrought herself a fine canopy, hanged it aloft, and thinks all is sure—on a sudden, in the twinkling of an eye, with a little sweep of a besom all falls to the ground, and so her labour perisheth. But here is not all. Poor spider! she is killed, either in her own web, or else she is taken in her own snare, haled to death, and trodden under foot. Thus the silly insect may be truly said either to weave her own winding sheet, or to make a snare to hang herself. Just so do many men waste and consume themselves to get preferment, to enjoy pleasures, to heap up riches, and increase them; and to that end they spend all their wit, and oftentimes the health of their bodies, running up and down, labouring and sweating, carking and caring; and, when they have done all this, they have but weaved the spider's web to catch flies; yea, oftentimes are caught in their own nets, are made instruments of their own destruction. They take a great deal of pains with little success, to no end or purpose.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4401.) Of great riches there is no real use, except it be in the distribution; the rest is but conceit; so saith Solomon, "Where much is there are many to consume it; and what hath the owner but the sight of it with his eyes?" The personal fruition in any man cannot reach to feel great riches: there is a custody of them, or a power of dole and donative of them, or a fame of them, but no solid use to the owner.

—Lord Bacon, 1560-1626.

(4402.) Whosoever shall look heedfully upon those who are eminent for their riches, will not think their condition such as that he should hazard his quiet, and much less his virtue, to obtain it. For all that great wealth generally gives above a moderate fortune is more room for the freaks of caprice, and more privilege for ignorance and vice, a quicker succession of flatteries, and a larger circle of voluptuousness.

—Dr. S. Johnson, 1709-1784.

16. Their uncertainty.

(4403.) He that sees a flock of birds sitting on his ground cannot make himself any assurance that, therefore, they are his own, and that he may take them at his pleasure. Thus he that hath riches, and thinks himself fully possessed of them, may be deceived, and soon deprived of them; a small spark of fire may set them flying, a thief may steal them, an unfaithful servant may embezzle them, a soldier, a wreck at sea, a bad debtor at land; there's a hundred ways to set them packing: they have wings, and hop from branch to branch, from one man to another; seldom to him that is the true owner of them.

—John Davenport, 1617.

(4404.) They are uncertain, yea uncertainty itself. Were our wealth tied to our life, it were uncertain enough: what is that but a flower, a vapour, a tale, a dream, a shadow, a thought, a nothing? What are great men but like hail-stones, that leap up on the tiles, and straight fall down again, and lie still, and melt away? But now, as we are certain that our riches determine with our uncertain life, for goods and life are both in a bottom, both are cast away at once; so we cannot be certain they will hold so long: our life flies hastily away; but, many times, our riches have longer wings, and outfly it. It was a witty observation of Basil, that "wealth rolls along by a man, like as an heady stream glides by the banks." Time will moulder away the very bank it washeth; but the current stays not for that, but speeds forward from one elbow of earth into another: so doth our wealth; even while we stay, it is gone. In our penal laws there are more ways to forfeit our goods than our lives. On our highways, how many favourable thieves take the purse, and save the life! And, generally, our life is the tree; our wealth is the leaves or fruit. If, therefore, life and wealth strive which is more uncertain, wealth will sure carry it away. Job was yesterday the richest man in the East; to-day he is so needy that he is gone into a proverb, "As poor as Job." Belisarius, the great and famous commander to whom Rome owed her life twice at least, came to Date obolum Belisario; "One halfpenny to Belisarius."

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4405.) Trust not in riches; they have their wanes as well as increases. They rise sometimes like a torrent and flow in upon men; but resemble also a torrent in as sudden a fall and departure, and leave nothing but slime behind them.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4406.) How often have I thought of riches, when, intruding on their lone domain, I have seen a covey of wild fowl, from the reeds of the lake or the heather of the hill-side, rise clamorous on the wing, and fly away! Has not many a man who hasted to be rich, and made gold his god, lived to become a bankrupt, and die a beggar—buried among the ruins of his ambitious schemes.

—Guthrie.

17. Must soon be relinquished.

(4407.) Saladin, a Turkish emperor, he that first of that nation conquered Jerusalem, lying at the point of death after many glorious victories, commanded that a white sheet should be borne before him to his grave upon the point of a spear, with this proclamation, "These are the rich spoils which Saladin carrieth away with him of all his triumphs and victories. Of all the riches and realms that he had, now nothing at all is left but this sheet."

—Woodnath.

(4408.) When we are bidden to a great man's table, where the meat is served up in silver dishes, and the wine in bowls of gold, we may eat the viands, and drink the precious liquors; but if through simplicity we should offer to carry away the vessels, the porter would stay us at the gate, and tell us plainly they are none of ours. The Divine bounty affords the use of riches, for the comfort and sustentation of our bodies; but when we rise up from His table, and think to bear away the riches themselves, death is a severe porter at the gate of life: he will examine our going out; we shall carry none of them with us.

—Adams, 1654.

(4409.) All our pieces of gold are but current to the grave; none of them will pass in the future world. Therefore as merchants when they travel make over their monies here, to receive them by bills of exchange in another country; let us do good with our goods while we live, that when we die, by a blessed bill of exchange, we may receive them again in the kingdom of heaven (Luke xvi. 9). To part with that we cannot keep, that we may get that we cannot lose, is a good bargain. Wealth can do us no good, unless it help us toward heaven.

—Adams, 1654.

(4410.) Jonah had a gourd that was to him an arbour: he sat under it secure; but suddenly there was a worm that bit it, and it died. Compare, secretly in your hearts, your riches to that gourd; your pleasure to the greenness of it; your pomp, attendance, vanities, to the leaves of it: your sudden increase of wealth, to the growing and shooting up of it. But, withal, forget not the worm and the wind. The worm that shall kill your root is death, and the wind that shall blow upon you is calamity.

—Adams, 1654.

(4411.) "Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased; for when he dieth he shall carry away nothing: his glory shall not descend after him." I remember an eastern legend, which I have always thought furnished a remarkable, though unconscious commentary on these words of the Psalmist. Alexander the Great, we are there told, being upon his death-bed commanded that, when he was carried forth to the grave, his hands should not be wrapped, as was usual, in the serecloths, but should be left outside the bier, so that all men might see them, and might see that they were empty; that there was nothing in them; that he, born to one empire, and the conqueror of another, the possessor, while he lived, of two worlds, of the East, and of the West, and of the treasures of both, yet now when he was dead could retain no smallest portion of those treasures; that in this matter the poorest beggar and he were at length upon equal terms. This was his comment, or the comment of those who may have devised this legend, on the text of the Psalmist. "He shall carry nothing away with him, when he dieth; neither shall his pomp follow him." This was his anticipation of the declaration of the Apostle, "We brought nothing into the world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out." And we may here fitly ask with Solomon, "What can the man do that cometh after the king?" If it was thus with that mightiest king, shall it not, by much stronger reason, be thus with meaner men?

—Trench.

18. For what purpose they are intrusted to us.

(4412.) God bids a great and rich person rise and shine, as He bids the sun, that is, not for himself, but for the necessities of the world; and none is so honourable in his own person as he who is helpful to others.
—South, 1633-1716.

(4413.) If any man is rich and powerful, he comes under that law of God by which the higher branches must take the burnings of the sun, and shade those that are lower; by which the tall trees must protect the weak plants beneath them.
—Beecher.

19. Are useless to many.

(4414.) As musical instruments are of no use to him that cannot play upon them: so are riches unprofitable to him that cannot use them rightly.
—Cawdray, 1609.

20. How they are to be used.

(4415.) "Ye are not your own, and ye are bought with a price." For all things are God's. When then He calls, and chooses to take, let us not, like grudging servants, fly from the reckoning, nor purloin our Master's goods. Thy soul is not thine, and how can thy wealth be thine? How is it, then, that thou spendest on what is unnecessary the things that are not thine? Knowest thou not that for this we are soon to be put on our trial, that is, if we have used them badly? But seeing that they are not ours but our Master's, it were right to expend them upon our fellow-servants. It is worth considering that this was the charge against that rich man (Luke xvi. 21), and against those also who had not given food to the Lord (Matt. xxv. 42).

Say not, then, "I am but spending mine own, and of mine own I live delicately." It is not thine own, but of other men's. Other men's, I say, because such is thine own choice; for God's will is that those things should be thine, which have been intrusted to thee on behalf of thy brethren. Now the things which are not thine own become thine, if thou spend them upon others; but if thou spend on thyself unsparingly, thine own things become no longer thine. For since thou usest them cruelly, and sayest, "That my own things should be altogether spent on my own enjoyment, is fair;" therefore I call them not thine own. For they are common to thee and thy fellow-servants; just as the sun is common, the air, the earth, and all the rest. For as in the case of the body, each ministration belongs both to the whole body and to each several member; but when it is applied to the single member only, it destroys the proper function of that very member! So also it comes to pass in the case of wealth. And that what I say may be made plainer, the food of the body which is given in common to the members, should it pass into one member, even to that it turns out alien in the end. For when it cannot be digested, nor afford nourishment, even to that part, I say, it turns out alien. But if it be made common, both that part and all the rest have it as their own.

So also in regard of wealth. If you enjoy it alone, you too have lost it; for you will not reap its reward. But if you possess it jointly with the rest, then it will be more your own, and then you reap the benefit of it. Seest thou not that the hands minister, and the mouth softens, and the stomach receives? Does the stomach say, "Since I have received, I ought to keep it all?" Then do not thou, I pray, in regard to riches, use this language. For it belongs to the receiver to impart. As then it is a vice in the stomach to retain the food and not to distribute it (for it is injurious to the whole body), so it is a vice in those that are rich to keep to themselves what they have. For this destroys both themselves and others.

Again, the eye receives all the light; but it does not itself alone retain it, but enlightens the entire body. For it is not its nature to keep it to itself, so long as it is an eye. Again, the nostrils are sensitive of perfume; but they do not keep it all to themselves, but transmit it to the brain, and affect the stomach with a sweet savour, and by their means refresh the whole man. The feet alone walk; but they move not themselves only, but transfer also the whole body. In like manner do thou, whatever thou hast been intrusted withal, keep it not to thyself alone, since thou art doing harm to the whole, and to thyself more than all.

And not in the case of the limbs only may we see this occurring. For the smith also, if he chosa to impart of his craft to no one, ruins both himself and all other craft. Likewise the cordwainer, the husbandman, the baker, and every one of those who pursue any mercenary calling; if he chose not to communicate to any one of the results of his arts, will ruin, not the others only, but himself also with them.

In everything to give and receive is the principle of numerous blessings: in seeds, in scholars, in arts. For if any one desire to keep his art to himself, he subverts both himself and the whole course of things. And the husbandman, if he bury and keep the seeds in his house, will bring about a grievous famine. So also the rich man, if he fails thus in regard of his wealth, will destroy himself before the poor, heaping up the fire of hell more grievous upon his own head.

Therefore, as teachers, however many scholars they have, impart some of their love unto each; so let thy possession be—many to whom thou hast done good.
—Chrysostom, 347-407.

(4416.) As the moon doth show her light to the world which she receiveth from the sun : so we ought to bestow the benefits received of God to the profit and commodity (advantage) of our neighbour.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(4417.) When a man taketh a heavy trunk, full of plate or money, upon his shoulders, it maketh him stoop, and boweth him towards the ground; but if the same weight be put under his feet, it lifteth him up from the ground. In like manner, if we put our wealth and riches above us, preferring them to our salvation, they will press us down to the ground, if not to hell with their very weight; but if we put them under our feet, and tread upon them as slaves and vassals to us, and quite contemn them in respect of heavenly treasure, they will raise us up towards heaven. —Thomas Taylor, 1631.

(4418.) Look but upon a fly coming to a platter full of sweet and pleasant honey : if she thrust not herself altogether into it, but only touch and taste it with her mouth, and take no more than is needful, she may safely take wing and fly to another place; but if she wallow in the honey, then is she limed in it, she is not able to fly away, she doth there lose her life. Thus, if a man take only so much of his riches as may maintain his estate, bestowing the rest in a Christian manner, then they cannot hold him back or bar him from the kingdom of heaven; but if covetousness shall bewitch him, and prick him to scrape and rake together more and more, then he shall never be satisfied, but fall into many snares and temptations.

—Pintus.

(4419.) Let us make the poor our friends by our alms, not our enemies by our scorn. We had better have the ears of God full of their prayers, than heaps of money in our own coffers with their curses. Worldly men think themselves wise in getting wealth, and the Scriptures folly; therefore throughout the Scriptures God calls them fools for their labour: "Thou fool." There is a tale of an abbot who gave his fool a painted staff, willing him to bestow it on the veriest fool he could meet. This abbot fell mortally sick; the fool was a visitant among the rest; and hearing him say, I must leave all and be gone, asked him whither he would go. The abbot answers, Into another country. But I hope, replies the fool, you will carry all your gold, and jewels, and treasure with you. No, I must leave all. But sure you have sent great store of preparation, as rich hangings, coverings, beds, plate, and furniture before you. No, I must leave all behind. All? I hope at least you have sent enough to furnish your own room, provision enough for yourself. No, not the least pillow. Hold, saith he, take your staff again, you are the veriest fool that ever I met.

—Adams, 1654.

(4420.) As bodies inclined to be fat had need of most exercise : so men that have the world coming too fast upon them, and are in great danger to be rich, should be most busy in the works of charity.

—Adams, 1654.

(4421.) If thou art rich, then show the greatness of thy fortune, or, what is better, the greatness of thy soul in the meekness of thy conversation; condescend to men of low estate, support the distressed, and patronise the neglected. Be great : but let it be in considering riches as they are, as talents committed to an earthen vessel; that thou art but the receiver, and that to be obliged and to be vain too is but the old solecism of pride and beggary, which, though they often meet, yet ever make but an absurd society.

—Sterne, 1713-1768.

21. Are worthless without godliness.

(4422.) Godliness may do a man good without gain, but worldly gain can do a man no good without godliness. As the heathen orator says of bodily might, that strength of body joined with discretion and wisdom may do a man much good; but without it, it is but as a sword in a child or a man's hand, rather a means to mischief a man's self than otherwise; as we see an example in Milo Crotoniates, the strongest man of his time, who unwarily assaying on trust of his strength to rive a piece of timber with his hands, which some others with wedge and beetle could not cleave, was caught fast by the fists, and so devoured by wolves. So riches, joined with godliness and good conscience, are the good blessings of God, a means of good to ourselves, and of doing good unto others; but being severed from godliness and the true fear of God are rather occasion of evil than otherwise, rather an instrument of vice than any furtherance to virtue, a means to make as our sins the greater here, so our condemnation accordingly the more grievous hereafter.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

SELF-EXAMINATION.

I. ITS RARITY.

(4423.) Easy and ordinary is it for men to be others' physicians, rather than their own; statesmen in foreign commonwealths, not looking into their own doors; sometimes putting on Aaron's robes, and teaching him to teach; and often scalding their lips in their neighbours' pottage. They can weed others' gardens, whiles their own is overrun with nettles; like that soldier that digged a fountain for Cæsar, and perished himself in a voluntary thirst. But charity begins at home; and he that loves not his own soul, I will hardly trust him with mine. The usurer blames his son's pride, sees not his own extortion; and whiles the hypocrite is helping the dissolute out of the mire, he sticks in deeper himself. The Pharisees are on the disciples' jacket for eating with unwashed hands, whiles themselves are not blameworthy that eat with unwashed hearts. No marvel if, when we fix both our eyes on others' wants, we lack a third to see our own. If two blind men rush one upon another in the way, either complains of other's blindness, neither of his own. Thus, like mannerly guests, when a good morsel is carved us, we lay it liberally on another's trencher, and fast ourselves. How much better were it for us to feed on our own portion!

—Adams, 1654.

II. WHY IT IS NECESSARY.

1. Because we are naturally averse to it.

(4424.) The sovereign excellency and necessity of this duty needs no other nor greater proof of it than this one consideration, that nothing in nature can be more grievous and offensive to a sinner than to look into himself; and generally what grace requires nature is most averse to. It is indeed as offensive as to rake into a dunghill; as grievous as for one to read over his debts, when he is not able to pay them; or for a bankrupt to examine and look into his accounts, which at the same time that they acquaint must needs also upbraid him with his condition.

But as irksome as the work is it is absolutely necessary. Nothing can well be imagined more painful than to probe and search a purulent old sore to the bottom; but for all that the pain must be endured, or no cure expected.

—South, 1633-1716.

2. That we may know if we are in the right way.

(4425.) Another reason that should move you to examine whether you be indeed converted or not, is because the want of this is one of the greatest causes why so few come to be converted and to be saved. Nothing doth more keep a man from turning back again, when he hath lost his way, than when he doth not know that he hath lost it: and how can he know, that wandereth in the night, and will not inquire and ask the way, or that is so wilful and self-conceited that he will not believe any man that telleth him he hath lost his way? As long as he is of this mind he will never turn again. So is it with most of the careless world: they are going into the way of worldliness or vainglory, and live to the flesh, which is clean contrary to the way to heaven, and yet they will not seriously ask a minister, or ask any one that can inform them, whether that be the way or not? or whether they shall ever come to heaven in that way? But they trudge on after their fleshly business, as if they had no tongue in their heads; or as if it were not worth the asking, to know whether they are in the way to heaven or hell. Surely, if men will not so much as inquire, or consider with themselves, and examine their way by the Word of God, to see whether they are right or wrong, they are never like to be saved.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. That we may ascertain if our graces are real and our hope well-founded.

(4426.) Must the soul's armour be of God's make? then look narrowly whether the armour ye wear be the workmanship of God or no. Many are like children that cry for a knife or dagger, and are pleased as well with a bone knife or wooden dagger as with the best of all; so they have armour it matters not what. Pray they must, but little care how it is performed. Believe in God! yes, they hope they are not infidels; but what their faith is, how they came by it, or whether it will hold in an evil day, this they never question.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4427.) If you die in your sins, you will rise in your sins, and stand at the tribunal of God in your sins; you can never receive remission of the guilt of sin, nor redemption from the power of sin, so long as you have not received Christ; and therefore reflect solemnly upon this matter, man, whether you have received Christ or not. If all that you are worth in the world lay in one precious stone, and that stone was to be tried by a skilful jeweller whether it were true or false, surely your thoughts could not be unconcerned about the issue of such a trial. Why, man, woman, all that you are worth in this world and in the world to come depends upon the truth of your faith, which now we call you to try, whether it will fly or endure the trying stroke of the hammer of God's Word. Have you no concern in this matter? You would be loath to put to sea, though it were but to cross a short ferry, in a rotten, leaky bottom; and will you dare to venture into the ocean of eternity in a false, rotten faith?

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(4428.) There is an obvious propriety for honest self-examination: The necessity of this is urged upon us all by the worth of the undying soul; by all the value of the blood of Christ; by all the apprehensions of a dreadful hell. On this of all subjects we should be most honest with ourselves; and yet on this of all subjects we are prone to take up with slightest evidences. The solicitude of the merchant to save his affairs from bankruptcy is untiring; the advocate toils to gain his cause, and the physician to save his patient; the farmer has no rest till the title to his land is without a flaw. Yet that merchant, perhaps, will feel no solicitude that his eternal interests may not be bankrupt; nor that professional man feel any concern that he is in danger of losing his soul, nor the farmer that his title to heaven is insecure. On the very point where we should suppose there would be most interest felt, there is often the least; and the last thing to which immortal man, in the church or out of it, can be roused, is the worth of his own soul.

Were it thus in other cases we should be impressed with the folly. Let a man be seized with disease, though not immediately alarming, and let it be suffered to run on without care or anxiety until death shall lay its cold hand on him, and we do not doubt its folly. Yet how many are under the influence of sin who allow themselves to be deceived, who listen to no language of entreaty to examine; and who will soon find that their hopes of heaven have been founded on the sand! Once more I may be permitted, not in form, but in the soberness of sincerity and in love, to entreat you to be willing to know the worst of the case. If deceived, be willing to know it, and to seek mercy before it shall be too late. If we are Christians, let us know it, and let our lives testify accordingly.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

4. That we may ascertain the hindrances to our reception of grace.

(4429.) They who have water running home in conduit pipes to their houses, as soon as they find a want of that which their neighbours have in abundance by and by they search into the cause, run to the conduit head, or take up the pipes, to see where they may be stopped, or what is the defect, that so they be supplied accordingly. Even so must every man do when he finds that the grace of repentance flows into other men's hearts and has no recourse or access to his soul; by and by sit down and search himself, what the cause should be, where the remora is that stays his course, where the rub lies which stops the grace of repentance in him; seeing they that live (it may be) in the same house, sit at the same table, lie in the same bed, can be penitent for their sins, sorry that they have offended God, and so complain in bitterness of soul for their sins; but he that had the same means, the same occasions, more sins to be humbled for, more time to repent in, and more motives to draw him to the duty, is not yet moved with the same, not any way affected with the sense of sin; this must needs be matter of high concernment to look about him.

—Rogers, 1594-1660.

5. That we may be saved from spiritual bankruptcy.

(4430.) Was there ever a successful merchant who did not balance his books year by year? I have noticed, in reading the details of courts of bankruptcy, that fortunes are as surely wrecked by indolence or carelessness, as by wild speculations, or boundless extravagance. Here is a trader, bankrupt. Sober, honest, industrious, anxious to pay every one their own, not living in splendour at other men's expense, he should have thriven. Yet this honest man has to take a place beside rogues—be, and others, throwing all the blame on fortune; imputing his misfortunes to the blind goddess, her capricious temper and unsteady wheel. But the examination comes, like that day of a greater judgment which shall reveal the true and unsuspected causes that have wrought the ruin of many souls. The debtor's books are produced; and now it appears that last year, and the year before, and for many years, there has been no balance struck. Fancying that all was right, too careless to think of it, too busy to spare time for taking stock, or too indolent to go through its irksome labour, from year to year he has put off striking a balance, till now he strikes on the rock ahead. The crash comes. He opens his eyes on ruin; and finds, too late, that for years he has been driving a losing trade. He is a bankrupt for want of a balance. And the general practice of men of business, their custom of year by year taking stock, examining their books and striking a balance to know how they stand, is a lesson of the highest value. Our everlasting salvation may turn on it. People go on dreaming that all is right when all is wrong; nor wake to the dreadful truth till they open their eyes in torment. What pains ought we to take to avoid the remotest chance of such a calamity! If men take such care of their earthly fortunes, how much greater our need to see how we stand with God; and do with our spiritual what all wise merchants do with their earthly interests—review the transactions of every year! Let us judge ourselves that we be not judged; and, holding a court of conscience, in the words of the text, "Look on all the things that my hands have wrought, and on the labours that I have laboured to do."

—Guthrie.

(4431.) Every man should use his understanding to discover the true character of his actual course of life. If, when a tradesman finds his way into the bankruptcy court, it comes out that for years he has never taken stock, or has taken it carelessly, he is very severely censured, and most justly. Every sensible man of business spends several days every year in learning his financial position, and the result of the trade of the previous twelvemonth. He weighs, he measures all his goods. He allows for the deterioration of stock and for the wear and tear of his premises. He reckons up his bad debts; he forms a rough estimate of the debts likely to prove bad. He works night and day. He is restlessly anxious to see how the balance-sheet will show. He uses his understanding to learn whether his business is working profitably. Would it not be possible, is it not necessary, to have an examination equally rigorous into the moral character of all his transactions? If he is an honest man—above all, if he is a Christian man—he will think that by far the most important thing. But is there any necessity for such a serious and elaborate inquiry? There is. If a tradesman does not get out an accurate balance-sheet every year, he may be going wrong financially without knowing it; his trade expenses may be eating up all his profit; he may be paying too heavy a rent; spending too much on his premises; employing too many hands; people he trusts may be robbing him; he may seem to have a flourishing business, and yet may be getting into a worse condition every Christmas. I believe that many men, from never investigating the moral character of what they are doing, get wrong morally without knowing it.

—R. W. Dale.

6. That we may spare ourselves after-regrets.

(4432.) What a deal of sorrow and after-complaining might this small labour prevent! How many miles travel, besides the vexation, may a traveller save by inquiring of the way!

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

7. Because our hearts are so apt to deceive us.

(4433.) "The heart is a grand impostor." It is like a cheating tradesman, which will put one off with bad wares; the heart will put a man off with seeming grace, instead of saving. A tear or two shed is repentance, a few lazy desires is faith; blue and red flowers that grow among the corn look like good flowers, but they are but beautiful weeds. The foolish virgins' lamps looked as if they had had oil in them, but they had none. Therefore to prevent a cheat, that we may not take false grace instead of true, we had need make a thorough disquisition and search of our hearts.

—Watson, 1696.

(4434.) How shall we bring home to ourselves the dangerousness of trusting, without due examination, to the verdict of our own hearts? We will do so by supposing a parallel case in a matter, where we are all peculiarly apt to be cautious and suspicious,—the goods of this world.

Suppose then (and in a commercial country like this the supposition has not been unfrequently realised) that the chief agent in some great speculation is a man who, though most untrustworthy, has all the art of conciliating trust. Suppose him to be fluent, fair-spoken, prepossessing in manners and appearance, and to be especially plausible in glossing over a financial difficulty. Advance one more step in the hypothesis and suppose him to be a private friend of many of those who are embarked with him in the speculation; allied to some of them by marriage, and more or less in habits of intimacy with all. If such a person is at the head of affairs, and intrusted with the administration of the funds contributed by all, it is evident that he might impose upon the contributors to almost any extent. His artful representations would quiet their little panics, when such arose; and he would have it in his power to keep them still while embezzling their resources, until the great crash comes, which announces to many of them, as with a clap of thunder, that they are bankrupts.

Now the peril of such trust in worldly matters supplies a very fair image of the peril of a still more foolish and groundless trust in spiritual things. Our hearts are notoriously most untrustworthy informants in any case where we are ourselves interested. It is not only Scripture which asserts this. We confess it ourselves, and re-echo the verdict of Scripture, when we say of any slight matter with which we happen to be mixed up, "I am an interested party, and therefore I had better not be a judge." But while our hearts are thus, by our own confession, untrustworthy, there is no one in whose assertions we habitually place more trust. We think we cannot be deceived respecting ourselves; we know at all events our own motives and intentions, if we know anything. The unkind, the insincere, the ungenerous, the ungrateful, never, we think, had any affinity with our nature. Faults there may have been, no doubt, in our temper and our conduct—feelings and transactions, too—for which we feel that we are in account with God; but we have our own heart to manage and superintend the account; and it soothes us with the assurance that we never had any very bad intention, and so the whole affair will turn out well in the end,—we need not fear the ultimate exposure. Self-love conspires with trust in our own hearts to make dupes of us as regards our spiritual account. Proverbially, and in the verdict of all experience, love is blind; and if love be blind, self-love being the strongest, the most subtle, the most changeless, the most ineradicable of all loves, is blinder still. Self-love will not see, as self-trust cannot see, anything against us. With these strong partialities to self in our own heart ever operative within us, and never probably capable, even in the best men, of being entirely detached from us, to what an extent may we be imposed upon, in that which most virally and nearly concerns us, if we do not from time to time call in and examine the accounts! What frightful arrears may we be running up, unawares to ourselves, if we do not sharply check and suspiciously watch this heart, who administers for us the account between us and God! And how may these accumulated arrears of guilt burst upon our minds with an overwhelming force when God judges the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to the Gospel,—when the divine sentence unmasks our sin of those excuses with which we have been palliating it, and brings it home to us with a "Thou art the man!"

—Goulburn.

8. Because there are so many unsuspected influences that tend to cause us to go astray.

(4435.) A sailor remarks:—"Sailing from Cuba, we thought we had gained sixty miles one day in our course; but at the next observation we found we had lost more than thirty. It was an undercurrent. The ship had been going forward by the wind, but going back by a current." So a man's course may often seem to be right, but the stream beneath is driving him the very contrary way to what he thinks.

—Cheever.

9. Because the tendency of evil is to increase.

(4436.) Take heed of the first decays, and look often into the state of your hearts. A man that never casts up his state is undone insensibly; therefore look often into the state of your hearts, whether you go forward, in the power of holiness, or whether you go backward.

It is the devil's policy, when once we are declining, to humble us further and further still, as a stone that runs down the hill; therefore take heed to the first declinings.

A gap once made in the conscience grows wider and wider every day; and the first declinings are the cause of all the rest.

Evil is best stopped in the beginning; and therefore when we begin to be cold, careless in the profession of godliness, and not to have the like savour as you were wont to have, take heed. A heavy body moving downward still gets more strength, it goes down, and moves faster still. Oh, therefore, stay at first. The first remitting of your watch and spiritual fervour is that which is the cause of all the mischief that comes upon many; so that they are given up to vile affections and errors.

It is easier to crush the egg than kill the serpent.

He that keeps his house in constant repair prevents the fall of it. Therefore look to your hearts still.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(4437.) Examination will help the Christian that has fallen and bruised himself to heal the wound whilst it is fresh, before it is festered. This one advantage, if there were no more, is extraordinary. As the sting of sin, though the bee be fled, works itself into the flesh deeper, and diffuses its venom more strongly, causing the greater pain, that every man, unless foolish, will speedily pull it out, lest he increase his own anguish; truly so does sin,—though the honey, the pleasure of it be gone, yet the sting remains; and the longer it is before it is pulled out by faith and repentance, the deeper it works itself into the soul, and the more sorrow it will put us to in this or the other world.

When sin is admitted into the soul, and as a thief in the night stolen in unawares, when the eye of the soul's watchfulness was fallen asleep, examination will light the candle of the word, and search the house narrowly, and find out this ill guest; and before it has done so much mischief as it intended, apprehend it, indict, condemn, and execute it.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(4438.) An enemy may much sooner be forced out of his holds when he has newly taken possession, than when he has continued so long as to cast up his banks, make his ditches, placed his guns, and fortified them. After we have been foiled by our spiritual enemies, and by examination find out the cause, it will make us more watchful at that gate at which they entered, and careful of that particular wherein they got the advantage of us.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(4439.) Examination is a special preservative against sin. Examination will help the Christian, if not to hinder a coming disease, yet to prevent its growing and increase. It is observed of the Dutchmen that they keep their banks, notwithstanding the threats of the insulting ocean, with little cost and labour, because they look narrowly to them, and stop them up in time; if there be but a small breach, they stop it presently, and hereby save much charge and trouble. Frequent examination will do this courtesy for the Christian, it will maintain his peace with little charge and trouble comparatively.

The ship that leaks is more easily emptied at the beginning than afterwards. The bird is easily killed in the egg, but when once hatched and fledged, we may kill it when we can catch it. A frequent reckoning with ourselves will pluck sin up before it is rooted in the soul.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

III. SHOULD BE MADE FREQUENTLY.

1. Yearly.

(4440.) As there is no watch, be it ever so good, but must be daily wound up, and now and then taken asunder to remove the rust and dirt, and mend or repair what may be broken or out of order, so he that is careful of his soul ought to wind it up daily to God by the foregoing exercises, and at least once a year take it asunder to redress, rectify, and examine diligently all its affections and passions, that all its defects may be repaired; and as the watchmaker anoints the wheels, the springs, and all the movements with some delicate oils, that the motions of the wheels may be more easy, and the whole of the watch less subject to rust, so a devout person, after taking this review of his heart, in order to renew it, must anoint it with the sacraments.

—Francis de Sales.

2. Daily.

(4441.) By a daily examination of our actions, we shall the easier cure a great sin, and prevent its arrival to become habitual; for to examine we suppose to be a relative duty, and instrumental to something else. We examine ourselves, that we may find out our failings and cure them; and therefore if we use our remedy when the wound is fresh and bleeding, we shall find the cure more certain and less painful. For so a taper, when its crown of flame is newly blown off, retains a nature so symbolical to light, that it will with greediness rekindle and snatch a ray from the neighbouring fire. So is the soul of man when it is newly fallen into sin: although God be angry with it, and the state of God's favour and its own graciousness is interrupted, yet the habit is not naturally changed; and still God leaves some roots of virtue standing, and the man is modest, or apt to be made ashamed, and he is not grown a bold sinner; but if he sleeps on it, and returns again to the same sin, and by degrees grows in love with it and gets the custom, and the strangeness of it is taken away, then it is his master, and is swelled into a heap, and is abetted by use, and corroborated by newly-entered principles, and is insinuated into his nature, and hath possessed his affections, and tainted the will and the understanding, and by this time a man is in the state of a decaying merchant—his accounts are so great and so intricate, and so much in arrears, that to examine it will be but to represent the particulars of his calamity; therefore they think it better to pull the napkin before their eyes, than to stare on the circumstances of their death.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(4442.) Often reflect upon thyself in a day, and observe what company is with thy heart. We may know by the noise in the school that the master is not there; much of the misrule in our bosom arises from the neglect of visiting our hearts.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4443.) Make up your spiritual accounts daily; see how matters stand between God and your souls (Ps. lxxvii. 6). Often reckonings keep God and conscience friends. Do with your hearts as you do with your watches, wind them up every morning by prayer, and at night examine whether your hearts have gone true all that day, whether the wheels of your affections have moved swiftly toward heaven. Oh, call yourselves often to account; keep your reckonings even, and that is the way to keep your peace.

—Watson, 1696.

(4444.) Housekeepers, by frequent inspections and attention, preserve the brightness of their furniture and utensils. Because of this daily carefulness, the house does not need often to be "turned out of windows." So must we keep our habits and principles bright and serviceable, if the house of our spirit is to be a comfortable home, and its furnishings beautiful and dear to us. We shall not need great and frequent disturbance of our inward life, if we practise daily order and self-revision.

—Lynch, 1818-1871.

(4445.) "Let a man examine himself." Alas! that in the use of such a precaution the children of this world should be so much wiser than the children of light! It is a part of every merchant's education to learn that art; and it is his only safety to practise it. Neglecting to balance his books, he may launch out into expenses quite unsuitable to his circumstances; persevere in branches of business which are not to his profit, but loss; fancy he is making money when he is driving on ruin. No other fate awaits the reckless adventurer than that of the emigrant ship which some weeks ago, with hundreds on board of her, full of hopes of happiness and fortune in the New World, ran headlong on Cape Race to break in pieces, and, whelming its living freight into the devouring waves, give them a grave on the shores where they expected a happy home! They took no soundings, and so they found no safety. The wise merchant takes stock, balances his books, and, in some businesses at least, strikes a balance on every day's transactions.

In this, as in the energy and toil and self-denial and resolution of worldly, how much is there worthy of the imitation of Christian men? Why should not we, at the close of each day, recall all its transactions to see how our accounts stand with conscience and with God—what duties had been neglected, and what done—what temptations had been resisted, and what yielded to; how far we had indulged evil passions, how far mortified them—how like or how unlike to Christ our demeanour had been?

This were a scrutiny which, though often painful and humbling, would be attended with the happiest results:—

How many sins would it extinguish in the spark from which Christians have afterwards to be saved by being pulled out of the roaring fire?

How often would it check a deviation at the beginning which ends in our going far astray, and losing a peace which in this world we may never fully recover?

In how many cases would it, by early sending us to the balm of Gilead, heal wounds that, neglected, fester into deep, running sores?

And as I have seen the workman, ere he retired to rest, throw himself into stream or sea to wash away the sweat and dust of his daily toil, from such a review the Christian would repair each evening to the fountain of Jesus' blood to be cleansed of the guilt of daily sins; and rise each morning to seek the aid of the Holy Spirit to do his work, to keep his watch, to bear his burden, to fight his battle, better.

If balancing our accounts with God, if reviewing the day's transactions, showed no progress in the divine life, what earnestness and liveliness it would impart to our evening prayers?

If, on the contrary, it showed some good done, some sin crucified, some progress made, what a comfort, as we laid our head on the pillow, to think that we were nearer heaven than when we first believed, and that, with Jesus standing by the helm, our bark, whether gliding smoothly over calm, or tossed in tempestuous seas, was approaching the shores of the happy land—the home and haven of our eternal rest! —Guthrie.

IV. HOW THIS DUTY IS TO BE PERFORMED.

1. The inquiry must be comprehensive.

(4446.) If any man skill not what examining means, the very word examine is so pregnant that it prompts us how we should examine: for it signifies to put ourselves unto the touch-stone, as if we would try gold from copper. Therefore one says that examination is the eye of the soul, whereby she sees herself, and her safety, and her danger, and the way which she walks, and her pace which she holds, and the end to which she tends. She looks into her glass, and spies every spot in her face, how all her graces are stained. Then she takes the water of life, and washes her blots away. After she looks again, and beholds all her gifts—her faith, fear, love, patience, meekness, and marks how every one doth flourish or wither. If they fade and decay, that she feels a consumption, then she takes preservatives and restoratives of prayer and counsel and repentance before the sickness grow. Thus every day she lets down a bucket into her heart, to see what water it brings up, lest she should corrupt within, and perish suddenly. —Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

(4447.) A man is known by his custom, and the course of his endeavours, what is his business. If a man be constantly, easily, frequently carried away to sin, it discovers a habit of soul, and the temper of his heart. Meadows may be overflowed, but marsh-ground is drowned with the return of every tide. A child of God may be carried away, and act contrary to the bent of the new nature; but when men are overcome with every temptation, it argues a habit of sin. —Manton, 1620-1667.

(4448.) Some men, when they attempt to reform their lives, reform those things for which they do not much care. They take the torch of God's Word, and enter some indifferent chamber, and the light blazes in, and they see that they are very sinful there; and then they look into another room, where they do not often stay, and are willing to admit that they are very sinful there; but they leave unexplored some cupboards and secret apartments where their life really is, and where they have stored up the things which are dearest to them, and which they will neither part from, nor suffer rebuke for. —Becher.

(4449.) You will see in the many men who, while they are living sensual lives, are yet kind in their disposition. In a thousand small things they are good, but their appetites are the end of their being. These are what they live for. Their goodness is well enough, is right enough; but they put an inordinate value upon it, and they deceive themselves by reason of it.

There is a field of ten acres, and it is full of thistles, and burdock, and all manner of noisome weeds; but toward the middle of it there is one single stalk of wheat springing up; and you say to the man who owns it, "Why are you such a lazy and careless husbandman? Look there, and see the weeds that have grown up and choked out everything else." "Sir," says the man, "Do you not see that stalk of wheat?" One stalk of wheat in ten acres! Ten acres of weeds, and one stalk of wheat! And that stalk of wheat is thought to be an offset to all these weeds!

So, frequently, when I talk to men, they parry my appeals to them. I urge upon them the necessity of attending to their soul's salvation, the necessity of repentance, of reformation, of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and of the power of the Holy Ghost both to stimulate and to cleanse them; and they commence saying to me, "I am not so bad as you take me to be," and they rehearse the few little things that are good in them.

Suppose I should say to a sluggard, "The winter draws near, and you have no house, and no provision for one;" and he should pull out a solitary shingle, and say, "I have no house, it is true, but I have something to cover me with!" One shingle!

Many men have no house, and no furnished apartments in their character, but they have some little shingle-quality of good, and that they make an offset for all that is bad in them. —Becher.

(4450.) The very common device of worldly men may be exposed, by which they keep a few show-qualities, as it were, as an offset to a whole career of moral unworthiness. A man may habitually seek ends that are worldly from very sordid motives, and yet maintain a kind of external conformity to custom, so that he shall not offend needlessly. His external conduct may adapt him to slide smoothly along among men, and he may have an occasional flash of generosity, while, after all, the central flow of his nature is selfish—yea, so selfish, that the bottom of it, being mud, is sordid. Though a man's tendencies are wrong, though the currents of his being are wrong, though the substance of his life is wrong, yet he may so delude himself that a few right things shall seem more to him than the multitude of wrong ones which stand over against them; that the bubbles which dance on the surface of the turbid stream shall seem more to him than the stream itself. I have seen men whose life was a perpetual selfishness. I have seen men whose life was a perpetual crushing of their fellow-men; and yet, the occasional kindnesses and generousities which they manifested they hung in their memory as you would hang a picture in your room, to be looked at, and praised, and admired, and to serve as an argument to themselves and others that they were not so bad after all. They do not make many long prayers—nor any prayers, for that matter; they sometimes swear a little; they drink occasionally; they are pretty hard in a bargain; they give their time and strength to their own selfish plans; but they would not see a widow destitute of a cow without giving a five dollars to her! And they never forget that five dollars; and they never forget to tell you that they came forward and gave their money for a benevolent object, and made no pretensions about it! They do not profess to be so very good, but they have a few shining traits—generosities and kindness—and these they keep to glitter

before men; and they laud themselves, and think that they are very good. Why? Because they have three or four show-qualities that they set in opposition to the whole life that flows like a stream toward damnation. All the foundations of their character are wrong, and the whole superstructure which is going up is wrong; but they have hung on the cold and slimy stone which composes the prison-house of their nature one little bright vine; and that they remember, and that they think worth more than all besides. Have you not seen such men? Have you had to go a great way to see them, some of you?

Now, would I undervalue an occasional kindness or generosity? No. That sympathy for the poor, that relief of the widow in distress, that succour of your sick neighbour was good—so good that you ought to have repeated it; so good that it ought not to have been left without company; so good that you ought to have added other noble deeds to it; so good that your character ought to be filled with such deeds. But still, you are proud; you are envious; you are jealous; you are selfish; you are profane; you are ungodly; you violate the laws of God in nature, and in your own soul; and that solitary good thing, though it is not less than good, is not valid as against the whole tendency of your life.

I owe you a thousand dollars, and I bring you one poor, battered cent. You say, "That is no offset to your debt." I say, "Do not you undervalue that money? is it not good for something?" You say, "Yes, it is good for one cent, and no more." And do I tread under foot your good deeds because I say that they do not make you a man? They do not build you up. They do not establish your character. They do not even mark the outlines of it. They are in contrast with it. They are only a light that glows in the prison-house of your nature to show how dark that prison-house is. And by the good that you do I rebuke you, and warn you. Do not think that you are going into the kingdom of God because here and there you have a shining buckle on the harness of the chariot of damnation!

—Becher.

2. It must be particular and searching.

(1.) Taking note of our imperfections as well as of our sins.

(4451.) Our daily infirmities and imperfections must not be passed over. Some have died of very slight wounds. Small drops of rain make the earth miry and dirty. Vain thoughts, spending time idly, omission of doing good when a price has been in our hands, are counted by us small sins, but such small drops will pollute our consciences to purpose, if not bewailed timely.

—Swinnoek, 1673.

(2.) Taking note of the things from which we seek comfort in distress.

(4452.) Observe what your hearts have their ordinary recourse unto in case of distress. Men's expectations are often disappointed, and then their hearts fail. And look, as in fears, or in a swoon, men's vital spirits run to the heart to comfort it; so in distress the heart runs out to something else, which it is injured unto, to comfort it. And as the otter, when in times of frost it is kept under by the ice, yet by its breath keeps open some hole as a breathing hole, so does the heart. Now watch and observe the haunts and breathing holes which in distress thy soul keeps open to thyself, to fetch in fresh air from; or look, as if you should see a company of rabbits grazing in a sunshiny day, and a man come by whom they fear, or a storm, you shall see them all instantly run into their several burrows, which are proper to them; and by the place whither each of them does run, you may discern which is proper to each: now thus in distress does the heart run to its holes.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(3.) Taking note especially of the motives and principles by which we are actuated.

(4453.) There be many things that move, and yet their motion is not an argument of life. A windmill when the wind serveth, moveth, and moveth very nimbly too; yet this cannot be said to be a living creature. No; it moveth only by an external cause, by an artificial contrivance. So it is also if a man see another man move, and move very fast, in those things which of themselves are the ways of God: you shall see him move as fast to hear a sermon as his neighbour doth; is as forward and hasty to thrust himself and bid himself a guest to the Lord's table (when God hath not bid him) as any. Now, the question is, what principle sets him a-work? If it be an inward principle of life, out of a sincere affection and love to God and His ordinances, it argueth that man hath some life of grace; but if it be some wind that bloweth on him—the wind of state, the wind of law, the wind of danger, of penalty, the wind of fashion or custom—to do as his neighbours do; if these or the like be the things that draw him thither, this is no argument of life at all: it is a cheap thing, it is a counterfeit and dead piece of service.

—Day, 1619.

(4454.) It especially concerns thee to search out the pollutions of thy spirit, of thy understanding, judgment, and will; how far they are guilty in the commission of sin, which will serve to aggravate or lessen the sin so much the more as they are found to have a greater or a lesser hand in it. For as the sins of princes are greater than those of other men, because they are their rulers, so are the sins of these superior faculties of a higher guilt, because it is their duty, and they are placed to guide the rest. And it concerns thee to be the more strictly inquisitive into these sins, because of all others they most conceal themselves, and as their operations are more strong, so with less noise, as poison works more strongly in the head than in the stomach, though it be perceived more there than in the head. Inquire thou into the sins of these ringleaders in thee; and as in case of treason, the government inquires most after the contrivers of it, so look not thou so much to the members of the body, and the lusts which war in them, as unto that corrupted judgment and will in thee that devised the means to satisfy those lusts, which fed them with thoughts and fancies, which were privy to the first contrivance of the treason, and gave way, and consented to it. The lusts which war in the members are but weapons, instruments (Rom. vi. 19). You must therefore look to the higher powers of sin in the soul, to the throne of unrighteousness there, whose agents those lusts are.

If a man would rightly understand a state or a commonwealth, it is not enough to know and view what proclamations come out, what decrees and orders are made, what factions are in it, what transactions of affairs, what armies raised, &c., for this all in a kingdom know; but he who would be an exact statesman must also know what passes at council board, what the consults and deliberations are, what was the design of such acts and proclamations, and to what end they were made, what ends such or such a potent faction has, with what colours they hide their secret intents, and into what principles of state all may be resolved. This is so to understand a state as few do, and for want of this knowledge how amiss do vulgar capacities judge of public actions. Thus also if you would understand the state of your souls, you must diligently and especially mark what passes at council board in the understanding, the sight of which is enough to amaze us, if we saw but by what devilish principles and atheistical consultations all is guided and swayed, and into which our actions may be resolved, what most base and filthy ends rule us, and what petty, slight, foolish motives we have, what ungodly reasons and deliberations pass through us, and how contrary to the rules of conscience, which notes all, as God's sworn secretary, and how all is overruled by our corrupt reasonings, let conscience say what it will in opposition; I say, if we saw all this, it would amaze any of us. This is indeed to search a man's heart, and to know it, for the wickedness of it lies especially in deceitfulness, and that deceitfulness consists in the juggling tricks of the mind, which are least discerned by us. —Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(4.) Because only thus can the exercise be made a reality.

(4455.) "Examine yourselves:" a metaphor from metal, that is pierced thorough, to see if it be gold within. Self-examination is a spiritual inquisition set up in one's soul: a man must search his heart for sin, as one would search a house for a traitor; or, as Israel sought for leaven to burn it.

—Watson, 1696.

(5.) Because there may be the form of godliness without the power.

(4456.) The devil may be within, though he stand not at the door to be seen. The fox keeps his den close when he knows that God's huntsmen be abroad to seek him. —Adams, 1654.

(4457.) In God's sight the whole human family is divisible into two classes, and only two—the good and bad, the converted and the unconverted—those that, still at enmity with God, lie under condemnation, and such as, renewed in the spirit of their minds, and reconciled to Him by the blood of His Son, are in a state of grace.

But, like those great orders of plants or animals which we meet with in the sciences of botany and zoology, these two classes are divisible into numerous subdivisions, differing apparently, though not radically, so much from each other that some sinners seem to stand more nearly related to saints than to many of their own class; just as, for instance, the sponge or branching coral, fixed to the rocks and belonging to the animal kingdom, looks more allied to the tangle that sways than to the fishes that swim in the flowing tide.

Let no man, therefore, conclude that he must be converted because there are broad outward marks of difference between him and many who are certainly not. People have gone down to hell, as the Pharisee did to his house, thanking God they are not as others. The difference between them has been more apparent than real, being no greater than that between two nights—one where the bark seems to sail in the moonshine on a silver sea, and the other so pitchy dark that her outlook can see neither coast nor reef, though he hears the roar of breakers; or between two bodies both dead—one still beautiful in death, and the other a horrid spectacle of loathsome and ghastly decay. In such circumstances how necessary it is to remember our Saviour's warning: "Take heed that ye be not deceived." —Guthrie.

(6.) Because one habitual fault may vitiate the whole life.

(4458.) When a clock is out of order, we take it to pieces and search where the fault lies, knowing that one wheel amiss may hinder the going of the whole clock. Our hearts are every day out of order; our work must be to take them to pieces by examination, and to see where the great fault is.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(7.) Because thus only can our sincerity be proved.

(4459.) "Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord." The thief must be found before he can be tried, and tried before he is condemned and executed. Some sins, no doubt, may be apprehended with little pains, but if thou beest true to God and thy own soul, thou wouldst not willingly let any of the company escape. How canst thou expect pardon for any, that desirest not justice on all? and how canst thou say, thou desirest justice on those sins, which thou endeavourest not to apprehend? That constable that having a hue-and-cry brought him for a pack of thieves, and lets any get away rather than he will rise to search for them, shows his zeal to justice is little. I do not say, thou wilt be able to find all; it is enough if by thy diligence thou givest proof of thy sincerity, that thou wouldst not conceal any. Set thyself, therefore, in good earnest to the work; beset thy heart and life round, as men would do a wood where murderers are lodged; hunt back to the several stages of thy life, youth, and riper years, all the capacities and relations thou hast stood in; thy calling general and particular, every place where thou hast lived, and thy behaviour in them. Bid memory bring in its old records, and read over what passages are there written; call conscience in to depose what it knows concerning thee, and encourage it to speak freely without mincing the matter. And take heed thou dost not snub this witness, as some corrupt judges use, when they would favour a bad cause, or give it secret instructions, as David did Joab, to deal gently with thee. Be willing to have thy conditions opened fully, and all thy coverings turned up.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

3. It must extend to the outward life.

(4460.) Suppose a man should sail, all the boiling and blazing day, round and round an old Dutch ship in the harbour, and the next day you should see him, like a magnified fly, creeping up and down the masts and spars, and examining the rigging, and you should ask him what he was doing, and he should answer, "I have heard that this ship is a dull sailer, and I want to look at it

No. Let him weigh anchor and spread the canvas, and take the wind and bear away, if he would know how she sails.

So, if a Christian would learn his true state, let him not row round and round the hull of his self-consciousness, and creep up and down the masts and spars of his feelings and affections; but let him spread the sails of resolution, and bear away on the ocean of duty. Then he shall know whether he be a dull or a fast sailer.

—Becher.

(4461.) As a man who is ignorant of the workmanship of a watch tries to examine it, and after several bungling attempts succeeds in opening it, and then does not know where to find the mainspring or the hairspring, or why the wheels play into each other, and at last shuts it again; so many men attempt self-examination. In the first place, they find it very hard to fix their thoughts. They cannot define their reason; they do not understand the play of their affections, or their moral powers, and so, after a weary hour they shut themselves up again, and hope that in some mysterious way God will bless to them the effort at self-examination. A man might as reasonably look into a well to see the sun rise, as to look thus into his heart with the expectation of good.

Other men examine themselves on this wise. They sit down and try to recall all their thoughts, and feelings, and actions during the day, and then they question themselves, "Do you enjoy reading the Bible?" Yes, they believe they do. "Do you like Sunday?" Yes, on the whole, what with the music and all the rest, they think they do like Sunday. "Are you fond of religious conversation?" Yes, if they can have their choice of people, they think they are fond of religious conversation. A vine would never be so stupid as to examine itself thus, but suppose it should, and should call out, "Roots, do you enjoy being down there in the soil?" "Yes, we enjoy being here in the soil." "Stem, do you like to be out there in summer?" "Yes, I like to be out here in summer." "Leaves, are you fond of waving in the sun and air?" "Yes, we are fond of the sun and air;" and, satisfied, it says, "I am an excellent vine." But the gardener, standing near, exclaims, "The useless thing! I paid ten dollars for the cutting, and I have pruned and cultivated it, and for years looked for the black Hamburg grapes it was to bear, but it has yielded only leaves." He does not care that the roots love the soil and the stem the summer. It makes no difference to him though every leaf spread itself broad as Sahara in its barrenness. It is fruit that he wants. Now, reading the Bible is like the roots in the soil, and liking Sunday is like the stem in summer, and being fond of religious conversation is like the leaves in the sun and air. If religion does not bring forth fruit in the life, all these things are as worthless in the sight of God, as is the barren vine in the thought of the gardener.

Around the chefs-d'œuvre in the galleries of Europe, artists are always congregated. You may see them standing before Raphael's Transfiguration, copying with the nicest care every line and tint of that matchless work; glancing constantly from their canvas to the picture, that even in the minutest parts they may reproduce the original. But if at one side you saw an artist who only looked up occasionally from his work, and drew there a deer or a cottage, just as his fancy suggested, what kind of a copyist would you call him? Now, true self-examination lies in ascertaining how nearly we are reproducing Christ. He is painted for us in no gallery, but His life glows, fourfold, in the Gospels, and our hearts are the canvas upon which we are to copy it. Let us not take occasional glimpses, and work, meanwhile, upon earthly designs; but let us look long and earnestly till our lives reflect the whole Divine image.

—Becher.

4. It must be made with Scriptural intelligence.

(4462.) It is inconceivable how a man should rationally judge of his own condition, when he knows not what to inquire after; or that he should clearly know his sincerity, who knows not what sincerity is. Yet I doubt not but, by an internal feeling, a strong, sound Christian, who hath his faith and love of other graces in action, may comfortably perceive the sincerity of his graces, though he be so ignorant as not clearly and distinctly to know the nature of sincerity, or to give any just description of it; even as an unlearned man, that is of a sound and healthful body, may feel what health is when he cannot describe it, nor tell distinctly wherein it doth consist. But yet, as he hath a general knowledge of it, so hath this ignorant, sincere Christian, of the nature of sincerity. And, withal, this is a more dangerous ground to stand on, because our sense is so uncertain in this case more than in the welfare of the body; and the assurance of such a soul will be more defective and imperfect, and very inconstant, who goes by mere feeling, without knowing the nature of what he feeleth, even as the forementioned unlearned man, in case of bodily health, if he have no knowledge, but mere feeling of the nature of health, he will be cast down with a toothache, or some harmless disease, if it be painful, as if he should presently die, when a knowing man could tell that there is no danger; and he would make light of a hectic, or other mortal disease, till it be incurable, because he feels no great pain in it. It is, therefore, a matter of necessity to open, most clearly and distinctly, the nature of sincerity or truth, so far as concerns the case in hand.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

5. The right standard must be employed.

(4463.) Let us not commend our graces to the eye of our deluded judgments, as shopkeepers do their coarse wares, by setting coarser by them, or by setting in our sight the examples of others who come short of us; but let us compare our little sparks of grace with those bright flames which have shone in the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, yea, in our Saviour, Christ Himself. And so we shall not be proud of our progress, but ashamed rather of our small proficiency; and with the apostle, "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those things that are before," we shall "press towards the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

—Downham, 1644.

(4464.) This duty of examining and proving supposes that there is some sure standard, which, if we go by, we are sure not to be deceived. Now that rule is the Word of God; but as in matters of doctrine men have left the Scriptures, the sure rule, and taken up antiquity, universality, tradition, and the like for their guide, and by this means have fallen into the ditch; so in matters of godliness, when we should try ourselves according to the characters and signs that the Scripture deciphers, we take up principles in the world, the applause of others, the conversation of most in the world. And thus it is with us as men in an hospital, because every one is either wounded or lame, or some way diseased, therefore none are offensive to each other.

—Burgess.

(4465.) Men compare themselves with men, and readily with the worst, and flatter themselves with that comparative betterness. This is not the way to see spots, to look into the muddy streams of profane men's lives; but look into the clear fountain of the Word, and there we may both discern and wash them; and consider the infinite holiness of God, and this will humble us to the dust.

—Leighton, 1611-1684.

(4466.) Let no soul examine itself by any lower marks than this, participation of the divine nature, conformity to the divine image. Examine what alliance your soul has to God; "whose is the image and superscription." Religion is a divine accomplishment, an efflux from God, and may, by its affinity to heaven, be discerned from a brat of hell and darkness. Therefore, Christians, if you will make a judgment of your state, lay your hearts and lives to the rule, the eternal goodness, the uncreated purity and holiness, and see whether you resemble that copy: for conformity to the image and will of God, that is religion; and that God will own for His, when all the counterfeits and shadows of it will fly away and disappear for ever.

There is a vanity which I have observed in many pretenders to nobility and learning, when men seek to demonstrate the one by their coat of arms, and the records of their family, and the other by a gown, or a title, or their names standing in the register of the university, rather than by the accomplishments and behaviour of gentlemen or scholars.

A like vanity, I doubt, may be observed in many pretenders to religion. Some are searching God's decretals to find their names written in the Book of Life, when they should be studying to find God's name written upon their hearts, "Holiness to the LORD" engraven upon their souls. Some are busy examining themselves by notes and marks without them, when they should labour to find the marks and prints of God and His nature upon them. Some have their religion in their books and authors, which should be the law of God written in the tables of the heart. Some glory in the bulk of their duties, and in the multitude of their pompous performances and religious achievements, crying with Jehu, "Come, see here my zeal for the Lord;" whereas it were much more excellent if one could see their likeness to the Lord, and the characters of divine beauty and holiness drawn upon their hearts and lives. But we, if we would judge rightly of our religious state, must view ourselves in God, who is the fountain of all goodness and holiness, and the rule of all perfection.

—Shaw, 1635-1696.

V. MISTAKES TO BE GUARDED AGAINST.

1. Judgments are not to be founded on merely transient emotions.

(4467.) Blessed is he that does righteousness:

not only now and then, but 'tis his constant course. We do not judge men's complexions by the colour they have when they sit before the fire. We cannot judge of men by a fit and pang when they are under the awe of an ordinance, or in good company; but when at all times he labours to keep up a warmth of heart towards God. —Manton, 1620-1677.

2. It must not be forgotten that self-examination is only a means to an end.

(4468.) So sluggish are our hearts, and so loose and inconstant are our apprehensions and resolutions, that we have need to be most frequently quickening them, and lifting at them, and renewing our desires, and suppressing the contrary desires, by the serious thoughts of God and immortality. Our thoughts are the bellows that must kindle the flames of love, desire, hope, and zeal. Our thoughts are the spur that we must put on a sluggish, tired heart. And so far as they conduce to any such works and ends as these, they are desirable and good. But what master loveth to see his servant sit down and think when he should be at work? or to use his thoughts only to grieve and vex himself for his faults, but not to mend them? to sit down lamenting that he is so bad and unprofitable a servant, when he should be up and doing his master's business as well as he is able? Such thoughts as hinder us from duty, or discourage, or unfit us for it, are real sins, however they may go under a better name. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4469.) A Highlander who purchased a barometer under a mistaken idea of its purpose, complained that he could not see that it had made any improvement in the weather; and those who use signs and evidences for an intent which they will never answer, will be sure to complain that their faith is not increased, though they are always practising self-examination. Yet a barometer has its uses, and so have evidences of grace. To feel the pulse is an admirable thing; the mistake is to put this in the place of strengthening food or tonic medicine.

—Spurgeon.

3. It must not be conducted so as to become morbid and hurtful.

(4470.) Though straggling thoughts must be turned inward our hearts must be watched and not neglected, yet must we not be always poring on ourselves, and neglect the rest of our intellectual converse. To look too long on the running of a stream will make our eyes misjudge of what we after look on, as if all things had the same kind of motion. To look too long on the turning of a wheel will make us vertiginous, as if all turned round. And to pore too long on the disordered motions, the confused thoughts, the wants, the passions of our diseased minds, will but molest us, and cast us into greater disquiet and confusion.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4471.) As a general rule, self-contemplation is a power towards mischief. The only way to grow is to look out of one's self. There is too much introversion among Christians. A shipmaster might as well look down into the hold of his ship for the north star, as a Christian look down into his own heart for the Sun of Righteousness. Out and beyond is the shining.

—Becker.

(4472.) There are many honest, earnest, solemn-minded men, who keep themselves under condemnation, as if all the time God were looking at every deed, feeling, or impulse of theirs, and as if He had no confidence in them at all : and they go about subjecting themselves to an unwholesome introverted inspection.

There was a time, which I recollect, when Professor Hitchcock delivered to the students of Amherst College a series of lectures on dyspepsia, being himself an archdyspeptic. He taught them that they should weigh out their food, and that so many ounces of such and such elements was a suitable meal for a robust man ; and forthwith there was a buying of scales, and a weighing of bread and meat ; and suspicions were excited in the minds of the young men as to what each organ of digestion was doing ; and dyspeptics broke out on every side ; and some of them never got over it. They had no confidence in their stomachs, and felt that they could not trust them ; and watching took the place of that forgetfulness which is so favourable to the health of the body.

—Becher.

(4473.) By undue and overstrained selfinspection the mind is apt to become morbid and depressed, and to breed scruples, which tease and harass without producing any real fruit. The man becomes a valetudinarian in religion, full of himself, his symptoms, his ailments, the delicacy of his moral health ; and valetudinarians are always a plague, not only to themselves, but to everybody connected with them.

—Goulburn.

(4474.) Confession to our Lord Jesus Christ, and that self-scrutiny which must precede it, are most healthful practices ; but they require to have their tendencies counterbalanced and held in equipoise by devotional exercises of a contrary kind. Self-inspection may easily, and will certainly, become morbid, if it be not checked by a constant outlook of the mind. True religion is all comprised in two precepts, "Look into yourself to see your own vileness, Look out of yourself to Christ." Little enough health, comfort, peace, and satisfaction, shall we derive from the first of these precepts, unless we constantly couple with it the second in parallel columns.

Anatomy schools, and the nauseating operations performed in them, are absolutely essential to the maintenance of health. Unless our medical students acquaint themselves by dissection with the structure of the human frame, their practice will be all in the dark,—uncertain, empirical, blundering. But to live in an anatomy school would be to inhale a pernicious atmosphere. Nay, open the windows, and let in the air and light of heaven ; and the study of the subject having been completed, let the student walk abroad and drink into his constitution the genial influences of nature.

To be ransacking the human structure all day, useful as the results may be, is an exercise which has morbid tendencies that require counteraction. Learn a lesson, my hearer, respecting that self-inspection which both reason and the Gospel recommend. Live not too much with thyself in the close chamber of spiritual anatomy. Doubt and disquietude, and subtle metaphysical difficulties, and over-canvassing of motives, and splitting of hairs, will be the least mischief resulting from such a system. The knowledge and deep consciousness of thy dark guilt is only valuable as a background, on which to paint more vividly to thy mind's eye the rainbow colours of the love of Jesus. Walk abroad ever and anon, and expatiate freely in the sunlight of God's grace and love in Christ. It is free as the air to those who would inhale it, bright as the sunlight to those who place no obstructions in its way. Breathe it, bask in it, walk in it, there is no other mode of really invigorating the spiritual system. A religion, if it is to be strong, must be joyous ; and joyous it cannot be without the light of God's love in Christ shining freely into every corner of the soul.

—Goulburn.

4. The disparity between our desires after holiness and our actual attainments is not to drive us to despair.

(4475.) Real saints are often complaining of their want of grace, and condemning themselves for their not improving the means of grace. Their desires are ardent and ascending to perfection, and they judge of their defects by that measure. He that sails before the wind in a river, and sees men walking on the shore, to his eye they seem to stand still, because of the swift motion of the boat. Thus the saints judge of their imperfections by the swiftness with which they are carried forward in their desires after complete holiness. Thus easily may we mistake in our judgment respecting the truth, or strength, of grace in our souls.

—Salter.

SIN.

L A UNIVERSAL CONSCIOUSNESS.

(4476.) As light is universal, although some may shut their eyes close, and admit none of it, so is the consciousness of sin universal, although many believe that they have got rid of it altogether. For this very absence of conviction only proves the incompleteness of their nature. They deceive themselves, and the truth is not in them. They have lost the feeling of sin that was given them as a safeguard. It burns them like a fire ; but their skin has lost all sensation. They are sleeping steeped in cold mists and poisonous dews, but they know not the poison because they are asleep. Yet fire burns, and poison destroys not the less when the senses, that are sentinels against them, desert their posts. Every man whose nature is complete, and awake, and active, knows that there is such a thing as sin, and that he is a partaker of it. The man who has tried for a quarter of a century to pare off from his mind all that does not minister to one chosen worldly pursuit, will be able to deny that he is convinced of sin. But you appeal from such maimed and crippled spirits to the general sense of more complete minds. And the result is the admission that there is a better law, which our conscience admits the authority of, warning against the law of pride, and self-will, and appetite within us, and that the worse prevails against the better, and that the sense of disquiet accompanies that wrong decision in every case.

—Archbishop Thomson.

II. THE EVIL OF SIN.

(4477.) There are many things that speak the evil of sin, but of all things the blood of Jesus speaks the evil of sin loudest.

The separation from God and union with Satan speaks the evil of sin. As by grace we are united unto God, made one with God, and separated from the devil; so by sin we are separated from God, and united unto Satan, and made one with him.

The condemnation of the whole world by the sin of Adam speaks the evil of sin. If the committing that one sin brought condemnation upon all the world, how great must the evil of sin be!

The fire of hell speaks the evil of sin, for what is the fuel that the fire of hell feeds upon but sin; take sin away, and the fire of hell will die, it will be quenched.

The spoil of duties speaks it. One sinful thought is enough to spoil a prayer, to spoil a duty, to spoil a sermon. And if one drop of ink shall blacken a whole glass of milk, how black is that ink!

The horror of conscience speaks it; for if but one sin set on upon the soul by God doth put a man into such horror of conscience, how great is the evil of sin!

The troublesomeness of the relics of sin in the saint speaks it. Sins in the saints are but wasps without their stings; and if the wasps without their stings be so troublesome, how troublesome are the wasps that have their stings in them; how troublesome is sin in itself!

But above all, the blood of sprinkling speaks the evil of sin. For if the guilt of sin be so great that nothing can satisfy for it but the blood of Jesus; and the filth of sin be so great that nothing can fetch out the stain thereof but the blood of Jesus, how great, how heinous, how sinful must the evil of sin be!

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

III. IS HATEFUL TO GOD.

1. As a defiance of His authority.

(4478.) If a king warns a city of traitors, and calls upon them to search them out and send them away, and they never regard the message, but willingly give them harbour and entertainment, it is a sign they are disaffected to him. To cherish a sin after warning is an open rebellion against God.

—Alanton, 1620-1667.

(4479.) Sin is an attempt to control the immutable and unalterable laws of everlasting righteousness, goodness, and truth, upon which the universe depends.

—Whicote, 1610-1683.

2. As an infraction of the moral order of the universe.

(4480.) The tempter persuadeth the sinner that it cannot be that God should make so great a matter of sin, because the thoughts of a man's heart or his words or deeds are matter of no great moment, when man himself is so poor a worm; and whatever he doth it is no hurt to God. But if God so much regards us as to make us and preserve us continually, and to become our Governor, and make a law for us, and judge us, and reward His servants with no less than heaven; then you may easily see that He so much regardeth us as to observe whether we obey or break His laws. He that so far careth for a clock or watch as to make it and wind it up, doth care whether it go true or false. What do these men make of God, who think He cares not what men do? Then He cares not if men beat you, or rob you, or kill you—for none of this hurteth God! And the king may say, "If any murder your friends and children, why should I punish him, he hurt not me?" But justice is to keep order in the world, and not only to preserve the governor from hurt. God may be wronged, though He be not hurt.

And He will make you pay for it if you hurt others, and smart for it if you hurt yourself.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. Yet it does not necessarily cause Him to hate the sinner.

(4481.) Because sin is odious in the sight of men, we are apt to think it is odious in the sight of God in the same way. Men's thoughts of each other's sinfulness are oftentimes mingled with revengeful feelings. But God's thoughts of our sinfulness are like a mother's thought of the sinfulness of her dear beloved child. She hates the sin, but loves the child, and gives herself for the child, that she may cleanse out the sin. When God sees in us the sin of pride, or the sin of selfishness, running strong and deep, He does not despise us. He looks upon that which is evil in us as we look upon the warts on the rugged oak. He looks upon it as a development which comes from supereminent temptations or constitutional weaknesses, and so has compassion upon us. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. For He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust."

—Beecher.

IV. IS HURTFUL TO MAN.

1. It hopelessly enslaves him.

(4482.) The way to heaven is upward, hard, and difficult: the way to hell is downward. Now he that runs down a hill cannot stay when he will, or if he set down with himself how far and where he will stay, he is not like to observe it; so in sin, he cannot take upon himself when he would, to say thus far and no further I will sin; for the corruption of his nature is as fierce horses, and the devil as the driver; he shall not command himself when he would.

—Stock, 1568-1626.

(4483.) One of the affecting features in a life of vice is the longing, wistful outlooks given by the wretches who struggle with unbridled passions, towards virtues which are no longer within their reach. Men in the tide of vice are sometimes like the poor creatures swept down the stream of mighty rivers, who see people safe on shore, and trees, and flowers, as they go quickly past; and all things that are desirable gleam upon them for a moment to heighten their trouble, and to aggravate their swift-coming destruction.

—Beecher.

(4484.) It does not signify to the captive whether the chain which fetters his body be links of iron or a chain of gold. His captivity were a fact as truly though his limbs were bound with silken cords; only the former would be more galling to the flesh, harder to wear, and more degrading perhaps in appearance; but the latter would mark him as truly a slave in the power of the master, whose will must be obeyed, though he rule "with a rod of iron."

Sin is the master of the mind by nature; though in some cases, it secures the soul to the service of the world by bonds as fine as gossamer. Satan forges some of his chains of hard bondage, heavy as iron, strong as brass. In other cases he binds the heart with golden fetters; and thus gratifies pride, which assumes to be superior to the poorer—though all alike are his slaves, who are led "captive by the devil at his will" (2 Tim. ii. 26).

—Bowden.

2. It pollutes and corrupts the soul.

(4485.) Impurity arises from the iron, and, having arisen from it, it destroys it; thus do a transgressor's own works lead him to the evil path. —Buddha.

(4486.) Sin degrades man; of an angel created to love God it makes a demon who will curse Him for all eternity. —Vianney.

(4487.) Sin is to the soul like fire to combustible matter: it assimilates before it destroys it.

—South, 1633-1716.

3. It forfeits all our claims upon God as our Creator.

(4488.) The relation of a Creator is always very strong, and before sin this strength appears in love; but after sin the same strength vents itself in revenge. Where it meets with holiness it protects; where it meets with sin it destroys; as the same wind that carries a ship well ballasted, if ill-rigged or accoutred, it drowns it. The same strength of constitution that keeps off diseases from the body, when it comes to be infected, and to comply with a disease, quickens its dissolution. The same argument that proves this assertion, by a subtle inversion of the terms, will prove the contrary. The same relation of a Creator that endears God to the innocent, fires Him against a sinner. God looks upon the soul as Amnon did upon Tamar: while it was a virgin, He loved it; but now it is deflowered, He hates it. We read in the law that he that cursed his father was to be stoned to death; we do not read that if he had cursed another he had been dealt withal so severely. One would have thought that the nearness of a father would have saved him; but it was this alone that condemned him. Build not, therefore, upon the sandy foundation of a false surmise of God's mercy as a Creator; for this relation is (as I may so speak) indifferent, and may be determined, as to its influence, either to be helpful or destructive, according to the goodness or badness of the creature. While thou doest well it will embrace thee; but upon the least transgression it will confound thee. The same sword that now hangs by thy side, and defends thee, may be one day brought to run thee through.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4489.) Sin disengages the love of God to the creature, because it renders the creature useless as to the end for which it was designed. Things, whose essence and being stand in relation to such an end, have their virtue and value from their fitness to attain it. Everything is ennobled from its use, and debased as far as it is useless. As long as a man continues an instrument of God's glory, so long his title to life and happiness stands sure, and no longer. But now, sin in scripture, and in God's account, is the death of the soul. "We were dead in trespasses and sins." Now death makes a thing utterly useless, because it renders it totally inactive; and in things that are naturally active, that which deprives them of their action bereaves them of their use. The soul, by reason of sin, is unable to act spiritually; for sin has disordered the soul, and turned the force and edge of all its operations against God; so that now it can bring no glory to God by doing, but only by suffering, and being made miserable. It is now unfit to obey His commands, and fit only to endure His strokes. It is incapable by any active communion or converse with Him to enjoy His love, and a proper object only to bear His anger and revenge. We may take the case in this similitude. A physician has a servant; while this servant lives honestly with him, he is fit to be used and to be employed in his occasions; but if this servant should commit a felony, and for that be condemned, he can then be actively serviceable to him no longer; he is fit only for him to dissect, and make an object upon which to show the experiments of his skill. So while man was yet innocent he was fit to be used by God in a way of active obedience; but now having sinned, and being sentenced by the law to death as a malefactor, he is a fit matter only for God to torment and show the wonders of His vindictive justice.

—South, 1633-1716.

4. It is the source of all temporal evil.

(4490.) Sin produceth all temporal evil (Lam. i. 8). Jerusalem hath grievously sinned, therefore she is removed. It is the Trojan horse, it hath sword and famine and pestilence in the belly of it.

—Watson, 1696.

V. ITS DECEITFULNESS.

(4491.) What is the reason that so many make a mock of sin, and dance merrily over the infernal pit, and play with the unquenchable fire, but ignorance? The child doth not know that the fire will burn him. As the horse, they rush into the battle, fighting against God and their souls, not knowing it will be to their destruction. These Balaams run greedily after the wages of unrighteousness, not seeing the angel that standeth in the way with a drawn sword in his hand ready to kill them. Did they know what they do when they wilfully break God's law, they would sooner leap into a furnace of scalding lead than provoke so jealous a God. But sin goeth in a disguise, and thence is welcome; like Judas, it kisseth and kills; like Joab, it salutes and slays. The foolish sinner seeth the pleasant streams of Jordan, but not the Dead Sea into which they will certainly empty themselves to his ruin.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4492.) It is the act of lust to show the quintessence and the refined part of a sinful action, separate from all its dregs and indecencies, so to recommend it to the apprehension of a deluded sinner. It will present you only with the fair side, and tell you what pleasure and satisfaction you shall reap from such or such an action: but it never reminds you of the regret and remorse of conscience that will accompany it; of the shame and vengeance that will follow it. No; lust is too skillful a sophister, and has at least this part of perfection, to conceal its imperfections.

Lust never deals impartially with the choice, so as to confront the whole good with the whole evil of an object; but declaims amply and magnificently of one, while it is wholly silent of the other. And it is observable that there are few things that present so entirely bad an appearance but admit of very plausible pleas and flourishes of commendation. Sin prevails upon the affections, not so much by the suitableness of the thing proposed as by the art of the proposal.

As for instance, should I tell a thirsty man that I had for him a drink of a noble colour, a quick taste, and a fragrant smell, surely there could be nothing in this description but must raise and inflame his appetite : but should I tell him that it was poison that was of this so rare a taste, colour, and smell, this would be a full allay to his desire, and a sufficient countercharm to all its other alluring qualities.

It is no question but Judas' covetousness addressed his sin to him in this manner, and struck his apprehension with the convenience of having so much money, and gaining it with so much ease ; but it told him nothing of the black despair and the disastrous death that was to follow it. For had this been offered to his thoughts at the same time, it is no doubt but it must have dashed the temptation, and made it cheap and contemptible.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4493.) The wages that sin bargains with the sinner are life, pleasure, and profit ; but the wages it pays him with are death, torment, and destruction : he that would understand the falsehood and deceit of sin thoroughly must compare its promises and its payments together.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4494.) The approaches of sin are like the conduct of Jael. It "brings butter in a lordly dish." It bids high for the soul. But when it has fascinated and lulled the victim, the nail and the hammer are behind.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(4495.) Sin always has two aspects—distinct and contrasting aspects : the one is that which she assumes before her end is gained and the deed done ; and the other, that which she puts on after she has ensnared her dupe, and hung her fetters on his soul. How musical in the ear of Judas was the jingle of the thirty pieces of silver, while the bribe was dangling in the purse of the treasurer of the chief priests and elders ! Yet how dull and tinsel was its ring as he dashed them down upon the table in his agony, after their lustre had been tarnished by the tinge of harmless blood ! How fair was the enchantress when she came to him with her promises ; yet how hard and haggard was her mocking features when the mask had fallen and the real face was seen ! And is it not always so ? Have not you found it so every time you have dallied with the charmer, and listened to her voice ? There's many a deadly poison which is pleasant to the taste ; there's many a fatal lullaby which is charming to the ear ; there's many a Dead Sea apple which is tempting to the eye ; there's many a cruel hand which is soft as velvet. Sin is a syren while she tempts, but an ugly raw-boned hag when she has her prey within her toils. Those tresses which appear so comely may change to snakes to sting the hand which smooths them ; those dove-like, winsome eyes that swim so wantonly, shall flash like basilisks upon you if you are captivated by their blandishments ; the bloom upon those lips is painted to decoy the heady trifler, and the kiss of lust imprinted there shall wash away the lying bloom, and show the livid, corpse-like grin of the death's-head. There is said to have been kept in the halls of the Inquisition a beauteous statue or effigy of a virgin ; the painter's tenderest strokes of art had been expended to give loveliness to the face, and the sculptor's utmost skill had been enlisted to add charm to charm in the rounded moulding of form and limb. The white arms were undraped and extended wide, as though to embrace ; the eye and lip, and the whole attitude were full of winning invitation : and the professing penitent was led into this fair presence, and commanded to advance and embrace the figure. As soon as he drew near to meet that bending neck and stooping smile, the fair white arms encircled him—not with the caress of love, but with the vice-like clutch of vengeance, and the bosom opened, and the lips expanded, and a hundred gleaming knives shot from the virgin figure, transfixing the victim with a hundred scarlet stabs ; the parted lips pushed forth a barbed tongue, and showed fanged teeth to lacerate and tear :—in short, the beauty was transformed into a beast, the fairy form became an armoury of poignards, whose every charm concealed a dagger, and whose every grace was death. And so it is with sin. Decking her bed with roses, she merges her poison-breath amidst their fragrance, and lulls her silly victim with a counterfeit repose. Oh, rest not on her pillow, for a serpent coils beneath it ! Wander not amidst her bowers, for wasps are honeying amidst her blossoms and leaving their stings in the core of all her fruits. Recline not upon the sunny knolls, for volcanic lava lurks under the moss, and the fire of hell lights up her transient heaven. "My son, when sinners entice thee, consent thou not."

—Mursell.

VI. ITS FOLLY.

(4496.) If a man is safe in sailing against God's laws and everything that is good, how much more will God prosper him if he applies to legitimate commerce the same skill and enterprise and industry that he is now applying to that which is illegitimate. I have seen men work ten times as hard to be villains as they would have been obliged to work to be honest men. The greatest slaves I know anything about are those whom the devil has got the upper hand of, and whom he is compelling to dodge between the supreme law of God and their worldly prosperity. They may secure some sort of prosperity, but you may depend upon it they work hard for it.

There was a man in the town where I was born, who used to steal all his firewood. He would get up on cold nights, and go and take it from his neighbours' wood-piles. A computation was made, and it was ascertained that he spent more time, and worked harder, to get his fuel than he would have been obliged to if he had earned it in an honest way, and at ordinary wages. And this thief was a type of thousands of men who work a great deal harder to please the devil than they would have to work to please God.

—Becher.

VII. REASONS FOR SHUNNING IT.

1. Because when it has once ensnared us, escape may be impossible.

(4497.) Sin weaves its twining and embracing tendrils round about the heart. In their growth they may seem weak ; and on account of their littleness and tenderness not sufficiently worth our present serious attention, because we think at any spare moment we can take the pruning-knife and lop them off with ease. So sin, like the deadly ivy, in its growth escapes our notice ; its branches are thin and frail and withal green and fair to look upon. But pause awhile ! The budding shoot to-day is next year the stiff and stubborn branch, and there are ten thousand little tendrils clinging and growing into the bark of the noble tree, around which the ivy is stealthily springing up: its leaves are darkening, it is becoming gloomy, and rugged, and stubborn. True, at the extremities it looks tender, and verdant, and harmless; but it is making its way, creeping on and on, and up and up. Did it approach the head of the forest tree with a hard and stubborn stalk it would take no hold. The leafy monarch would spurn the rude assault from its broad and gnarled front; but it steals softly, and even gracefully, into his breast; closes around him with a tender embrace, and then, from its roots beginning to call up its sap and latent vigour, it swells and extends, then darkens, hardens; its grip becomes irresistible; the tree's action grows less and less free; every day its waving arms gradually cease to wave; the free air and light becomes shut from its stem and branches; it is covered with a dull, thick drapery of leaves that obstructs its growth. So gradually its sap withers away; branch after branch decays; its noble stem betrays rottenness and infirmity, until at length the lord of the land passes by and says, "Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?"

It is thus sin engrafts itself upon the tree of our life, and men too commonly let it grow on and on, until their own free action becomes subject to the slavery of hell.

—Bellev.

(4498.) In the gardens of Hampton Court you will see many trees entirely vanquished and well-nigh strangled by huge coils of ivy, which are wound about them like the snakes around the unhappy Laocoon: there is no untwisting the folds, they are too giant-like and fast fixed, and every hour the rootlets of the climber are sucking the life out of the unhappy tree. Yet there was a day when the ivy was a tiny aspirant, only asking a little aid in climbing; had it been denied then, the tree had never become its victim, but by degrees the humble weakling grew in strength and arrogance, and at last it assumed the mastery, and the tall tree became the prey of the creeping, insinuating destroyer. The moral is too obvious. Sorrowfully do we remember many noble characters which have been ruined little and little by insinuating habits. Drink has been the ivy in many cases. Reader, see to it, lest some slowly-advancing sin overpower you: men who were murdered by slow poisoning die just as surely as those who take arsenic.

—Spurgeon.

(4499.) It has been related by a French writer that the captain of a vessel was one day walking carelessly along by the side of a river, not far from its mouth, at low water. As he looked about him, not minding his steps, he did not see extended before him a great chain, one end of which was fastened to a ring fixed in a stone on the bank, the other to an anchor sunk in the river. Not seeing it, he stumbled against it, and his foot passing through one of the links of the chain, he could not draw it back again. He struggled violently to extricate himself; he turned his foot first on one side, and then on the other, but all in vain. He then called out for help, and some men who were passing heard him and hastened to his assistance.

They strained every nerve to drag the foot through the chain, but it was beginning to swell, and all their efforts were in vain. What was to be done? To unfasten or take away the chain was impossible. It was a mass of iron which could only be moved with the help of a capstan; and there was no time to be lost, for the tide was coming in, and the water rose every moment. "Let us call a smith to saw the chain," said the men to each other, and one of them was despatched to the nearest village, which was at a distance of two or three miles from the spot. The smith came, but it was found that the tools he had brought with him were not powerful enough, and he was obliged to go back to the village for others. At last he returned.

In the meantime the tide had risen, the mighty waves were rolling in, and the water, which at first had barely wet his feet, had now reached the unfortunate man's waist; the men who had come to his assistance had been forced to get into a boat, and the smith saw he could do nothing for him. What was to be done? Oh, the agony of that moment! There is one last resource, only one, but it is a terrible one. He must sacrifice his leg to save his life. Will he do it? Yes, he will sacrifice anything, everything to escape death.

A surgeon is sought without a moment's delay; he comes in hot haste, bringing his case of instruments and everything necessary for the operation. The unhappy man sees him approaching. "Oh do not lose a moment," he cries; "cut off my leg, doctor, and save my life." But when the doctor reached the spot, he was obliged to get into a boat, and it was only by strong strokes of the oars that he could get near the man; the water had reached his neck, and with great trouble they kept his head above water. "It is too late," cried the doctor, and in a few moments the waves rolled over the unhappy man's head—he was lost.

Reader, this terrible story may be useful to us as a comparison. You, like this man, go forth in the morning of life light-hearted and happy. The chain, which through carelessness he does not see, is the snare which Satan spreads for you. The ring in which his foot is caught is sin. He believes that he will easily free himself from it, but he deceives himself. The rising tide is death, which is approaching. There is not a moment to be lost; every passing hour renders the chain of sin stronger, salvation more uncertain. What will become of you? No boat in the world can save you; no smith has power to sunder that chain; there is no surgeon skilful enough to sever that which binds you to your sin. What will become of you?

There is a Saviour, one only—Jesus is His name. He can save you, deliver you, set you free. Turn unto Him, call upon Him for help; do not delay, for time is passing.

2. Because when it has once emanated us, the very desire to escape may be lost.

(4500.) Heaven is compared to a hill: and therefore is figured by Olympus among the heathen; by Mount Zion, in God's Book: Hell, contrariwise to a pit. The ascent to the one is hard, therefore; and the descent of the other, easy and headlong: and so, as if we once begin to fall, the recovery is most difficult; and not one of many stays till he comes to the bottom. I will be content to pant and blow, and sweat in climbing up to heaven: as, contrarily, I will be wary of setting the first step downward towards the pit. For, as there is a Jacob's ladder into heaven, so there are blind stairs that go winding down into death, whereof each makes way for other. From the object is raised an ill suggestion, suggestion draws on delight; delight, consent; consent, endeavour; endeavour, practice; practice, custom; custom, excuse; excuse, defence; defence, obstinacy; obstinacy, boasting of sin; boasting a reprobate sense. I will watch over my ways: and do Thou, Lord, watch over me, that I may avoid the first degrees of sin. And, if those overtake my frailty, yet, keep me, that presumptuous sins prevail not over me. Beginnings are with more ease and safety declined when we are free, than proceedings when we have begun. —Hall, 1574-1656.

(4501.) Once upon the inclined road of error, and there is no swiftness so tremendous as that with which we dash adown the plane, no insensibility so obstinate as that which fastens on us through the quick descent. The start once made, and there is neither stopping nor waking until the last and lowest depth is sounded. Our natural fears and promptings become hushed with the first impetus, and we are lost to everything but the delusive tones of sin, which only cheat the senses and make our misery harmonious. Farewell all opportunities of escape—the strivings of conscience—the faithful whisperings of shame, which served us even when we stood trembling at the fatal point! Farewell the holy power of virtue, which made foul things look hideous, and good things lovely, and kept a guard about our hearts to welcome beauty and frighten off deformity! Farewell integrity—joy—rest—and happiness.

—Melville, 1798-1871.

3. Because even if we escape from it, some of its effects are eternal.

(4502.) The mind of man has been compared to a white sheet of paper. Now it is like a white sheet of paper in this, that whatever we write upon it, whether with distinct purpose or no, nay, every drop of ink we let fall upon it, makes an abiding mark, a mark which we cannot rub out, without much injury to the paper; unless indeed the mark has been very slight from the first, and we set about erasing it while it is fresh. In one of the grandest tragedies of our great English poet, there is a scene which, when one reads it, is enough to make one's blood run cold. A woman, whose husband had made himself king of Scotland by means of several murders, and who had been the prompter and partner of his crimes, is brought in, while in her sleep, and continually rubbing her hands, as though she were washing them, crying ever and anon, "Yet here's a spot. . . . What I will these hands ne'er be clean? . . . here's the smell of blood still: all the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand." In these words there is an awful power of truth. We can stain our souls; we can dye them, and double-dye them, and triple-dye them; we can dye them all the colours of hell's rainbow; but we cannot wash them white. All the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten them, all the fountains of the great deep will not wash one little spot out of them. The usurping Queen of Scotland had been guilty of murder; and the stain of blood, it has been very generally believed, cannot be washed out. But it is not the stain of blood alone; every stain soils the soul; and none of them can be washed out. Every little speck of ink eats into the paper; every sin, however small we may deem it, eats into the soul. If we try to write over it, we make a deeper blot; if we try to scratch it out, the next letters which we write on the spot are blurred. Therefore is it of such vast importance that we should be very careful of what we write. In the tragedy which I was quoting just now, the Queen says, "What's done cannot be undone." This amounts to the same thing as what I have written, in the sense in which I am now calling upon you to consider these words. What's done cannot be undone. You know that this is true. You know you cannot push back the wheels of time, and make yesterday come again, so as to do over afresh what you did wrongly then. That which you did yesterday, yesterday will keep; you cannot change it; you cannot make it less or greater; if it was crooked, you cannot make it straight. You cannot turn back the leaves in the book of life, and read the lesson you have grabbed over again. That which you have written, you have written: that which you have done, you have done; and you cannot unwrite or undo it.

—Harr, 1796-1834.

(4503.) Even pardoned sins must leave a trace in heavy self-reproach. You have heard of the child whose father told him that whenever he did anything wrong a nail should be driven into a post, and when he did what was good he might pull one out. There were a great many nails driven into the post, but the child tried very hard to get the post cleared of the nails by striving to do right. At length he was so successful in his struggles with himself that the last nail was drawn out of the post. The father was just about to praise the child, when, stooping down to kiss him, he was startled to see tears fast rolling down his face. "Why, my boy, why do you cry? Are not all the nails gone from the post?" "Oh yes! the nails are all gone, but the marks are left." That is a familiar illustration, but don't despise it because of that. It illustrates the experience of many a grey old sire, who, looking upon the traces of his old sins, as they yet rankle in his conscience, would give a hundred worlds to live himself back into young manhood, that he might obliterate the searing imprint of its follies. Have you never heard of fossil-rain? In the stratum of the old red sandstone there are to be seen the marks of showers of rain which fell centuries and centuries ago, and they are so plain and perfect that they clearly indicate the way the wind was drifting, and in what direction the tempest slanted from the sky. So may the tracks of youthful sins be traced upon the tablet of the life when it has merged into old age,—tracks which it is bitter and sad remorse to look upon, and which call forth many a bootless longing for the days and months which are past.

—Mursell.

VIII. ONE SIN.

1. Is a transgression of the whole law.

(4504.) He that yields to one sin casts contempt upon the authority that made the whole law, and upon this account breaks it all. "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all," and he gives the reason in the next words, "For He that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art a transgressor of the law." Not that he is guilty of all distributively, but collectively, as Estius well notes. For the law is one copulative; one commandment cannot be wronged, but all are interested in the same; as the whole body suffers by a wound given to one part, "God spake all these words:" they are ten words, but one law.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4505.) Consider what thou dost before thou gratifiest Satan in any one motion; for by one sin thou strengthenest the whole body of sin. Give to one sin, and that will send more beggars to your door, and they will come with a stronger plea than the former; another, why mayest thou not do this for them as well as that? Thy best way is to keep the door shut to all, lest, while thou intendest to entertain only one, all crowd in with it. But if it were possible that thou couldst break this connection of sin, so as to take off one link that pleaseth thee best, and not draw the whole chain after thee by committing this, yet know there is a connection of guilt also. "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." A man cannot stab any part of the face, but he will disfigure the whole countenance, and wrong the whole man. Thus the law is copulative; an affront done to one redounds to the dishonour of all, and so is resented by God the law-giver, whose authority is equally in all.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4506.) A man that breaks one point of God's law, breaks it all. "If thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill thou art become a transgressor,"—of the single commandment? No! thou art a transgressor "of the whole law"! Like some of those creeping weeds that lie underground and put up a little leaf here and another one there; and you dig down fancying that their roots are short, but you find that they go creeping and tortuous below the surface, and the whole soil is full of them,—so all sin holds on by one root.

—Maclaren.

2. Makes way for more.

(4507.) One sin keeps up the devil's interest; it is like a nest egg left there to draw a new temptation.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(4508.) By allowing one sin, we disarm and deprive ourselves of having a conscientious argument to defend ourselves against any other sin. He that can go against his conscience in one, cannot plead conscience against any other; for if the authority of God awes him from one, it will from all. "How can I do this, and sin against God?" said Joseph. I doubt not but his answer would have been the same if his mistress had bid him to lie for her, as now when she enticed him to lie with her. The ninth commandment would have bound him as well as the seventh. Hence the Apostle exhorts "not to give place to the devil." Implying, by yielding to one, we lose our ground, and what we lose we gain; and let him alone to improve advantages. The little wimple once entered, the workman can then drive a great nail. One sin will widen thy swallow a little, that thou wilt not so much strain at the next.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4509.) One sin inclineth the mind to more. If one thief be in the house, he will let in the rest, because they have the same disposition and design.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. Proves the whole bent of the heart and life to be sinful.

(4510.) "But," saith the tempter, "it is but one sin, and the rest of thy life is good and blameless; and God judgeth by the greater part of thy life whether the evil or the good be most."

Answer. If a man be a murderer, or a traitor, will you excuse him because the rest of his life is good, and it is but one sin that he is charged with? One sort of poison may kill a man; and one stab at the heart, though all his body else be whole: you may surfeit on one dish: one leak may sink a ship. "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, is guilty of all" (James ii. 10). Indeed God doth judge by the bent of thy heart and the main drift and endeavour of thy life. But canst thou say that the bent of thy heart and the main endeavour of thy life is for God, and heaven, and holiness? No; if it were, thou wert regenerate; and this would not let thee live in any one beloved, chosen, wilful sin. The bent of a man's heart and life may be sinful, earthly, fleshly, though it run but in the channel of one way of gross sinning! As a man may be covetous that hath but one trade; and a whoremonger that hath but one whore; and an idolator that hath but one idol. If thou lovedst God better, thou wouldst let go thy sin; and if thou love any one sin better than God, the whole bent of thy heart and life is wicked: for it is not set upon God and heaven, and therefore is ungodly.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Is a proof that the Sun of Righteousness is not yet risen upon us.

(4511.) So long as you see one star in the sky the sun is not risen; so long as one leak admits the water the ship is not safe; so long as one sin reigns in a man's heart, and is practised in his life, Jesus is neither his Saviour nor his King.

—Guthrie.

5. Is sufficient to ruin the soul.

(4512.) There was but one crack in the lantern, and the wind has found it out and blown out the candle. How great a mischief one unguarded point of character may cause us. One spark blew up the magazine and shook the whole country for miles around. One leak sank the vessel and drowned all on board. One wound may kill the body; one sin destroy the soul.

—Spurgeon.

IX. LITTLE SINS.

1. Lead to greater.

(4513.) It is Satan's custom by small sins to draw us to greater, as the little sticks set the great ones on fire, and a wisp of straw enkindles a block of wood.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(4514.) A spark is the beginning of a flame; and a small disease may bring a greater.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4515.) Sin encroacheth by degrees upon the soul; if it can get but one of its claws into us, it will quickly follow with its head and whole body—"A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump." Unfaithfulness to God is first discovered in the smallest matters, then it proceeds to greater things. As the decay of a tree is first visible in its twigs, but by degrees it goeth on the bigger arms, and from them to the main body.

As it is the nature of a cancer or gangrene to run from one joint or part of the body to another, from the toe to the foot, from the foot to the leg, from the leg to the thigh, and thence to the vital parts. Do we not sometimes see a whole arm impostsu-mated with the prick of a little finger; and have we not sometimes heard of a great city betrayed by the opening of a little postern? These little sins will grow to great ones if let alone. Time will turn small dust into stone. The poisonous cockatrice at first was but an egg. Small twigs will prove thorny bushes if not timely stubbed up.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4516.) These little sins, if they be so, will make way for greater. Little wedges open the way in the most knotty wood for bigger. As thieves, when they go to rob a house, if they cannot force open the doors, or break through the walls, let in a little boy at the window, who unbolts and unlocks the door, and so lets in the whole rabble; thus the devil, when men startle at greater sins, and by them he hath no hopes to get possession of their souls, he puts them upon those sins which they think little, and by these insensibly enters; for they, once admitted, open the doors of the eyes, of the ears, and of the heart too, whereby the whole legion enter, and rule and domineer in their souls to their ruin. Men do not, indeed they cannot, imagine the woful consequences of neglecting their watch against the least sin. How many who have been so modest and maidenly at first, that they would not so much as give a lascivious person the hearing when he hath spoken wantonly; yet by giving way to their own foolish thoughts, have at last prostituted themselves to their pleasure without any shame. Sinners increase to more ungodliness; when they once venture down hill, they know not where nor when to stop. Workmen bore holes with little wimbles, which make way for the driving of great nails.

When Pompey, saith Plutarch, could not prevail with a city to billet his army, he yet persuaded them to take in a few weak, maimed soldiers; but those soon recovered strength, and let in the whole army, to command and govern the city. Thus Satan, by sins of infirmity, prevails at length for sins of presumption. Great storms arise out of little gusts; and clouds no bigger than the palm of a man's hand come in time to cover the whole heavens. The greatest river is fed with drops, and the biggest mountain made up of atoms. As Sylla said, when in his proscription time, that he slew so many, one pleaded for the life of Cæsar, In uno Cæsare multi Marii: "In one little youth, many old subtle men," so in one little sin, there may be many great ones. When one evil spirit hath got lodging in the heart, he prepares it, and makes room for seven more wicked and worse than himself.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4517.) No one becomes vicious all at once. The way of a transgressor is like that of a stone down hill, which, when it is once set going, moves at every revolution with accelerated speed. He begins with little sins, and these lead on to greater ones; from acts he proceeds to habits; from habits to inveterate custom; from custom to glorying in his wickedness. Vice first is pleasing, then it grows easy, then delightful, then frequent, then habitual, then confirmed; then the man is impenitent, then he is obstinate, then he resolves never to repent, and then he is damned.

—John Angell James.

(4518.) Infidelity to the conscience in small things is intimately connected with a like dereliction in large ones. Little lies are seeds of great ones. Little cruelties are germs of great ones. Little treacheries are, like small holes in raiment, the beginnings of large ones. Little dishonesties are like the drops that work through the banks of the levee; a drop is an engineer; it tunnels a way for its fellows, and they, rushing, prepare for all behind them. A worm in a ship's plank proves, in time, worse than a cannon ball.

—Becker.

2. Are most numerous.

(4519.) Despise not venial sins because they are small, but rather fear them because they are many.

—Augustine, 353-429.

(4520.) The little transgressions in which men indulge, though they have no power upon the settled course of human affairs, even if they are swept out into a current of public sentiment that carries them down, as leaves are carried by the Amazon, are not harmless nor indifferent, because, aside from the influence of minor delinquencies upon the sum of affairs outwardly, there is another history and record, namely, their influence upon the actor. I repeat that they deteriorate conscience. You can by a blow crush and destroy the conscience, or you can nibble and gnaw it to pieces. There is one way in which a lion strikes down his prey, and there is another way in which a rat comes at his prey, and in time the gnawing of vermin is as fatal to beauty and life itself as the stroke of the lion's paw. These little infidelities to duty, truth, rectitude, lower the moral tone, limit its range, destroy its sensibility; in short, they put out its light. It is recorded of a lighthouse erected on a tropical shore, that it was like to have failed for the most unlooked-for reason. When first kindled, the brilliant light drew about it such clouds of insects, which populate the evening and night of equatorial lands, that they covered and fairly darkened the glass. There was a noble light that shone out into the darkness and vanquished night, that all the winds could not disturb, nor all the clouds and storms hide; but the soft wings and gauzy bodies of myriads of insects, each one of which was insignificant, effectually veiled the light, and came near defeating the proposed gift to mariners. And so it is in respect to conscience. There may be a power in it to resist great assault, to overcome strong temptations, and to avoid fearful dangers; but there may be a million little venomous insect habits, unimportant in themselves, taken individually, and fearful in their results collectively.

—Becker.

3. Are most dangerous.

(4521.) These of all others I observe the most dangerous, both for their frequency and secrecy: the one increasing them to a large heap, the other so covering them as we see not how they wrong us. The rain that falls in smallest drops moistens the earth, makes it miry, slimy, and dirty; whereas a hard shower, that descends violently, washes away but soaks not in.

—Falltham, 1668.

(4522.) There is a tendency to fear great sins, and a tendency to be indifferent to little ones. Now, there are certain great sins that, being committed, may give such a moral shock to a man's constitution as to be fatal in their effects; but these are not usually fallen into. Men are not very much in danger of great sins. They are ten thousand times more in danger of little ones. Men are not in danger of committing perjury half as much as they are of telling "white lies," as they are called. Men are not so much in danger of counterfeiting as they are of putting on little minute false appearances. Men are not so much in danger of committing burglary as they are of committing the myriad infinitesimal injustices with which life is filled. Any particular act, to be sure, such as I have alluded to, which of itself is simply as a particle of dust, is not so culpable as a great sin; but what is the effect on the constitution of a series of these offences that are so small as to be almost imperceptible? It is these little sins, continued and multiplied, that by friction take off the enamel of a man's conscience. It is these numberless petty wrongs that men do not fear, persisted in, that are the most damaging. I should dread the incursion into my garden, in the night time, of rooting swine, or trampling ox, or browsing buffalo; but, after all, aphides are worse than these big brutes. I could kill any one, or half a dozen, or a score of them, if they came in such limited numbers; but when they swarm by the billion I cannot kill one in ten thousand of them—and what can I do? Myriads of these insignificant little insects will eat faster than I can work, and they are the pest and danger of the garden, as often my poor asters and roses testify. There is many and many a flower that I would work hard to save, but the fecundity of insect life will quite match and overmatch any man's industry. Weakness multiplied is stronger than strength.

Now, that which does the mischief is these aphides, these myriad infinitesimal worms, these pestiferous little sins, every one of which is called white, and is a mere nothing, a small point—a mote, a speck of dust. Why, many a caravan has been overtaken, smothered, and destroyed by clouds of dust, the separate particles of which were so minute as to be almost invisible.

Many men are afraid that they will be left to some great sin—and they ought to fear that; but they have not the slightest fear of that which is a great deal more likely to bring them to condemnation—the series of petty violations of conscience, and truth, and duty, with which human experience is filled.

—Becher.

(4523.) Men, in their property, are afraid of conflagrations and lightning strokes; but if they were building a wharf in Panama, a million madrepores, so small that only the microscope could detect them, would begin to bore the piles down under the water. There would be neither noise nor foam; but in a little while, if a child did but touch the post, over it would fall as if a saw had cut it through.

Now, men think, with regard to their conduct, that, if they were to lift themselves up gigantically and commit some crashing sin, they should never be able to hold up their heads; but they will harbour in their souls little sins, which are piercing and eating them away to inevitable ruin.

—Becher.

(4524.) There are sins which, like asps, always carry their sting with them. The instant one meddles with them, he is struck by the poisoned dart. Such sins are generally rare and admitted to be very wrong. But there are others that are far more dangerous. Men in tropical climates may be very much afraid of tigers; but there are multitudes of minute insects flying in the woods whose bite is death. Shall they be less afraid of these?

Great crimes ruin comparatively few. It is the little meannesses, selfishnesses, and impurities, that do the work of death on most men; and these things march not to the sound of life or drum. They steal with muffled tread, as the foe steals on the sleeping sentinel.

—Becher.

(4525.) The worst sin is not some outburst of gross transgression, forming an exception to the ordinary tenor of a life, bad and dismal as such a sin is; but the worst and most fatal are the small continuous vices which root underground and honeycomb the soul. Many a man who thinks himself a Christian is in more danger from the daily commission, for example, of small pieces of sharp practice in his business, than ever was David at his worst. White ants pick a carcass clean sooner than a lion will.

—MacLaren.

4. Destroy.

(4526.) Let no man think lightly of evil, saying in his heart, "It will not come near unto me. Even by the falling of water-drops a water-pot is filled; and the fool becomes full of evil, even if he gathers it little by little.

—Buddha.

(4527.) You have escaped the formidable rocks; beware lest you are wrecked on the sands.

—Gregory Nazianzen.

(4528.) As a man may die as well by a fly choking him as by a lion devouring him; or as a ship may be sunk as well by too much weight of mustard-seed as of great stones and lumps of lead: so, likewise, little sins will sink a man to hell as soon as great sins.

—Candray, 1609.

(4529.) A little rope suffices to hang a great thief: a little dross abases much gold; a little poison infects much wholesome liquor; a little heresy corrupts much sound doctrine; a little fly is enough to spoil all the alabaster box of ointment; so the smallest sin, the least peccadillo, without God's mercy, is sufficient to damn our souls to all eternity.

—Philip Bosquierus.

(4530.) The least sin is damnable. The smallest bit of sin is a murdering morsel. "Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them." To eat a little leaven seems a small thing, yet it is a cutting off from Israel (Exod. xii. 19). Gathering a few sticks on a Sabbath, looking into the ark, nay, touching the ark, are all punished with death. It is observable how God urgeth the command to abstain from blood, which seems a small matter, with this argument, as they desire God to do any good for them or theirs (Deut. xii. 23-25) and upon pain of death. Friend, a little thing, a prick of a thorn festering, the kernel of a raisin, a small bone in thy throat, may deprive thee of thy natural life; and these little sins, as thou callest them, may hinder thee of eternal life. A small leak in a ship unstopped may sink it. A drachm of poison diffuseth itself to all parts, till it seize and strangle the vital spirits. A penknife will stab mortally, and kill a man as surely as a sword. A pistol will kill as dead as a cannon. Caesar was slain, as some report, with bodkins. There are other diseases mortal beside the plague. Some have been eaten up by bears and lions, others by mice and lice. It is spiritual murder to stifle and suppress the conceptions of the Spirit in thy soul, as well as to do open despite to the Holy Ghost.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4531.) Little sins unrepented of will damn thee as well as greater. Not only great rivers fall into the sea, but little brooks; not only greater sins carry men to hell, but lesser; therefore do not think pardon easy because sin is small.

—Watson, 1696.

(4532.) If you have no great transgressions in your life, don't be too sure you are safe. The flakes of snow drop on the Alps one by one, so light there is no weight to them as they touch your finger; they come on, till after awhile the traveller's foot strikes the slide, and down comes the avalanche. So the sins of youth keep packing up till they become a mountain of sin, and after awhile start the indignation of the Lord Almighty.

—Talmage.

5. Lead to hell.

(4533.) There are two ways of coming down from the top of a church-steeple: one is to jump down, and the other is to come down by the steps; but both will lead you to the bottom. So also there are two ways of going to hell: one is to walk into it with your eyes open—few people do that—the other is to go down by the steps of little sins.

X. CUSTOM IN SINNING.

1. Increasingly strengthens all sinful habits and dispositions.

(4534.) As mariners setting sail first lose sight of the shore, then of the houses, then of the steeples, and then of mountains and land; and as those that are waylaid by a consumption first lose vigour, then stomach, and then colour: thus it is that sin hath its woful gradations. None declines to the worst at first. Lust, having conceived, brings forth sin, and so proceeds to finishing—as thus: sin hath its conception, that is delight; and its formation, that is design; and its birth, that is the acting; and custom is the education of the brat; then follows a reprobate sense, and the next step is hell to all eternity.

—Spencer, 1658.

(4535.) Every commission of sin introduces into the soul a certain degree of hardness, and an aptness to continue in that sin. It is a known maxim that it is much more difficult to throw out than to let in. Every degree of entrance is a degree of possession. Sin taken into the soul is like a liquor poured into a vessel; so much of it as it fills, it also seasons. The touch and tincture go together. So that, although the body of the liquor should be poured out again, yet still it leaves that tang behind it, which makes the vessel fitter for that than for any other. In like manner, every act of sin strangely transforms and works over the soul to its own likeness. Sin in this being to the soul like fire to combustible matter; it assimilates before it destroys it.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4536.) Every commission of sin imprints upon the soul further disposition and proneness to sin;

as the second, third, and fourth degrees of heat are more easily introduced than the first. Every one is both a preparative and a step to the next. Drinking both quenches the present thirst, and provokes it for the future. When the soul is beaten from its first station, and the mounds and outworks of virtue are once broken down, it becomes quite another thing from what it was before. In one single eating of the forbidden fruit, when the act is over, yet the relish remains, and the remembrance of the first is an easy allurement to the second. One visit is enough to begin an acquaintance, and this point is gained by it, that when the visitant comes again, he is no more a stranger.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4537.) When a sin is let in as a suppliant, it remains in as a tyrant. The Arabs have a fable of a miller who one day was startled by a camel's nose thrust in the window of the room where he was sleeping. "It is very cold outside," said the camel, "I only want to get my nose in." The nose was let in, then the neck, and finally the whole body. Presently the miller began to be extremely inconvenienced at the ungainly companion he had obtained in a room certainly not big enough for both. "If you are inconvenienced you may leave," said the camel; "as for myself, I shall stay where I am." There are many such camels knocking at the human heart. Take, for instance, compliance with a single worldly custom—dancing. First, the custom creeps humbly to the door of the heart, and says, "Let me in; what am I but putting one foot before another? certainly you do not object to music, and I would not for the world have a full band." So in comes the nose of the camel, and it is not long before the entire body follows. The Christian then finds his heart occupied in full figure by the very vice which a little while before peeped in so meekly. "Being up," it says to him, "all night at a ball, with the eyes dazzled by lights, and the ears stunned with a full band, interferences, you say, with your private devotions. So it does. But your private devotions will have to go, for I will not."

—Episcopal Recorder.

2. Sears the conscience.

(4538.) The deceptions of sin tend to harden the mind, by gradually, and almost imperceptibly influencing it till it becomes quite accustomed to sin. The force of habit is astonishing. Surgeons and medical men, who are naturally humane and tender, by being accustomed to dissections, wounds, and amputation, necessarily lose in a great measure the sensibility of their minds to these things. On the same principle, soldiers after engaging in two or three battles, witness those things with little emotion. And so if you yield to the imposing insinuations of sin, and give way by a little and little, again and again, you will be so accustomed to them, that the cheat will seem to you a reality; all that sin says you will believe to be true; and by and by you will indulge freely, and without remorse, in that at which you once felt shocked; and thus going on, you will become more and more hardened till you are beguiled into the commission of sin, of which, if it were proposed to you now, you would exclaim, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"

—Salter.

3. Renders men insensible to saving influences.

(4539.) When men have long taken a custom of sinning, they grow hardened and senseless, as the highway doth by being often trod upon, or as a labourer's hand grows hard by constant labour. And so sin becometh familiar to them, and they become "past feeling," and are "given up to work uncleanness with greediness."

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4540.) The chief danger of the poison called nightshade is its tendency to deprive the stomach of sensibility, and so to render the most powerful antidotes of no avail. Exactly like this is the effect of long-continued evil habits. Those who are governed by them lose all moral sensibility. Nothing will work upon them. They are "past feeling." Seeing, they see and do not perceive, and hearing, they hear and do not understand. The conscience becomes as it were "scared with a hot iron." In that state, applications which before would have made it start and tremble, fail to move it.

—R. A. Bertram.

XL. PRESUMPTUOUS SINS.

1. Destroy assurance.

(4541.) O take heed of deliberate sins! like a stone thrown into a clear stream, they will so royle thy soul, and muddy it, that thou, who even now couldst see thy interest in the promise, wilt be at a loss, and not know what to think of thyself. They are like a fire on the top of the house, it will be no easy matter to quench it. But if thou hast been so unhappy, as to fall into such a slough, take heed of lying in it by impenitency; the sheep may fall into a ditch, but it is the swine that wallows in it, and therefore, how hard wilt thou find it (thinkst thou) to act thy faith on the promise, when thou art by thy filthy garments, and besmeared countenance, so unlike one of God's holy ones? It is dangerous to drink poison, but far more, to let it lie in the body long. Thou canst not act thy faith (though a believer) on the promise, so as to apply the pardon it presents to thy soul, till thou hast renewed thy repentance.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Destroy the moral sense.

(4542.) As sins of presumption are more difficultly cured, so they waste the conscience infinitely more than any other sins. As really as blows and wounds and bruises weaken the body, and by degrees dispose it to its final dissolution, so certainly do some sins shake and batter, and tear down the constitution of the soul. Guilt upon the conscience, like rust upon iron, both defiles and consumes it, by degrees gnawing and creeping into it, as that does, till at length it has eaten out the very substance of the metal. The inward as well as the outward man has his proper health, strength, and soundness naturally belonging to him; and, in proportion, has also his diseases and distempers, arising from an irregular course of living. And every act of presumption is to him as a spiritual debauch or surfeit, things that bring a present disorder, and entail a future decay upon nature.

David was a sufficient example of this.

—South, 1633-1716.

3. Tend to increase.

(4543.) This kind of sin is marvellously apt to grow and prevail upon him that gives way to it. "Keep," says David, "Thy servant from presumptuous sins, lest they get the dominion over me."

Every presumption is properly an encroachment, and all encroachment carries in it still a farther and a farther invasion upon the persons encroached upon. It enters into the soul as a gangrene does into the body, which spreads as well as infects, and, with a running progress, carries a venom and a contagion over all the members. Presumption never stops in its first attempt. If Caesar comes once to pass Rubicon, he will be sure to march farther on, even till he enters the very bowels of Rome, and break open the capitol itself. He that wades so far as to wet and foul himself, cares not how much he trashes farther.

When the tenderness of the soul is lost, and its first awe of God and religion broke by a bold sin, it grows venturous, and ready to throw itself upon all sorts of outrages and enormities. It does not demur and tremble as it used to do, when anything gross and foul was proposed to it; but it closes with it readily, and steps undauntedly into that stream that is like to carry away and swallow it up for ever.

This growing, encroaching mischief perhaps first fastens but upon the thoughts, and they take the liberty to settle upon some unlawful base thing, like flies upon a carcase; from these it advances a step farther, and seizes the desires, which presently are carried out with a restless eagerness after the same vile object: and these at length meet with some friendly opportunity, by the help of which they break forth into actual commission; which actual commission grows from one into many, and comes to be frequent and repeated, till it settles into a custom and fixes itself immovably and for ever in a man's behaviour.

This is the nature and quality of presumption; much like what our Saviour says of the mustard seed, which at first is the least of all seeds, but being grown up is greater than all herbs, so that the birds of the air lodge in the branches of it. In like manner presumption first shows itself in a thought, the least of all sins for the matter of it; but from thence shooting up into a custom and a habitual practice, it grows mighty and wide, opens its arms, and spreads out its branches for every unclean bird, every sinful action and abomination, to come and lodge and rest upon.

No man can assign the limits, the ne plus ultra, of presumption, where it will stay, and with what pitch of villainy it will be contented; it is as unruly as power, as boundless as rebellion; and therefore, he that would preserve his conscience, and the peace of it, has cause to keep a perpetual guard upon his heart, to save it from a first admission.

—South, 1633-1716.

4. Greatly provoke God to anger.

(4544.) As it is with a friend, if you give him a blow peradventure, or strike him by chance, though he may be very angry at the first, yet, when he shall understand that it was done against your will, he is soon pacified; but if he perceive that you plot and contrive his death, that makes him look about him, and resolve that he will never come into your company any more. Thus it is with the blessed Spirit of God: when He sees thee fall into sin unadvisedly and inconsiderately, He will not withdraw from thee for this; but if He perceive that thou dost deliberate and contrive sin, this highly provokes Him, if not for ever, yet for a long departure from thee. Hence it is that a deliberate will to sin without the act, is more sinful than the act of sin without a deliberate will ; as in the case of St. Peter, that man does worse who purposeth to deny Christ, though he never do it, than St. Peter who did actually deny Christ, and never intended it. Let every man, therefore, look to his purposes and deliberations ; for if he sin deliberately and advisedly, the Holy Ghost is highly provoked, and he is upon the very next step to the sin of those against whom the prophet prays, "Lord, be not merciful to those that sin maliciously!"

—Spencer, 1658.

8. Call for profound repentance.

(4545.) Let no man think presumptuous sins will be removed with mean and ordinary humiliations ; the remedy must be proportioned, both for strength and quantity, ingredients and dose, to the quality and malignity of the distemper, or it will never do the cure. As stains of a deep dye will not come out of the cloth with such ordinary washings as will fetch out lighter spots, so to cleanse the heart defiled with these deeper pollutions, these crimson and scarlet sins, and to restore it pure white as snow or wool, a more solemn and lasting course is requisite than for lesser transgressions. It will ask more sighs, more tears, more indignation, more revenge ; a stronger infusion of all those sovereign ingredients presented by St. Paul (2 Cor. vii.), before there can be a comfortable hope that it is pardoned. The will of man is a sour and stubborn piece of clay, that will not frame to any serviceable use without much working. A soft and tender heart indeed is soon rent in pieces, like a silken garment if it do but catch upon any little nail ; but a heart hardened with a long custom of sinning, especially if it be with one of these presumptuous sins, is like the knotty root end of an old oak that has lain long a-drying in the sun. It must be a hard wedge that will enter, and it must be handled with some skill too to make it do that ; and when the wedge is entered, it will endure many a hard knock before it will yield to the cleaver, and fall in sunder. And indeed it is a blessed thing, and to be acknowledged a gracious evidence of God's unspeakable mercy to those that have wilfully suffered such an unclean spirit to enter in and to take possession of their souls, if they shall ever be enabled to out him again, though with never so much fasting and prayer.
—Sanderson, 1587-1662.

XII. SECRET SINS.

(4546.) Take heed of secret sins. They will undo thee if loved and maintained ; one moth may spoil the garment ; one leak drown the ship ; a penknife stab and kill a man as well as a sword ; so one sin may damn the soul ; nay, there is more danger of a secret sin causing the miscarrying of the soul than open profaneness, because not so obvious to the reproofs of the world ; therefore take heed that secret sinnings eat not out good beginnings.
—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(4547.) Go down into your hearts and take the keys of them and ransack your private cupboards, and narrowly observe what junkets your souls have hitherto lived upon, and gone behind the door and there secretly and stoutly made a meal of them. As dogs have bones they hide and secretly steal forth to gnaw upon, so men have sins they hide under their tongues as sweet bits.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(4548.) I have heard that a shepherd once stood and watched an eagle soar out from a cliff. The bird flew far up into the air, and presently became unsteady and reeled in its flight. Then one wing dropped and the other ; presently, with accelerated speed, the poor bird fell rapidly to the ground. The shepherd was curious to know the secret of its fall. He went and picked it up. He saw that where the eagle lighted last on a cliff, a little serpent had fastened itself upon him ; and as the serpent gnawed in farther and farther, the eagle in its agony reeled in the air. When the serpent touched the heart the eagle fell. Have you never seen a man or woman in the church, in society, rising and rising ; the man becoming more and more influential, strong apparently, widely known, asserting power far and near ; but by and by, growing unsteady, uncertain, reeling, as it were, in uncertainty, inconsistency, and at last fall to the earth, and lay there in hopeless disgrace, a spectacle for angels to weep over, and scoffers and devils to jeer at ? You do not know the secret of the fall. But the omniscient eye of God saw it. That neglect of prayer, that secret dishonesty in business, that stealthy connivance with the intoxicating cup, that licentiousness and profligacy unseen of men, that secret tampering with unbelief and error, was the serpent at the heart that brought the eagle down. —Cuyler.

(4549.) I once heard of two men who, in a state of intoxication, set out in the night to cross a frith in an open boat. They rowed, and rowed, and rowed, till the gray light of dawn began to open upon them, when to their astonishment they found that they had not moved a yard. Would you know the reason ? In the stupidity of their intemperance they had neglected to lift the anchor before they began ! Now, so it is with many, and their endeavours after the Christian life. They hear ministers gladly, and the more earnest the sermon is, they are the more delighted ; they converse with Christians about their souls, and are considered to be in a hopeful state, but, somehow, they never move out of their position. Why ? Because, deep down their hearts are anchored to some hidden thing, and they did not lift the anchor when they began. There is a righteousness of their own, which they will not part with even for the spotless robe which Jesus would bestow upon them. There is a sum of money, of which they do not choose that Christ should have the disposal. There is a secret chamber in their souls, of which they are determined that Christ shall not have the key. There is a darling lust which they are resolved yet to gratify, and so they still hang back and are only almost persuaded after all.
—W. M. Taylor.

XIII. BESETTING SINS.

(4550.) Every evil man has lusts of his own, which he is as resolute to maintain as a father to keep his own children. It is easy for men to dislike lusts not their own, to condemn another man's sins ; but our own lusts are dear unto us.

Many being reproved, answer, Alas ! you must bear with me in this ; it is my fault ; as if every man were allowed his own fault. There is a private Sodom within us ; we are loth to part with that.

Men say of their sins as Jacob said of his sons, "Go, all but Benjamin." Other vices we will not so much stick for, but, "Oh, that Ishmael might live!" There is still some worm in the root of the tree that will spoil the fruit. We extenuate it: is it not a little one? But a little hair in the pen makes a great blot in the paper.

—Adams, 1654.

(4551.) We have every one of us besetting sins. I use the plural, for they are sometimes, alas! not one, but many; sins, that is, which more easily get advantage over us than others, to which we have a mournful proclivity, an especial predisposition; it may be through natural temperament, it may be through faults in our education, it may be through the circumstances in which we are placed, it may be through having given way to them in times past, and thus broken down on their side more than on any other the moral defences of our soul; the soul in this resembling paper, which, where it has been blotted once, however careful the erasure of the blot may have been, there more easily blots and runs anew than elsewhere. It is, then, a point of obvious prudence to strengthen the defences of the city of the soul there, where they are felt and known to be weakest—where that is, every one who has kept any close record of the sad secrets of his own spiritual life, will in his own case abundantly know—to watch and pray against all sin, but, above all, with especial emphasis and earnestness, against the sin which most easily besets us.

—Trench.

XIV. ORIGINAL SIN.

1. Is an indisputable fact.

(4552.) Original or birth sin is not merely a doctrine in religion, it is a fact in man's world acknowledged by all, whether religious or not. Let a man be providing for an unborn child; in case of distribution of worldly property, he will take care to bind him by conditions and covenants which shall guard against his fraudulently helping himself to that which he is to hold for or to apportion to another. He never saw that child; he does not know but that child may be the most pure and perfect of men; but he knows it will not be safe to put temptation in his way, because he knows he will be born in sin, and liable to sin, and sure to commit sin.

—Alford, 1810-1871.

(4553.) As it is absolutely impossible for a man to believe, when the dice are thrown sixes successively a thousand times, that the dice are not loaded; so is it a thousand times more impossible to believe, when every human being of all nations and generations, without a single exception, begins to sin the instant he enters moral agency, that his will is not biased by a previous effectual tendency in his nature to sin.

—Hodge.

2. Is implied in the mission and teaching of Christ.

(4554.) Many inquirers find it difficult to believe themselves innately bad, simply because they have been told that such a belief is required of them. No man taught the doctrine of original sin, commonly so called, so impressively as Jesus Christ, and yet He never mentioned it. His whole scheme was founded upon the assumption that men were wrong. Every call to a new point, every frown upon sin, every encouragement of well-doing, meant that society needed regeneration. Men may come upon the doctrine of original depravity in one of two different ways; for example, they may come upon it as a dogma in theology. The first thing that some theologians do is to abuse human nature, to describe it as being covered with wounds and bruises and putrefying sores, and as deserving nothing but eternal burning. Human nature resists this as a slander: it says, "No; I have good impulses, upward desires, generous emotions towards my fellow-creatures; I resent your theological calumnies." So much for the first method of approaching the doctrine. The second is totally unlike it. A man, for example, heartily accepts Jesus Christ, studies Him with most passionate devotion, and grows daily more like Him in all purity, gentleness, and self-oblivion. From this attitude he looks back upon his former self; he compares the human nature with which he started with the human nature he has attained, and involuntarily, by the sheer necessity of the contrast, he says, "I was born in sin and shapen in iniquity." This conclusion he comes to, not by dogmatic teaching, but by dogmatic experience; what he never could have understood as an opinion he realises as a fact.

Suppose a tree to be conscious, and let it illustrate what is meant by growing into a right understanding of this hard doctrine. Tell the tree in April that it is bare and ungainly in appearance; very barren and naked altogether. The tree says, "Nay; I am rooted in the earth; my branches are strong; I live in the light; I drink the dew; and I am beautiful; the winds rock me, and many a bird twitters on my boughs." This is its April creed. Go to the same tree after it has had a summer's experience: it has felt the quickening penetration of the solar fire, quenched its thirst in summer showers, felt the sap circulating through its veins; the leaves have come out on branch and twig, the blossoms have blushed and bloomed through long days of light; fruit has been formed, and mellowed into maturity. Now hear the tree! "I am not what I was in April; my very identity seems to be changed; when men called me bare and rugged I did not believe them a few months ago; now I see what they meant—their verdict was sound: I thought the April light very beautiful, but it is nothing to the blazing splendour of the later months; I liked the twitter of the spring birds, but it is poor compared with the song of those that came in June. I feel as if I had been born again." The parable is broad enough to cover this bewildering, and at times horrifying, doctrine of hereditary depravity. Men cannot be in April what they will be in September. Each year says to growing hearts, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." In old age men may accept the rejected doctrines of their youth. Experience brings us round many a rugged hill, and gives us better views of condemned, because misunderstood, opinions.

—Parker.

3. Cleaves to us till death.

(4555.) There is no getting rid of the corrupt nature of man until death prostrates it in the dust. It is like the Jewish leprosy in the walls of the tainted house, which could never be eradicated until the whole building was taken down. But its nature undergoes a material change through the operation of grace upon it. Just as the virulent properties of an acid are neutralised by the mixture of alkali, the substance is not destroyed, or removed, but the character is changed—so the whole leaven of corruption, when acted on by grace, is altered in its pernicious effects, and assumes a new character, although it is not taken away.

4. Necessitates continual watchfulness.

(4556.) Let original sin make us walk with continual jealousy and watchfulness over our hearts. The sin of our nature is like a sleeping lion, the least thing that awakens it makes it rage. The sin of our nature, though it seems quiet, and lies as fire hid under the embers, yet if it be a little stirred and blown up by a temptation, how quickly may it flame forth into scandalous evils? therefore we had need always to walk watchfully. "I say to you all, watch" (Mark xiii. 37). A wandering heart needs a watchful eye. —Watson, 1696.

5. It deserveth God's wrath and damnation.

["Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk), but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit; and therefore in every person born into this world it deserveth God's wrath and damnation."—Articles of Church of England, No. ix.]

(4557.) As we do not cease to hate a young wolf although that he hath not yet worried any sheep, or a young serpent, notwithstanding that it hath not yet cast forth its venom, but do judge them worthy of death because of the perverse nature that is in them: so ought we to esteem that God hath no less occasion to condemn us, even from our mother's womb, because of our perversity and natural malice engendered within us. And though the Lord should damn us eternally, He should do us no wrong, but only that which our nature deserveth; for although the young infant hath not yet done any work which we may judge to be evil, since he hath not yet the understanding or the power to do it, yet it followeth not therefore but that the perversity which is natural in man hath already its root in him as one part of his paternal inheritance, the which cannot please God; for although it bringeth not forth its fruits, yet they do remain still there, as in their root, which will bring them forth in its time—as the venom is already in a serpent, although he bite not, and the nature of a wolf in a young wolf, how harmless soever he seemeth to be. —Cawdrey, 1609.

6. Yet it does not exclude children from covenant mercies.

(4558.) "But how can God be the God of our children, when they are born in corruption, children of wrath? Can they be the children of wrath and the children of God both at one time?"

I answer, Yes: both at one time. For even as in civil matters, in our city here, a man may be a freeman of the city and yet be born lame or leprous, or with some contagious disease—this hinders not his freedom—so the children of a believing father and mother may be freemen of the city of God, and in the covenant of grace, and yet be tainted with original sin, that overspreads the powers of the soul notwithstanding. —Sibbes, 1577-1635.

XV. SINS OF OMISSION.

(4559.) Suppose sins of omission were little, yet it is folly and madness upon this to allow of them. A mote in the eye is a little thing, it hindereth our sight of the sun, and is big enough to put us to great pain, and to disturb our whole body. The flies and lice of Egypt were little creatures, but great plagues. The sting of a bee is a little thing, but it puts us to grievous torment. He who refused to give a few crumbs, was denied one drop (Luke xvi. 21). A fly spoils an alabaster box of ointment; a little poison spoils much wholesome liquor.

If they were little, yet they are sins, and that enough to set a good man against them. It is as much treason to coin a penny, as a twenty shillings piece; because the royal authority is as much violated in the one as in the other. There is the same rotundity in a little ball or bullet, as in a great one. The authority of God is as truly despised in the breach of the least commandments, as some are called, as in the breach of the greatest, as others are called (Matt. xxii. 36-38). A sprig of wormwood hath the same bitterness with the plant. A drop of sea-water hath the same saltiness with the ocean. The smallest sin is a breach of the royal law as well as the greatest (1 John iii. 4). Though the object may be different, yet the command is still the same; and the wise man tells us that the law must be kept as the apple of the eye, which is offended by the smallest dust (Prov. vii. 2). —Swinnock, 1673.

(4560.) All omissions of duty will more and more unfit the soul for duty. A key thrown by, gathers rust; a pump not used will be hardly got to go; and armour not used will be hardly made bright, &c. Look, as sinful commissions will strangle the soul; so sinful omissions will starve the soul. —Brooks, 1608-1680.

(4561.) Few of our errors, national or individual, come from the design to be unjust—most of them from sloth, or incapacity to grapple with the difficulties of being just. Sins of commission may not, perhaps, shock the retrospect of conscience. Large and obtrusive to view, we have confessed, mourned, repented, possibly atoned them. Sins of omission, so veiled amidst our hourly emotions—blent, confused, unseen, in the conventional routine of existence—Alas! could these suddenly emerge from their shadow, group together in serried mass and accusing order—alas, alas! would not the best of us then start in dismay, and would not the proudest humble himself at the throne of mercy! —Lord Lytton.

XVI. SINS OF THE PAST.

(4562.) I must confess I am shocked with some people whom I know, who glibly rehearse their past lives up to the time of their supposed conversion, and talk of their sins, which they hope have been forgiven them, with a sort of smack of the lips, as if there was something fine in having been so atrocious an offender. I hate to hear a man speak of his experience in sin as a Greenwich pensioner might talk of Trafalgar and the Nile. The best thing to do with our past sin, if it be indeed forgiven, is to bury it; yes, and let us bury it as they used to bury suicides, let us drive a stake through it, in horror and contempt, and never set up a monument to its memory. If you ever do tell anybody about your youthful wrongdoing, let it be with blushes and tears, with shame and confusion of face; and always speak of it to the honour of the infinite mercy which forgave you. Never let the devil stand behind you and pat you on the back and say, "You did me a good turn in those days." Oh, it is a shameful thing to have sinned, a degrading thing to have lived in sin, and it is not to be wrapped up into a telling story and told out as an exploit as some do. "The old man is crucified with him," who boasts of being related to the crucified felon. If any member of your family had been hanged, you would tremble to hear any one mention the gallows; you would not run about crying, "Do you know a brother of mine was hanged at Newgate?" Your old man of sin is hanged, do not talk about him, but thank God it is so; and as He blots out the remembrance of it, do you the same, except so far as it may make you humble and grateful. —Spurgeon.

XVII. SIN IN BELIEVERS.

1. Is especially conspicuous.

(4563.) If the sun be eclipsed one day, it attracts more attention than by its clear shining a whole year. —Secker.

2. Is exceeding sinful.

(4564.) A sin acted in the temple was greater than if the same had been by a Jew committed in his private dwelling, because the temple was a consecrated place. The saint is a consecrated person, and by acts of unrighteousness he profanes God's temple; the sin of another is theft, because he robs God of the glory due to Him; but the sin of a saint is sacrilege, because he robs God of that which is devoted to Him in an especial manner. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

3. Is specially injurious to others.

(4565.) If a man could be wicked and a villain to himself alone, the mischief would be so much the more tolerable. But the case is much otherwise. The plague flies abroad, and attacks the innocent neighbourhood.

The guilt of the crime lights upon one, but the example of it sways a multitude; especially if the criminal be of any note, or eminence in the world. For the fall of such an one by any temptation (be it never so plausible) is like that of a principal stone, or stately pillar, tumbling from a lofty edifice into the deep mire of the street: it does not only plunge and sink into the black dirt itself, but also dashes and bespatters all that are about or near it when it falls.

Was it not thus with Samson? who, of a judge of Israel, and a terror to his enemies, a man all made up of miracle, rendered himself both the shame of the former and the contempt of the latter; a scoff and a byword to all the nations round about him (as every vicious and voluptuous prince must needs be); and all this by surrendering up his strength, his reason, and his royal trust to the charms of a brutish temptation, which quickly transformed and made him a more stupendous miracle of folly and weakness than ever he had been of strength; and a greater disgrace to his country than ever he had been a defence; or in a word, from a judge of Israel, a woful judgment upon it.

And was it not thus also with David? This was the worst and most killing consequence of the temptation which he fell by (2 Sam. xii. 14), that he had, by that enormous act, "given the enemies of God," as the prophet told him, "great occasion to blaspheme." And no doubt the religion he professed, as well as the sin he had committed, was thereupon made "the song of the drunkards;" and many a biting jeer was obliquely cast at one, as well as directly levelled at the other. For to be vicious in the sight of a man's enemies, and those not more the enemies of himself than of his religion, what a bitter aggravation is it on his guilt, and what an indelible reproach to his person!

—South, 1633-1716.

4. Brings dishonour on the Gospel.

(4566.) The sins of the godly are worse than others, because they bring a greater reproach upon religion. For the wicked to sin, there is no other expected from them; swine will wallow in the mire; but when sheep do so, when the godly sin, that redounds to the dishonour of the gospel: "By this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme." A stain in scarlet, every one's eye is upon it: for the godly to sin, it is like a spot in scarlet, it is more taken notice of, and it reflects a greater dishonour upon the ways of God. When the sun is eclipsed, every one stands and looks upon it; so, when a child of light is eclipsed by scandalous sin, all stand and gaze at this eclipse. —Watson, 1696.

(4567.) An eminent professor is the concern of a whole profession: as to nonplus an Aristotle would look, not only like a slur to a particular philosopher, but like a baffle to philosophy itself.

The devil will let a man build and practise high, that he may at length fetch him down with the greater shame, and so make even a Christian an argument against Christianity.

The subduing of any soul is a conquest, but of such an one a triumph. A signal professor cannot perish without a train, and in his very destruction his example is authentic. —South, 1633-1716.

5. Dishonours God.

(4568.) God is worthy of honour: "Blessed be Thy glorious name, which is exalted above all blessings and praise." He is above all the acclamations and triumphs of the archangels. Oh then, let every true child of God honour his Heavenly Father! Though the wicked dishonour Him by their flagitious lives, yet let not His own children dishonour Him. Sins in you are worse than in others; a fault in a stranger is not so much taken notice of as a fault in a child: a spot in black cloth is not so much observed; but a spot in scarlet, every one's eye is upon it; a sin in the wicked is not so much wondered at, it is a spot in black; but a sin in a child of God, here is a spot in scarlet; this is more visible, and brings an odium and dishonour upon the gospel. The sins of God's own children go nearer to His heart: "When the Lord saw it He abhorred them, because of the provoking of His sons and daughters." Can forbear doing anything that may reflect dishonour upon God. Will you disgrace your Heavenly Father? Let not God complain of the provocations of His sons and daughters; let Him not cry out, "I have brought up children, and they have rebelled against Me."

—Watson, 1696.

6. Dishonours Christ.

(4569.) It is recorded of Alexander the Great, that a soldier was reported to him as having betrayed great cowardice on a particular occasion, on which Alexander called him to him and asked his name. On hearing that his name was Alexander, he upbraided him with the dishonour that he brought on such a name, and entreated him either to change his manners or to change his name, asking him how he could dare, while known as Alexander, to act unworthily? And shall not the Christian remember the high and holy name by which he is called, and dread encountering the guilt and meanness of dishonouring his Head, who was "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners." That name, in its very signification, tells him that he is related to the anointed One, and that (as the name implies) all his members, in their measure and degree, are anointed ones. How shall they who take this sacred unction upon them, dare to dishonour this name, and so sin against Christ.
—Salter.

7. Is specially hateful in the sight of God.

(4570.) God never hates sin so much as when He sees it in His people. Let those who have made some advance in the divine life especially note this, for it is in gardens that weeds are odious; we do not blame them when we find them in fields and ditches; and the better kept is the garden, the more unsightly are any weeds that are left there.
—R. A. Bertram.

8. A man may sin and yet be a child of God.

(4571.) A traveller, in his journey, thinks of nothing so much as his journey's end: if he stumble by the way, that is against his will, and more than he intended; and if he chance to get a fall, or to go out of his way, he rests not till he be up, and in it again. So look but upon a hunter, he has no design to follow his way at all, whether in the way or out of the way, his mind is upon the game; an archer bends his bow, delivers his arrow, and though it fall short or over, on one side or other, his aim was at the mark. Thus it is with the children of God, their aim is at heaven, their thoughts upon Zion, their looks towards Jerusalem, and their faces thitherward; and if there be any aberrations or turning aside, it is no more they, but sin that dwelleth in them. It is not so with the ungodly, they have no such design for God's glory, the desire of their hearts is the satisfaction of their lusts and sinful pleasures, they aim at nothing else but sin, and so in the end reap the wretched fruit of their own wicked ways.
—Westfield, 1628.

(4572.) A good man is not infallible; a good man may err, may fall; but there is life in that man, there is a principle in that man; fainting is not dying. The bough may be borne down by the violence of the flood, but when the pressure has rolled off, it will regain its erectness, and point towards heaven.
—Salter.

(4573.) A man rescued from drowning, under suspended animation, presents no appearance but that of a dead man, but the spark of life is not extinct, and with proper remedies he will be restored, and perform the offices of life. So a strong man, overcome by a violent distemper, has his strength prostrated to the ground, and is as weak as a little child. But the principle of manhood is still within him, and once restored he will again put forth the mightiness of his strength. In like manner a believer is sometimes beat down to the ground with the force of some mighty sin. His conscience, meanwhile, is like that of a man in a swoon; like David, who, after the matter of Uriah, lived on for a time with a stupid conscience. But, as in the royal offender, there is a principle of recovery in him. He needs the arrow of conviction, "thou art the man," to pierce his soul, and he shall straightway be healed.
—Salter.

9. Is but momentary.

(4574.) A truly gracious man, like a thorough good watch, may deviate and point wrong for a season, but, like the machine just mentioned, will, after a short time, with a single touch, come round, and point right as before.

10. Afterwards makes them more watchful.

(4575.) The remembrance of those sorrows and fears, the anxieties and indignation against himself that sin caused in a true penitent, will make him jealous for the future of his heart, and circumspect against all temptations that may betray him (2 Cor. vii. 11). As one that has narrowly escaped consuming by fire, retains the idea of his danger so deeply impressed on his mind that upon any new occasion his ancient fears revive and wake him very watchful.
—Bates, 1625-1699.

11. The fact that God overrules the sins of His people for good should not render us less watchful against sin.

(4576.) Whether true evangelical humility, and an enlarged view of the grace of God in Christ, triumphing over all obstacles, be ordinarily attainable without an experience of declensions, backslidings, and repeated forgiveness, is the last question I shall consider. I dare say you will do me the justice to believe that I would not advise any one to run into sin in order to get a knowledge of his own heart. David broke his bones thereby; he obtained an affecting proof of his inability of standing in his own strength, and of the skill and goodness of his Physician who healed him; yet no man in his wits would break his bones for the sake of making experiments, if he were ever so sure they would be well set again.
—Newton, 1725-1807.

12. Should inspire the ungodly with apprehension.

(4577.) Is it not evident that other men's sins should move you to be the more religious and careful of yourselves, and not the less? If you see them stumble, you should look the better to your feet, and not cast yourselves headlong from the rock that you should be built upon. You should think with yourselves, if such men are so faulty for all the pains they take, how much more pains must I take to escape such faults? If they that run so hard shall many of them miss of the prize by coming short, it is a mad conceit of you to think to win it by sitting still, or doing less than they that lost it.
—Baxter 1615-1691.

XVIII. SHOULD BE INSTANTLY AND UTTERLY FORSAKEN.

1. Because sin in all its forms is the ruin of the soul.

(4578.) As there is bitterness in every sprig of wormwood, and saltness in every drop of sea-water, so there is death and hell, and wrath and damnation, in every sin. —Swinnock, 1673.

(4579.) Use sin as it will use you; spare it not, for it will not spare you: it is your murderer, and the murderer of the world: use it, therefore, as a murderer should be used. Kill it before it kills you; and though it kill your bodies, it shall not be able to kill your souls; and though it bring you to the grave, as it did your Head, it shall not be able to keep you there. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4580.) Our Lord pronounced the children of this world "wise in their generation;" and who can doubt that thousands who are lost would, with God's blessing, be saved, did they bring the same prudence, and diligence, and energy to their eternal, as they do to their temporal interests? But in how many people is consummate wisdom joined to the greatest folly? They are wise enough to gain the world, and fools enough to lose their souls.

Convince a man that the only way to save his life is to part with his limb, and he does not hesitate an instant between living with one limb and being buried with two. Borne into the operating theatre, pale, yet resolute, he bares the diseased member to the knife. And how well does that bleeding, fainting, groaning sufferer teach us to part with our sins rather than with our Saviour. If life is better than a limb, how much better is heaven than a sin?

Two years ago a man was called to decide between preserving his life, and parting with the gains of his lifetime. A gold-digger, he stood on the deck of a ship that, coming from Australian shores, had—as some all but reach heaven—all but reached her harbour in safety. The exiles had been coasting along their native shores: and to-morrow, husbands would embrace their wives, children their parents, and not a few realise the bright dream of returning to pass the evening of their days in happiness amid the loved scenes of their youth. But as the proverb runs, there is much between the cup and the lip. Night came lowering down: and with the night a storm that wrecked ship, and hopes, and fortunes, all together. The dawning light but revealed a scene of horror—death staring them in the face. The sea, lashed into fury, ran mountains high; no boat could live in her. One chance still remained. Pale women, weeping children, feeble and timid men must die; but a stout, brave swimmer, with trust in God, and disencumbered of all impediments, might reach the shore, where hundreds stood ready to dash into the boiling surf, and, seizing, save him. One man was observed to go below. He bound around his waist a heavy belt, filled with gold, the hard gains of his life; and returned to the deck. One after another, he saw his fellow-passengers leap overboard. After a brief but terrible struggle, head after head went down—sunk by the gold they had fought hard to gain, and were loth to lose. Slowly he was seen to unbuckle his belt. His hopes had been bound up in it. It was to buy him land, and ease, and respect—the reward of long years of hard and weary exile. What hardships he had endured for it! The sweat of his brow, the hopes of day and the dreams of night, were there. If he parts with it, he is a beggar; but then if he keeps it, he dies. He poised it in his hand; balanced it for a while; took a long, sad look at it: and then with one strong, desperate effort, flung it far out into the roaring sea. Wise man! It sinks with a sullen plunge; and now he follows it—not to sink, but, disencumbered of its weight, to swim; to beat the billows manfully; and, riding on the foaming surge, to reach the shore. Well done, brave gold-digger! Ay, well done, and well chosen; but if "a man," as the devil said, who for once spoke God's truth, "will give all that he hath for his life," how much more should he give all he hath for his soul? Better to part with gold than with God; to bear the heaviest cross than miss a heavenly crown! —Guthrie.

(4581.) A great warrior was once persuaded by his enemies to put on a beautiful robe, which they presented him. Not suspecting their design, he wrapped himself tightly in it, but in a few moments found that it was coated on the inside with a deadly poison. It stuck to his flesh as if it had been glued. The poison entered into his flesh, so that, in trying to throw off the cloak, he was left torn and bleeding. But did he for that reason hesitate about taking it off? Did he stop to think whether it was painful or not? Did he say, "Let me wait and think about it awhile"? No, he had more sense than that. He tore it off at once, and threw it from him, and hastened away from it to the physician. Sinner, this is the way you must treat your sins if you would be saved. They have gone into your soul. If you let them alone you perish. You must not fear the pain of repentance. You should cast them from you as poison, and hasten away by faith to Jesus Christ, the only Physician who can cure you, by His own blood applied to your hearts. Do this, or your sins will consume you like fire.

—Meads.

2. Because one sin leads to another.

(4582.) Sins are like circles formed in the water when a stone is thrown into it; one produces another. When anger was in Cain's breast, murder was not far off.

—Eliza Cook.

3. Because even one sin is enough to enslave and destroy the soul.

(4583.) If seven thieves shall enter a man's house, and, six of them being overcome, the seventh lie lurking in some secret corner, the master of that house cannot but sleep in danger; and a bird falling into a snare, or a mouse being taken in a trap, if the one be but held by the claw, or the other by the end of the tail, they are both in as much danger as if their whole bodies were surprised. Thus it is that all sin, and the least sin, must be repented of. Pharaoh, being smitten with many plagues, is willing at last to let the people go, so as they would leave their sheep and their cattle behind them. "No," says Moses, "that cannot be; all the flocks and herds shall go along with us, not a hoof shall be left." And Satan, like Pharaoh, would keep something of sin in us, which may be as a pledge of our returning to him again; though sin be taken away, yet he would have the occasions of sin to remain. "Leave gaming," says he, "but let not the cards and dice be burnt; thou mayest cease to be a fornicator, but do not pull out thy wanton eye; thou must not hate thine enemy, yet what necessity is there that thou shouldst love him?" This is the voice of Satan. But God bespeaks the sinner after another manner: He will have all sin to be repented of; not so much as the occasion of sin shall remain; which, if it do, Satan will make a re-entry, and then the end shall be worse than the beginning.

—Stapleton.

(4584.) As an eagle, though she enjoy her wings and beak, is wholly prisoner if she be held but by one talon; so are we, though we could be delivered of all habit of sin, in bondage still, if vanity hold us but by a silken thread.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

(4585.) Observe, before pardon can be sealed, he must forsake not this sin, or that, but the whole law of sin. "Let the wicked forsake his way." A traveller may step from one path to another, and still go on the same way, leave a dirty, deep, rugged path, for one more smooth and even; so many finding some gross sins uneasy, and too toilsome to their awakened consciences, step into a more cleanly path of civility; but alas! poor creatures, all they get is to go a little more easily and cleanly to hell, than their beastly neighbours; but he forsakes the way of sin, that turns out of the whole road; in a word, thou must forsake the blindest path of all in sin's way, that which lies behind the hedge, as I may so say, in the thoughts of the heart, "and the unrighteous his thoughts;" or else thou knockest in vain at God's door for pardoning mercy, and therefore, poor soul, forsake all or none. This halving with sin is ridiculous. Art thou afraid of this sin, and not of a less, which hinders thy peace, and procures thy damnation as sure, only not with so much distraction to thy drowsy conscience at present? This is as ridiculous, as it was with him, who being to be hanged, desired that he might by no means go through such a street to the gallows, for fear of the plague that was there. What wilt thou get poor sinner, if thou goest to hell, though thou goest thither by thy ignorance, unbelief, spiritual pride, &c., yet led about so, as to escape the plague of open profaneness?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4586.) While I was walking in the garden one bright morning, a breeze came through and set all the flowers and leaves a fluttering. Now, that is the way flowers talk, so I pricked up my ears and listened.

Presently an old elder tree said, "Flowers, shake off your caterpillars!"

"Why?" said a dozen all together.

The elder said, "If you don't, they'll eat you up alive."

So the flowers set themselves a shaking till the caterpillars were shaken off.

In one of the middle beds there was a beautiful rose, who shook off all but one, and she said to herself, "Oh, that's a beauty! I'll keep that one."

The elder overheard her, and called out, "One caterpillar is enough to spoil you."

"But," said the rose, "look at his brown and crimson fur, and his beautiful black eyes, and scores of little feet; I want to keep him; surely one won't hurt me."

A few mornings after, I passed the rose again;

there was not a whole leaf on her; her beauty was gone; she was all but killed, and had only life enough to weep over her folly, while the tears stood like dew-drops on her tattered leaves. "Alas! I didn't think one caterpillar would ruin me."

—C. A. Davis.

4. Because our next transgression may bring down on us the vengeance we have long deserved.

(4587.) We commonly say, it is not the last blow of the axe that fells the oak: perhaps the last may be a weaker blow than any of the former, but the other blows made way for the felling of it, and at length a little blow comes and completes it. So our former sins may be the things that make way for our ruin, and then at length some lesser sins may accomplish it.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(4588.) Didst thou know that God remembers the sins of thy youth, and thy maturer age, thou wouldst fear that, on the next sin thou committest, God might bring upon thee all thy previous transgressions. As a man that has used his body to drink poison for a time may do well, but at last he is overcome and destroys himself; so the next sin which thou committest, though it be less than former transgressions, it may set all the rest on working; as, suppose there be many barrels of gunpowder in a room, and a few grains lie scattered about, and a spark falls into that, and so fires all the rest; so thy former sins are as the barrels of gunpowder, the next sin thou committest, especially if a sin against knowledge, may be the grains which set all the rest on work to pull down judgment upon thee.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

5. Because sin was the cause of Christ's death.

(4589.) Suppose a man should come to a table and there is a knife laid at his trencher, and it should be told him, "This is the knife that cut the throat of your child, or your father;" if he could now use that knife as any other knife would not one say, "Surely there was but little love either to the father or to the child!" So, when there is a temptation to any sin, this is the knife that cut the throat of Christ, that pierced His sides, that was the cause of His sufferings, that made Christ to be a curse. Now, wilt thou not look on that as a cursed thing that made Christ to be a curse? Oh, with what detestation would a man or woman fling away such a knife! and with the like detestation it is required that a man should renounce sin; for that, and that only, was the cause of the death of Christ.

—Alphonsus ab Avendano.

(4590.) Shall we continue in sin (Rom. vi. 1) after we know what it cost Christ to expiate our sins? God forbid! When Mark Antony addressed the citizens of Rome, to animate them to revenge the death of Cæsar, he enlarged upon Cæsar's character, his great actions, his love to the Roman people, and the evidence he had given of it in the donations and bequests he had appointed them by his will, the particulars of which he specified. When he had thus engaged their admiration and gratitude, and they discovered emotions of regret and sensibility that Cæsar, the greatest character in Rome, who had fought and triumphed for them, and had remembered them in his will, should be slain, Antony threw aside a cloth, and showed them his dead body covered with wounds and blood.

This sight rendered it needless to say more. The whole assembly united as one man, to search out, and to destroy his murderers. The application is obvious.—May our hearts, from this hour, be filled with a determined, invariable resentment against sin, the procuring cause of the humiliation and death of our best friend and benefactor.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

6. Because God hates it.

(4591.) As it is with two children, the one forbears to touch a coal, because it will black and smut his hand; the other will not by any means be brought to handle it, because he perceives it to be a fire-coal, and will burn his fingers: thus, all ungodly men, they will not touch sin because it will burn; they may be, and often are, troubled for sin, but their disquietness for sin ariseth more from the evil of punishment, the effect of sin, than from the evil that is in the nature of sin; they are troubled for sin, but it is because sin doth destroy the soul, and not because sin doth defile the soul; because God pursueth sin, and not because He hates sin; more, because it is against God's justice that is provoked, than because it is against the holiness of God which is dishonoured; because God threatens sin, not because God doth forbid sin; because of the hell for sin, not because of the hell in sin. But now, on the other side, all good and godly men, they hate and loathe sin, because it is of a smutting and defiling nature, because it is against the nature of God, because God loathes and hates it, more because it is against God's command than because God doth punish it; not because of the damning power of sin, but because of the defiling power of sin, &c.

—Inchinus.

7. Because sin in all its forms and degrees is hateful.

(4592.) If sin be evil, and displease God, and deserve damnation, he that most fully and carefully avoideth it, is the honestest and the wisest man. You will not blame your child or servant for being loath to offend and disobey you even in the smallest matter. You like not him that offereth you the least abuse, so well as him that offereth you none. You had rather be well than have the least disease. You will not take a little poison, nor would you feel a little of hell. Why then should we not avoid the least sin so far as we are able?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4593.) There may be a forsaking of a particular sin that has been delightful and predominant without sincerity towards God, for another lust may have got possession of the heart, and take the throne. There is an alternate succession of appetites in the corrupt nature, according to the change of men's temper or interests in the world. As seeds sown in that order in a garden, that 'tis always full of a succession of fruits and herbs in season; so original sin that is sown in our nature is productive of diverse lusts, some in the spring, others in the summer of our age, some in the autumn, others in the winter. Sensual lusts flourish in youth, but when mature age has cooled these desires, worldly lusts succeed; in old age there is no relish for sensuality, but covetousness reigns imperiously. Now he that expels one sin and entertains another continues in a state of sin; 'tis but exchanging one familiar for another; or, to borrow the prophet's expression, "Tis as one should fly from a lion, and meet with a bear that will as certainly devour him." —Salter.

(4594.) Thou dost not hate sin if thou only hatest some one sin. All iniquity will be distasteful in thy sight if God the Holy Spirit has really made thee to loathe iniquity. If I say to a person, "I will not receive you into my house when you come dressed in such a coat;" but if I open the door to him when he has on another suit which is more respectable, it is evident that my objection was not to the person, but to his clothes. If a man will not cheat when the transaction is open to the world, but will do so in a more secret way, or in a kind of adulteration which is winked at in the trade, the man does not hate cheating, he only hates that kind of it which is sure to be found out; he likes the thing itself very well. Some sinners, they say they hate sin. Not at all; sin in its essence is pleasing enough; it is only a glaring shape of it which they dislike.

—Spurgeon.

(4595.) If we would realise the full force of the term "hatred of evil," as it ought to exist in all, as it would exist in a perfectly righteous man, we shall do well to consider how sensitive we are to natural evil in its every form—to pain, and suffering, and misfortune. How delicately is the physical frame of man constructed, and how keenly is the slightest derangement in any part of it felt! A little mote in the eye, hardly discernible by the eye of another, the swelling of a small gland, the deposit of a small grain of sand, what agonies may these slight causes inflict! That fine filament of nerves of feeling spread like a wonderful network of gossamer over the whole surface of the body, how exquisitely susceptible is it! A trifling burn, or scald, or incision, how does it cause the member affected to be drawn back suddenly, and the patient to cry out! Now there can be no question that if man were in a perfectly moral state, moral evil would affect his mind as sensibly and in as lively a manner—would, in short, be as much of an affliction to him as pain is to his physical frame. He would shrink and snatch himself away, as sin came near to his consciousness; the first entrance of it into his imagination would wound and arouse his moral sensibilities, and make him positively unhappy.

—Gouldburn.

8. Because the consequences of sin are so far reaching.

(4596.) Sages of old contended that no sin was ever committed whose consequences rested on the head of the sinner alone; that no man could do ill and his fellows not suffer. They illustrated it thus:—"A vessel sailing from Joppa, carried a passenger, who, beneath his berth, cut a hole through the ship's side. When the men of the watch expostulated with him, "What doest thou, O miserable man?" the offender calmly replied, "What matters it to you? The hole I have made lies under my own berth."

This ancient parable is worthy of the utmost consideration. No man perishes alone in his iniquity; no man can guess the full consequences of his transgression.

—Spurgeon.

9. It must be renounced in the heart as well as in the outward life.

(4597.) Observable is the story of Phaltiel: David had married Michal, Saul injuriously gave her to another. When David came to the crown and was able to speak a word of command, he sends for his wife Michal; her husband dares not but obey, brings her on her journey, and then, not without great reluctance of spirit, takes his leave of her. But what? Was Phaltiel weary of his wife, that he now forsakes her? No, he was enforced; and though she were gone, he cast many a sad thought after her, and never leaves looking till he sees her as far as Bahurim, weeping and bemoaning her absence. Thus, carnal and unregenerate men, though, for fear or some other reasons, they shake hands with their sins, yet they have many a longing heart after them: they part, and yet they are loth to part asunder.

Hence it is, that as the merchant throws away his goods in a storm because he cannot keep them, so they, in the times of sickness and distress, when the sea grows high and the tempest rageth, when they begin to apprehend what death is and what hell is, and know, unless the vessel be lighted, they cannot be safe, then they are hard at work, heave overboard their usury, their drunkenness, their swearing, and such like stuff, not out of hatred to them, but love to themselves; for if they could but continue in their sins and be saved when they have done, they would never part with them at all.

—Stiles, 1627.

(4598.) Clip the hairs short, yet they will grow again, because the roots are in the skull. A tree that is but pruned, shred, topped, or lopped, will sprout again: root it up, and it shall grow no more. What is it to clip the outward appearances, and to lop the superfluous boughs of our sins, when the root is cherished in the heart? —Adams, 1654.

(4599.) Men may forbear sin that do not hate it: they forbear it by constraint, for fear of punishment, shame, worldly ends, but regard it in their hearts. The dog has a mind to the pail, but fears the cudgel. But God judges not as man judges.

—Manton, 1620-1677.

(4600.) All the Israelites departed in reality out of the land of Egypt, but they did not depart in affection; wherefore, in the wilderness, many of them repined that they had not the onions and flesh-pots of Egypt. So there are penitents, who in effect forsake sin, but not in affection; that is, they purpose to sin no more, but it is with a certain reluctance of heart to abstain from the mischievous delight of sin. Their heart renounces sin and avoids it, but ceases not often to look back that way, as Lot's wife did towards Sodom. They abstain from sin, as sick men do from melons, which they forbear, because the physician threatens them with death if they eat them; but it is troublesome to them to refrain; they talk of them and are unwilling to believe them hurtful; they would at least smell them, and account those happy who may eat them.

—Francis de Sales.

(4601.) To forsake sin, is to leave it without any thought reserved of returning to it again. Every time a man takes a journey from home about business, we do not say he hath forsaken his house, because he meant when he went out to come to it again. No, but when we see a man leave his house, carry all his stuff away with him, lock up his doors, and take up his abode in another, never to dwell there more; here's a man hath indeed forsaken his house. It were strange to find a drunkard so constant in the exercise of that sin, but some times you may find him sober: and yet a drunkard he is, as well as if he were then drunk. Every one hath not forsaken his trade that we see now and then in their holy-day suit; then the man forsakes his sin, when he throws it from him and bolts the door upon it with a purpose never to open more to it, "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4602.) I once walked into a garden with a lady to gather some flowers. There was one large bush whose branches were bending under the weight of the most beautiful roses. We both gazed upon it with admiration. There was one flower on it which seemed to shine above all the rest in beauty. This lady pressed forward into the thick bush, and reached far over to pluck it. As she did this, a black snake, which was hid in the bush, wrapped itself round her arm. She was alarmed beyond all description; and ran from the garden, screaming, and almost in convulsions. During all that day she suffered very much with fear; her whole body trembled, and it was a long time before she could be quieted. That lady is still alive. Such is her hatred now of the whole serpent race, that she has never since been able to look at a snake, even though it were dead. No one could ever persuade her to venture again into a cluster of bushes, even to pluck a beautiful rose. Now this is the way the sinner acts who truly repents of his sins. He thinks of sin as the serpent that once coiled itself round him. He hates it. He dreads it. He flies from it. He fears the places where it inhabits. He does not willingly go into the haunts. He will no more play with sin than this lady would afterwards have fondled snakes. —Meade.

XIX. ITS PUNISHMENT.

1. Is certain.

(4603.) No closer doth the shadow follow the body than the revenge of self-accusation follows sin. Walk eastward in the morning, the shadow starts behind thee: soon after it is upon thy left side; at noon it is under thy feet; lie down, it coucheth under thee; towards even it leaps before thee. Thou canst not be rid of it while thou hast a body and the sun light. No more can thy soul quit the conscience of evil. This is to thee instead of a hell of fiends, that shall ever be shaking firebrands at thee; ever torturing thee with affrights of more pains than thy nature can comprehend: Servus conturbata conscientia (Wisd. xvii. 11).

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4604.) As where punishment is there was sin; so where sin is there will be, there must be, punishment. "If thou doest ill," saith God to Cain, "sin lies at thy door" (Gen. iv. 7). Sin, that is, punishment for sin: they are so inseparable that the one word implies both; for the doing ill is the sin that is within doors; but the suffering ill is the punishment, and that lies like a fierce mastiff at the door, and is ready to fly in our throat when we look forth, and if it do not then seize upon us, yet it dogs us at the heels, and will be sure to fasten upon us at our greatest disadvantages: Tum gravior cum tarda venit, &c. Joseph's brethren had done heinously ill: what becomes of their sin? it makes no noise, but follows them slyly and silently in the wilderness; it follows them home to their father's house; it follows them into Egypt. All this while there is no news of it; but when it found them cooped up three days in Pharaoh's ward, now it bays at them, and flies in their faces. "We are verily guilty concerning our brother in that we saw the anguish of his soul," &c. (Gen. xlii. 21).

What should I instance in that, whereof not Scripture, not books, but the whole world is full—the inevitable sequences of sin and punishment? Neither can it be otherwise. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" saith Abraham. Right, is to give every one his due: wages is due to work; now "the wages of sin is death." So, then, it stands upon no less ground than very necessary and essential justice to God, that where wickedness hath led the way, there punishment must follow.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4605.) Fearful it is to consider that sin does not only drive us into calamity, but it makes us also impatient, and embitters our spirit in the sufferance: it cries aloud for vengeance, and so torments men before the time even with such fearful outcries, and horrid alarms, that their hell begins before the fire is kindled. It hinders our prayers, and consequently makes us hopeless and helpless. It perpetually affrights the conscience, unless by its frequent stripes it brings a callousness and an insensible damnation upon it. It makes us to lose all that which Christ purchased for us,—all the blessings of His providence, the comforts of His Spirit, the aids of His grace, the light of His countenance, the hopes of His glory.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(4606.) Terror and trouble are the shadow of sin, that follow it though the sun shine never so brightly. If we carry fire in our clothes, we shall smell it at the least.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4607.) If any sinner be free from outward afflictions and sufferings, yet sin never fails to carry its own punishment along with it; there is a secret sting and worm, a divine nemesis and revenge that is bred in the bowels of every sin, and makes it a heavy punishment to itself; the conscience of a sinner doth frequently torment him, and his guilt haunts and dogs him wherever he goes; for whenever a man commits a known and wilful sin, he drinks down poison, which, though it may work slowly, yet it will give him many a gripe, and if no means be used to expel it, will destroy him at last.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4608.) There is no sin but is attended and surrounded with so many miseries and adherent bitternesses, that it is at the best but like a single drop of honey in a sea of gall.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4609.) Crime and punishment grow out of one stem. Punishment is a fruit that, unsuspected, ripens within the flower of the pleasure that concealed it.

—Emerson.

(4610.) What a diabolical invention was the "Virgin's kiss," once used by the fathers of the Inquisition! The victim was pushed forward to kiss the image, when, lo, its arms enclosed him in a deadly embrace, piercing his body with a hundred hidden knives. The tempting pleasures of sin offer to the unwary just such a virgin's kiss. The sinful joys of the flesh lead, even in this world, to results most terrible, while in the world to come the daggers of remorse and despair will cut and wound beyond all remedy.

—Spurgeon.

2. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

(4611.) The labourer can hope to reap a harvest only of the same nature as the seed he has sown. Pleasures, human consolations, indulgences of sense, the satisfactions of our own wills, are the seeds of all those miseries, which attain the full expansion of their deadly fruits in hell. But, on the contrary, whilst the indulgence of an evil nature yields these unhappy fruits, a spiritual submission, for Christ's sake, to crosses, to humiliations, self-denials and contradictions, are those seeds which bear their full and blessed fruits of holiness and happiness in the world to come.

—M. de St. Marthe.

(4612.) The whole force of life and experience goes to prove that right or wrong doing, whether in relation to the physical or the spiritual nature, is sure, in the end, to meet its appropriate reward or punishment. Penalties are often so long delayed that men think they shall escape them; but some time they are certain to follow. When the whirlwind sweeps through the forest, at its first breath, or almost as if the fearful stillness that precedes had crushed it, the giant tree with all its boughs falls, crashing to the ground. But it had been preparing to fall for twenty years. Twenty years before it received a gash. Twenty years before the water commenced to settle in at some crotch, and from thence decay began to reach in with its silent fingers towards the heart of the tree. Every year the work of death progressed, till at length it stood, all rottenness, only clasped about by the bark with a semblance of life, and the first gale felled it to the ground. Now, there are men who for twenty years have shamed the day and wearied the night with their debaucheries, but who yet seem strong and vigorous, and exclaim, "You need not talk of penalties. Look at me! I have revelled in pleasure for twenty years, and I am as hale and hearty to-day as ever." But in reality they are full of weakness and decay. They have been preparing to fall for twenty years, and the first disease strikes them down in a moment.

Ascending from the physical nature of man to the mind and character, we find the same laws prevail. People sometimes say, "Dis-honesty is as good as honesty, for aught I see. There are such and such men who have pursued for years the most corrupt courses in their business, and yet they prosper, and are getting rich every day." Wait till you see their end. Every year how many such men are overtaken with sudden destruction, and swept for ever out of sight and remembrance? Many a man has gone on in sin, practising secret frauds and villanies, yet trusted and honoured, till at length, in some unsuspected hour, he is detected, and, denounced by the world, he falls from his high estate as if a cannon-ball had struck him—for there is no cannon that can strike more fatally than outraged public sentiment—and flies over the mountains, or across the sea, to escape the odium of his life. He believed that his evil course was building him up in fame and fortune; but financiering is the devil's forge, and his every act was a blow upon the anvil shaping the dagger that should one day strike home to his heart and make him a suicide. The pea contains the vine, and the flower, and the pod, in embryo, and I am sure, when I plant it, that it will produce them and nothing else. Now, every action of our lives is embryonic, and according as it is right or wrong it will surely bring forth the sweet flowers of joy or the poison fruits of sorrow. Such is the constitution of this world, and the Bible assures us that the next world only carries it forward. Here and hereafter "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." —Becker.

XX. CONVICTION OF SIN.

(4613.) If the man whose crimes have deprived him of the favour of God can reflect upon his conduct without disturbance, or can at will banish the reflection; if he who considers himself as suspended over the abyss of eternal perdition only by the thread of life, which must soon part by its own weakness, and which the wing of every minute may divide, can cast his eyes round him without shuddering with horror, or panting for security; what can he judge of himself but that he is not yet awakened to sufficient conviction, since every loss is more lamented than the loss of the Divine favour, and every danger more dreaded than the danger of final condemnation? —Dr. S. Johnson, 1709-1784.

(4614.) In the early part of the reign of Louis XVI., a German prince, travelling through France, visited the arsenal at Toulon, where the galleys were kept. The commandant, as a compliment to his rank, said he was welcome to set free any one galley-slave whom he should choose to select.

The prince, willing to make the best use of the privilege, spoke to many of them in succession, inquiring why they were condemned to the galleys. Injustice, oppression, false accusations, were assigned by one after another as the causes of their being there. In fact, they were all injured and ill-treated persons.

At last he came to one, who, when asked the same question, answered to this effect: "Your highness, I have no reason to complain; I have been a very wicked, desperate wretch. I have deserved to be broken alive on the wheel. I account it a great mercy that I am here." The prince fixed his eyes upon him, and said: "You wicked wretch! It is a pity you should be placed among so many honest men. By your own confession, you are bad enough to corrupt them all; but you shall not stay with them another day." Then turning to the officer, he said: "This is the man, sir, whom I wish to be released."

Was not this a wise decision? Must not all who hear the story allow that the man who was sensible of his guilt, and so submissive to his punishment, was, in all probability, the most worthy of pardon, and the most likely not to abuse it?

Sense of sin is the first step toward forgiveness. There is hope of a man who confesses his guilt, and feels that punishment is his desert. And the deeper the conviction of sin, the more hopeful often is the condition.

SOUL THE

1. Its mysteriousness.

(4615.) The pit that is deepest, the pit that is most unexplored and most unfathomable, is that which is the wonder and glory of God's thought and hand,—our own soul. —Becker.

2. Invisible, yet real.

(4616.) I wonder whether these men believe that they breathe in summer as well as in winter. In summer they cannot see their own breath; but as cold grows on, it begins to appear. God's providence, and their own souls, are things of so subtle a nature that they cannot see them during the summer of their pleasures. But when the winter of judgment comes, this will show them a God in their just sufferings; and in that soul of theirs, which they would not believe they had, they shall feel an unspeakable torment. Then shall their pained sense supply the want of their faith. —Adams, 1654.

(4617.) The soul is formless, is shadowless. No eye beholds it; no hand handles it; no pencil may draw its lineaments. The mother that gave birth to her child; that overhung the cradle; that carried her babe imbosomed; that studied the girl's girlhood, youth, and womanhood, till the cloud of love opened and hid her in the wedded life—even the mother does not know the girl nor the woman. Nor does he that takes her know her, when she is taken; nor even she herself. Our life is hinted, but it is hidden. It gleams out at times; it flashes in sparks upon us. None has seen the full orb, or known the full measure of it. We stand before each other as volumes of books. The binding and lettering are plain enough; the contents are unknown, or but dimly suspected. We are like books in which some things are to be hidden from the common reader as unsafe, and at every few paragraphs the critical things are expressed in a dead language. So in human life, the simplest things are read; the interior things are not legible. —Becker.

(4618.) If by the existence of a spiritual being in man is meant the existence of an invisible principle which we call the soul, then I conceive that as to any difficulty in the conception of this, the matters we have just been considering will greatly aid us to get over it. Indeed, as to the manner in which they may do so, I have already adverted to it. We know, for example, not only that there is present a real power holding together the oxygen and the hydrogen, which in their combination constitute a grain of water, but we know that that real power is not in the slightest degree dependent for its existence on the material elements which it is holding in combination; for we know that in the act of decomposition it flies forth with enormous force. He, therefore, that is in the habit of such contemplations, is not only prepared to believe that an immaterial principle may be a real principle, but he is prepared also to believe, as a thing according to all analogy and previous experience, that it shall be independent for its existence of the material particles with which for the time it may be combined.

But this does not amount by any means to the evidence that there is in man a spiritual being. It amounts to the proof that physics, that material science, affords no presumption against it; the positive manifestation that it is there must arise from some other quarter. —A. J. Scott, 1866.

3. Its powers.

(4619.) The soul is variously denominated from its several powers and offices, as the sea from the several shores it washes. "As it quickens the body, it is called the life; as it exerts acts of the will, it is called the power of volition; as it is the subject of knowledge, it is called the mind; when it recollects, it is called the memory; as it produces breathing, it is called the spirit.

—Flavel, 1627-1691.

4. Is in most men incompletely developed.

(4620.) Going into a village at night, with the lights gleaming on each side of the street, in some houses they will be in the basement and nowhere else, and in others in the attic and nowhere else, and in others in some middle chamber; but in no house will every window gleam from top to bottom. So is it with men's faculties. Most of them are in darkness. One shines here, and another there; but there is no man whose soul is luminous throughout.

—Becher.

(4621.) Men are differently built. There are men who are broad and strong at the base, in the middle, and up until you reach the moral faculties. These are shrunken in, and almost vanished.

Such men are like lighthouses, built well at the bottom, and all the way up. All right, only they have no lantern and no light. And the two things, the man and the house, are equally valuable.

—Becher.

(4622.) It is a part of our physiological nature that, in order to the healthful development of our moral faculties, they must be placed highest, else they can no more flourish than could a plant growing under the shade and drip of trees. But most men make no provision for these faculties. Like a lighthouse, built well from foundation upwards, but without any place for the lantern, so many men build carefully their lower natures, but never rear the highest storey. As a musical instrument might have the bass and tenor very well tuned and concordant, while, if you ran your fingers over the higher notes all would be clash and jargon, so men say, "I must compose and harmonise myself to natural laws for the sake of health," and thus they tune the bass; and then they say, "I must have peace at home, and peace in my neighbourhood," and so they regulate their social affections; and there are lofty flights of reason, and imagination, and art, and poetry, and music, and thus they tune the tenor; but when they come to the highest notes, which were meant to be sweet to the ear of God, there is neither regularity nor concordance. All is void, vast, and mysterious in their moral nature.

—Becher.

5. Is developed by the cares of life.

(4623.) At the foot of any one of these beeches you would probably find a buried chrysalis. By and by the enclosed moth will break a little hole in the case, and struggle to get through the aperture. The process is difficult, and may occupy hours. If you were to watch it, you would pity the creature straining and tugging so painfully, and it might occur to you that a slight snip of a pair of scissors would enlarge the opening sufficiently to give the poor prisoner vent. If you did so, however, the moth would come out with small, unexpanded, useless wings. The struggle, which seems so hard, is necessary to force the vital fluid into the minute vessels (compared with which the capillaries of a man are immense), which ramify throughout the gauzy, scale-covered pinions of the moth. Is there no moral in the fact? Does it not hint to us that many of our frets and cares are not accidental nor useless, but meant to strengthen and vitalise the soul? I have often seen a person suffering the last sickness; at first irritable and impatient, but gradually growing more self-forgetful, more mindful of others, more trustful in God—and the parable of the moth has come to my mind, and I have said to myself, thus also the soul in its pangs of emancipation is being prepared for the higher life beyond.

6. Should be carefully guarded from injury.

(4624.) The blemishes of the soul are like the wounds of the body: however skillfully healed, the scar always remains, and they are at every moment in danger of breaking open again.

—La Rochefoucauld.

7. Is degraded and ruined by sin.

(4625.) As the sluggard does nothing more unwillingly than forsake his bed, nor bears anything with more regret than to be awakened out of his sweet sleep, though you should entice him with the pleasures of a paradise to quit a smoky loathsome cottage; so fares it with the sluggish soul, as if it were locked in an enchanted bed: it is so fast held by the charms of the body, all the glory of the other world is little enough to tempt it out: than which there is not a more deplorable symptom of this sluggish slumbering state. So deep an oblivion, which you know is also naturally incident to sleep, has seized it of its own country, of its alliances above, its relation to the Father and world of spirits,—it takes this earth for its home, where it is both in exile and captivity at once: and, as a prince, stolen away in his infancy, and bred up in a beggar's shed, so little seeks, that it declines, that better state.

—Howe, 1630-1705.

(4626.) Speak I to men who though their frames are bent and hardened by toil, were nevertheless created in God's image—who, though their hands are so busily engaged with this world, are possessed of undying souls? And need I tell them what a degradation it is, what an act of violence to their better nature, when that soul is uncared for, when its wonderful faculties are permitted to lie dormant, entombed in the body as in a living grave! Ah me! to think of such a soul being made to grind like a blinded Samson at the wheel of your sensual pleasures—when it has a wing scarcely inferior to the seraph's in strength, and might yet prove capable of a flight as high! To think of its being confined to the duties of the workshop, seldom rising above the question, What wages can I earn?—when the boundless universe is its proper field of discovery, and does not afford it too ample range! To think of its being made a drudge of the body, knowing no better employment than to pamper its lusts, when it could make the highest world its footstool, and while suns and systems roll in all their grandeur at its feet, could levy tribute from them all! The degradation of such a soul can neither be described nor imagined. In vain do we look around us to find, or exercise the imagination to conceive of, anything that will adequately illustrate its extent. I have thought of the eagle which, soaring above the range of human vision, gazes with unfaltering eye on the splendour of the noon-day sun, and basks in his golden beams; I have thought of the degradation of the noble bird when chained to a stone in the dungeon wall. I have thought: of an angel smitten with insanity, its noble intellect deranged, leaving the heaven where in its youth it soared and sang, to find employment in heaping together the dust of the earth. I have thought, too, of the king reduced to the condition of a beggar; and thus have I attempted to picture by comparison the most deplorable calamity—the waste, the destruction of a human soul. But I have tried in vain. Its degradation cannot be described by any illustration which the universe can furnish or the imagination create. Our lamentations indicate what we cannot measure or describe. "How are the mighty fallen! How has the gold become dim; and the most fine gold changed?" —Landels.

8. Its true portion. [See also 2376-2387.]

(4627.) The soul of man bears the image of God; so nothing can satisfy it but He whose image it bears. Our soul, says Augustine, was created as by God, so for God, and is therefore never quiet till it rest in God. As man fell at first into this restlessness by falling away from God, so he cannot be recovered of it but by returning to Him again. It is with man's soul in this regard as it was with Noah's dove in the deluge. As the dove after she left the ark found no rest for the sole of her foot in the wide world, being then all afloat, till she betook her again thither from whence she came forth; so neither can man, fallen from God, find any sure rest for the foot of his soul in the whole world beside, till he come back to Him again from whom it came at the first.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(4628.) As a cup of pleasant wine, offered to a condemned man in the way to his execution; as the feast of him (Damocles) who sat under a naked sword hanging perpendicularly over his head by a slender thread; as Adam's forbidden fruit, seconded by a flaming sword; as Belshazzar's dainties, overlooked by a handwriting against the wall; such are all the empty delights of the world—in their matter and expectation earthly; in their acquisition painful; in their fruition nauseous and cloying; in their duration dying and perishing; in their operation, hardening, effeminating, leavening, puffing up, estranging the heart from God; in their consequences seconded with anxiety, solicitude, fear, sorrow, despair, disappointment; in their measure shorter than that a man can stretch himself on, narrower than that a man can wrap himself in; every way defective and disproportionable to the vast and spacious capacity of the soul of man, as unable to fill that as the light of a candle to give day to the whole world. Nothing but emptiness attends them all, unless they be found in Christ Jesus.

—Spencer, 1658.

(4629.) The fulness of the earth can never satisfy the soul. All satisfaction and contentment arise from the conjunction of a convenient with a convenient; the conjunction of suitables. If a man have never so great an estate, if his heart be not suited to it, he hath no content. If a man have never so small an estate, if his heart be suited to it, he is content. What suitability is there between the fulness of the earth and the better part of man, the soul! A thing is never said to be full till it be full of that for which it is made: a chest or trunk is not said to be full of air, though it be full of air. So take one of these meeting-houses; though the place be full of stools, or full of air, yet we say the church is empty: because though it be full, yet it is not full of that for which it is made, full of people. So now, take a man that hath all the fulness of the earth: because that his soul was never made for the fulness of the earth, therefore he is said to be empty; in the midst of all his fulness, the man is an empty man, because his heart is not full of that for which he was made, and that is Christ.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4630.) God is the chiefest good; and other things are only good in subordination. All creature goodness is but a stricture of that perfect good which is in God, and therefore if we find any good in them, that should lead us to greater good even in the Creator. Who would leave the substance to follow the shadow? or desire the picture to dishonour and neglect the person whom it represents? Certainly they do that run after the creature and neglect God, that seek happiness in sublunary enjoyments, to the wrong and neglect of God. That small good which the creatures have, is not to hold us on them, but to lead us to Him, as the stream will direct us to the fountain; and the steps of the ladder are not to stand still upon, but to ascend higher. If your affections be detained in the creature, you set the creature in God's stead, you pervert it from its natural use, which is to set forth the invisible things of God, His excellency, His goodness, His Godhead, and His power to do you good; and to send you to Him that made them. But how usually does that which should carry us to God divert and detain us from Him? If a prince should woo a virgin by a messenger, and she should leave him and cleave to the messenger, and those he sent as spokesmen and servants, this were an extreme folly. By the beauty and sweetness of the creature, God's end is to draw us to Himself as the chiefest good; for that which we love in other things is but a shadow and an obscure resemblance of that which is in Him. There is sweetness in the creatures, mixed with imperfection; the sweetness is to draw us to God; but the imperfection is to drive us from setting our hearts on them. There is somewhat good in them, look up to the Creator; but there is vanity and vexation of spirit, this is to drive us off from these sublunary things.

—Manton, 1620-1677.

9. Its preciousness.

(4631.) The real value of an object is that which one who knows its worth will give for it. He who made the soul, knew its worth, and gave His life for it.

—Jackson, 1579-1640.

(4632.) The preparations God makes for souls in heaven, speak their great worth and value. When you lift up your eyes to heaven, and behold that spangled azure canopy beset and inlaid with so many golden studs and sparkling gems, you see but the floor or pavement of that place which God has prepared for some souls. He furnished this world for us before He put us into it; but, as delightful as it is, it is no more to be compared with the Father's house in Heaven, than the smallest ruined chapel your eyes ever beheld is to be compared with Solomon's temple, when it stood in all its glory.

When you see a stately and magnificent structure built, richest hangings and furniture prepared to adorn it, you conclude some great persons are to come thither : such preparations speak the quality of the guests.

Now heaven, yea, the heaven of heavens, the palace of the great King, the presence chamber of the Godhead, is prepared, not only by God's decree and Christ's death, but by His ascension thither in our names and as our Forerunner, for all renewed and redeemed souls. "In My Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so, I would have told you : I go to prepare a place for you !"

—Flavel, 1630-1694.

(4633.) Should I suggest in some companies, that the conversion of a hundred sinners (more or less) to God, is an event of more real importance than the temporal prosperity of the greatest nation upon earth, I should be charged with ignorance and arrogance ; but your lordship is skilled in scriptural arithmetic, which alone can teach us to estimate the value of souls, and will agree with me, that one soul is worth more than the whole world, on account of its redemption-price, its vast capacities, and its duration. Should we suppose a nation to consist of forty millions, the whole and each individual to enjoy as much good as this life can afford, without abatement, for a term of fifty years each ; all this good, or an equal quantity, might be exhausted by a single person in two thousand millions of years, which would be but a moment in comparison of the eternity which would still follow : and if this good were merely temporal good, the whole aggregate of it would be evil and misery, if compared with that happiness in God, of which only they who are made partakers of a divine life are capable. On the other hand, were a whole nation to be destroyed by such accumulated miseries as attended the siege of Jerusalem, the sum-total of these calamities would be but trifling, if set in competition with what every single person that dies in sin has to expect, when the sentence of everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and the glory of His power, shall be executed.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

10. Its salvation should be the first business of life.

(4634.) If you have crossed the Atlantic in a mail-steamer, you may have observed how ready the captain was to come into the cabin on a quiet evening, and to minister to the pleasure of his passengers. But if you were suddenly to hear the loud tramp of hurrying feet across the deck overhead, and the hoarse prattling of the first mate's trumpet to "haul in the jib," and "close-reef the top-sails," would you dare to invite the captain to a game of chess, or to listen to an operatic air? No! The sturdy seaman would reply, "In an hour the hurricane may send two hundred souls to the bottom, if everything isn't made fast. I can't play with you while the gale is playing with my ship."

My unconverted friend, when your soul is saved you may talk about the price of gold, or the ten per cent. that offers to you in some new speculation, or the latest discoveries in the gold regions. Until then, your real business must be to flee from the wrath to come, and to lay hold on eternal life. What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

—Cuyler.

11. Its loss.

(4635.) "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul ; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" And what is it to lose a soul? It is to let weeds grow there instead of flowers. It is to let selfishness grow, passions grow, suspicious, envious tempers grow, avarice grow, wantonness grow, until they have all the field to themselves. Set these in full force within a being, and add, if you will, a whole universe of possession, it is hell. You may think that these are only strong rhetorical words. It is just as simple literal fact as that two and two make four. I do not think that you will need to look far around you in the world for the proof of it.

—J. Baldwin Brown.

(4636.) Often, when travelling among the Alps, one sees a small black cross planted upon a rock, or on the brink of a torrent, or on the verge of the highway, to mark the spot where men have met with sudden death by accident. Solemn reminders these of our mortality ! but they led our mind still further ; for we said within us, if the places where men seal themselves for the second death could be thus manifestly indicated, what a scene would this world present ! Here the memorial of a soul undone by yielding to a foul temptation, there a conscience scared by the rejection of a final warning, and yonder a heart for ever turned into a stone by resisting the last tender appeal of love. Our places of worship would scarce hold the sorrowful monuments which might be erected over spots where spirits were for ever lost—spirits that date their ruin from sinning against the Gospel while under the sound of it.

—Spurgeon.

(4637.) "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" or, according to the still more impressive record of Christ's saying which we find in Luke's Gospel : "What is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world and lose himself, or be cast away?" One summer afternoon a steamer, crowded with passengers, many of them miners from California, was speeding along the Mississippi. Striking suddenly and strongly against the wreck of another vessel, that, unknown to her captain, lay near the surface of the water, her bow was stove in, and she began to fill rapidly. Her deck was a scene of wild confusion. Her boats were launched, but did not suffice to carry off one-fourth of the terrified passengers. The rest, divesting themselves of their garments, like St. Paul's companions in their famous shipwreck, cast themselves into the river, "Some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship : and so it came to pass that they escaped all safe to land." Some minutes after the last of them had quitted the vessel, another man appeared on her deck. Seizing a spar, he also leaped into the river, but, instead of floating as the others had done, he sank instantly as if he had been a stone. His body was afterwards recovered, and it was found that he had employed the quarter of an hour, in which his fellow-passengers had been striving to save their lives, in rifling the trunks of the miners. All around his waist their bags of gold were fastened. In one short quarter of an hour he had gained more gold than most men earn in their lifetime ; but was he advantaged thereby, seeing that he lost himself? And though you should gain power, or rank, or fame, or learning, or great wealth ; though your life should be one prolonged triumphal procession, all men applauding you ; though all your days you should drink unrestrained of the cup of the world's pleasures, and never reach its bitter dregs; yet what shall you be advantaged if, nevertheless, you lose yourself, and, at last, instead of being received into heaven, are cast away? —R. A. Bertram.

11. Its relations to the body.

(1.) Their diverse tendencies.

(4638.) Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, as he was passing on the way, espied a boy with a bird tied in a string to a stone, the bird was still taking wing to fly away, but the stone kept her down. The holy man made good use of this sight, and, bursting out into tears, said, "Even so it is betwixt the flesh and the spirit; the spirit is willing to mount upwards in heavenly thoughts and contemplation, but the flesh keepeth it down, and, if possible, would not admit of the least thought of heaven." —Spencer, 1658.

(4639.) As a fair and gentle wife, star-like and dove-like, is given to the guardianship of some rude, coarse, uncultured nature, who treads among her sweet feelings as the hoof and the snout deal with flowers in the garden, so it is in this strange husband and wife, the body and the soul, the soul full of sweetness and gentleness, and purity and delicacy, and the coarse animal body full of despotism, and swayings and conflicts of cruel passions; and they fare but ill in their wedded life on earth.

The body looks down, and searches the ground for its delights: the soul looks up, and, like an astronomer, culls treasures from among the stars, and beyond. The body eats and drinks: the soul thinks and feels. The body lives in the world, for the world, and with the world: the soul reaches far away to some higher life, whose need it feels—but all is vague, but the wish, but the need. Strange visions rise; but neither to-day does the soul know its origin, nor to-morrow. The picture of beauty and of purity that rose bright in the morning has faded out before night. To-morrow mocks the expectation of to-day. The soul is like a bird caged from the nest that yet remembers something of its fellows in the forest of green leaves, and in summer days hears snatches of song from far-off fields, and yearns, with all its little life, for that liberty which it has never proved, for that companionship which it so early missed, and for those songs which it never learned to utter, though it strives in broken notes for them.

Once some adventurous hunters, from a ledge of rocks, robbed an eagle's nest of an eaglet. Brought home, he was reared among fowls, that he might perform domestic duty. As he grew, he grew apart from the children of the dunghill, and sat moody in sullen dignity. As his wings secretly grew strong, they were clipped. When on a summer's day, wild in the heaven the hawk screamed, every fowl in the yard ran cowering to a shelter; he, with flashing eye, and discordant scream, reared himself to fly. But, alas! he could not rise. He fell sick. He would have died, if he might. They let him alone. His pinions grow again. They forgot him. He forgot not. The sky was his. The great round of air, without line or bound, was his. And when, one neglectful summer day, all were dozing, from afar up in the sky—so far that none could see, or see only a floating speck—there came down a cry so faint that no ear might hear it—none but an eagle's. Then, with sudden force, all its life beating in its breast, it sprang up. Away from the yard, its fowls, its owners, over the rick and over the barn, over the trees and over the hills, round and round in growing circles, beaten with growing power of wing, the freed eagle sought its fellow, and found its liberty right under the sun!

And such, of many and many a soul, sad in bondage, valiant in liberty, has been the history.

—Beecher.

(2) The soul should have the pre-eminence.

(4640.) How just is it that the soul should have the pre-eminence in all respects above the body. The one is the fading offspring of the earth, the other is of an heavenly extraction and incorruptible nature. When Pherecides, the Assyrian, first taught among the Grecians the doctrine of the soul's immortality, his discourse so prevailed on Pythagoras of Samos, that it changed him from an athlete into a philosopher. He that before wholly attended upon his body to make it excel in strength or agility, that he might contend victoriously in the Olympic games, then made it his business to improve and advance his soul in knowledge and virtue. And if the glimmering appearances of this great truth were so powerful upon him, how much more should the clear and certain discoveries of it be operative to make us chiefly regard the interest of our immortal part.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(3.) The folly of caring more for the body than the soul.

(4641.) The body is to the soul as a barren turf to a mine of gold, as a mud-wall about a delicate garden, as a wooden box wherein the jeweller carries his precious gems, as a coarse case to a fair and rich instrument, as a rotten hedge to a paradise, as Pharaoh's prison to a Joseph, or, as a mask to a beautiful face.

—Adams, 1653.

(4642.) The soul was not made for the body, as the lute is not made for the case, but the body for the soul, as a box for the jewel.

—Adams, 1653.

(4643.) I do not approve the sullenness of that soul which wrongs the body; but I worse like to have the body wrong the soul, to have Hagar tricked up in Sarah's garments and set at upper end of the table. If the painted popinjay, that so dotes on her own beauty, had an eye to see how her soul is used, she would think her practice more ill-favoured and unhandsome than perfuming a putrefied coffin, or putting mud into a glass of crystal. For shame, let us put the soul foremost again, and not set heaven lowest and earth uppermost.

—Adams, 1653.

(4644.) There is a parable of a woman, who, having twin children, and both being presented to her, she falls deeply and fondly in love with the one, but is careless and disrespectful of the other: this she will nurse herself, but that is put forth. Her love grows up with the child she kept herself: she decks it fine, she feeds it choicely; but at last, by overmuch pampering of it, the child surfeits, becomes mortally sick, and when it was dying, she remembers herself, and sends to look after the other child that was at nurse, to the end she might now cherish it; but when the messenger came, she finds it dying and gasping likewise, and examining the truth, she understands that through the mother's carelessness and neglect to look after it, the poor child was starved; thus was the fond, partial mother, to her great grief, sorrow, and shame, deprived of both her hopeful babes at once. Thus every Christian is this mother, the children are our body and soul; the former of these it is that men and women fall deeply and fondly in love with, whilst indeed they are careless and neglect the other; this they dress and feed, nothing is too good or too dear for it; but at the last the body surfeits, comes by some means or other to its deathbed, when there is very little or no hope of life; then men begin to remember the soul, and would think of some course to save it: the minister he is sent for in all haste to look after it; but, alas! he finds it in part dead, in part dying; and the very truth is, the owner, through neglect and carelessness, hath starved the soul, and it is ready to go to hell before the body is fit for the grave. And so the foolish fond Christian, to his eternal shame and sorrow, loseth both his body and soul for ever. —Spencer, 1658.

(4645.) If one should send me from abroad a richly-carved and precious statue, and the careless dryman who tipped it upon the side-walk before my door should give it such a blow that one of the boards of the box should be wrenched off, I should be frightened lest the hurt had penetrated further, and wounded it within. But if, taking off the remaining boards, and the swathing-bands of straw or cotton, the statue should come out fair and unharmed, I should not mind the box, but should cast it carelessly into the street. Now, every man has committed to him a statue, moulded by the oldest master, not of Cupid, or Venus, or Psyche, or Jupiter, or Apollo, but the image of God; and he who is only solicitous for outward things, who is striving to protect merely the body from injuries and reverses, is letting the statue go rolling away into the gutter, while he is picking up the fragments and lamenting the ruin of the box. —Becher.

(4.) The loss of the soul carries with it the loss of the body.

(4646.) If the soul be lost, the man is lost. The body is but as a boat fastened to the stern of a stately ship: if the ship sink, the boat follows it. —Flavel, 1630-1691.

(4647.) The soul is the bottom in which the body and its everlasting good is embarked.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(5.) As the body and the soul are partners in sin, so they shall be also in suffering.

(4648.) There was a master of a family who committed the custody of his orchard unto two of his servants, whereof the one was blind and the other lame; and the lame servant being taken in love with the beauty of the fruit, presently told his blind fellow that if he had but the use of his limbs, and his feet to walk as well as he had, it should not be long ere he would be master of these apples. The blind man answered, he had as good a mind to enjoy them as himself, and if his eyes had not failed him they had not rested all that while upon the tree. Whereupon they both agreed to unite their strength and join their forces together. The whole blind man took the well-sighted lame man upon his shoulder, and so they reached the apples, and conveyed their master's fruit away. But being impeached for their fault and examined by their master, each one framed his own excuse. The blind man said he could not so much as see the tree whereon they grew, and therefore it was plain he could have none of them; and the lame man said he could not be suspected, because he had no limbs to climb or stand to reach them. But the wise master, perceiving the subtle craft of his two false servants, put them as they were, one upon the other's shoulders, and so punished both together. Thus it is that sin is neither of the body without the soul, nor of the soul without the body, but it is a common act of both body and soul; they are like Simeon and Levi, brothers and partners in every mischief; and therefore God, in His just judgment, will punish both body and soul together, if they be not repaired and redeemed by Christ.

—Peter Martyr.

12. Its immortality.

(1.) A world-wide conviction.

(4649.) The unanswerable reasonings of Butler never reached the ear of the grey-haired pious peasant, but he needs not their powerful aid to establish his sure and certain hope of a blessed immortality. It is no induction of logic that has transfixed the heart of the victim of deep remorse, when he withers beneath an influence unseen by mortal eye, and shrinks from the anticipation of a reckoning to come. In both the evidence is within, a part of the original constitution of every rational mind, planted there by Him who framed the wondrous fabric. This is the power of conscience: with an authority which no man can put away from him it pleads at once for his own future existence, and for the moral attributes of an omnipresent and everpresent Deity. In a healthy state of the moral feelings, the man recognises its claim to supreme dominion. Amid the degradation of guilt it still raises its voice and asserts its right to govern the whole man; and though its warnings are disregarded, and its claims disallowed, it proves within his inmost soul an accuser that cannot be stilled, and an avenging spirit that never is quenched.

—Dr. J. Abercrombie, 1781-1844.

(4650.) It cannot be questioned that there is a deep and wide testimony in man's nature to the existence of a God and of a future life; it may be pronounced either true or false, but it must be admitted to exist. We find it appearing in all countries and in all ages, and the seeming exceptions to it no more vitiate the fact than the absence of reason in some individuals, or its degradation in some races, would lead us to deny that man is rational. —Ker.

(2.) Influence of the hope of immortality.

(4651.) Few, without the hope of another life, would think it worth their while to live above the allurements of sense. —Atterbury, 1663-1732.

(4652.) No man who has not a clear belief in a future life can have permanently a strong sense of duty. A man may, indeed, persuade himself during various periods of his existence that this sense of duty is the better and the purer from not being bribed by the prospect of a future reward, or stimulated, as he would perhaps say, unhealthily by the dread of a future punishment. But, for all that, his moral life, if he has not an eternal future before him, is, depend upon it, futile and impoverished. It is not merely that he has fewer and feeblar motives to right action; it is that he has a false estimate, because an under-estimate, of his real place in the universe. He has forfeited, in the legitimate sense of the term, his true title to self-respect. He has divested himself of the merit, of the instincts, of the sense of noble birth and lofty destiny which properly belong to him. He is like the heir to a great name, or to a throne, who is bent on forgetting his lineage and his responsibility in a self-sought degradation. Man cannot, if he would, live with impunity only as a more accomplished kind of animal than are the creatures around him. Man is, by the terms of his existence, a being of eternity, and he cannot unmake himself. He cannot take up a position which abdicates his highest prerogatives without, sooner or later, sinking down into degradations which are in themselves a punishment.

—Liddon.

(3.) Is not incredible.

(4653.) Even in a moral point of view, I think the analogies derived from the transformation of insects admit of some beautiful applications, which have not been neglected by pious entomologists. The three states—of the caterpillar, larva, and butterfly—have, since the time of the Greek poets, been applied to typify the human being,—its terrestrial form, apparent death, and ultimate celestial destination; and it seems more extraordinary that a sordid and crawling worm should become a beautiful and active fly—that an inhabitant of the dark and fetid dunghill should in an instant entirely change its form, rise into the blue air, and enjoy the sunbeams—than that a being whose pursuits here have been after an undying name, and whose purest happiness has been derived from the acquisition of intellectual power and finite knowledge, should rise hereafter into a state of being where immortality is no longer a name, and ascend to the source of Unbounded Power and Infinite Wisdom.

—Sir Humphrey Davy, 1778–1829.

(4.) The soul is not destroyed by its separation from the body.

(4654.) Carnal reason can hardly imagine how a soul should have subsistence after its separation from the body; it seems incredible, because it is invisible. But eagles can see more than owls; nor was mere nature ignorant of this: through all clouds of error she could see this clear truth, that souls die not with their bodies. This is an inbred instinct sucked from the breast of nature, an indelible principle stamped in the soul by God Himself, not to be rased out. The waggoner hath a being, though his coach be broken; the ship is wrecked on the sea, yet the mariner may swim to harbour; the adder lives after she has slipt off her coat; the musician keeps his skill, though his lute be broken; the snail may creep out, and leave his shell behind.

—Adams, 1654.

(4655.) That it hath much use of or dependence on the body in its present operations is no proof at all that when it is out of the body it cannot otherwise act or operate. If the candle shine in the lantern, it can shine out of it, though with some difference. He is scarcely rational that doubteth whether there be such things as incorporeal, invisible intelligences, minds, or spirits: and if they can act without bodies, why may not our minds?

Though the egg would die if the shell were broken or the hen did not sit upon it, it doth not follow that therefore the chicken cannot live without a shell, or sitting on. Though the embryo and infant must have a continuity with the mother, and be nourished by her nourishment, it doth not follow that, therefore, it must be so with him when he is born and grown up to ripeness of age. And when there is full proof that souls have a future life to live, it is a folly to doubt of it, merely because we cannot conceive of the manner of their acting without a body; for he that is not desirous to be deceived, must reduce things uncertain and dark to those that are clear and certain, and not contrarily; all good arguing is à notioribus, and not à minimis notis.

—Baxter, 1615–1691.

(4656.) Were the soul but an accident, a quality, or a result, he that kills the body must needs kill the soul too, as he that casts a snowball into the fire must needs destroy the whiteness with the snow. Accidents fall and perish with their subjects. But, seeing it is plain in these and many other scriptures (Luke xxiii. 43; Matt. x. 20, &c.), the soul does not fall with the body, nothing can be more plain and evident than that it is of a substantial nature.

When the Spaniards came first among the poor Indians, they thought the horse and his rider to be one creature, as many ignorant ones think the soul and body of man to be nothing but breath and body. Whereas indeed they are two distinct creatures, as vastly different in their natures as the rider and his horse, or the bird and his cage. While the man is on horseback he moves according to the motion of the horse; and while the bird is encaged, he eats and drinks, and sleeps, and hops and sings in his cage. But if the horse fail and die under his rider, or the cage be broken, the man can go on his own feet, and the bird enjoy itself as well, yea, better, in the open fields and woods than in the cage; neither depend, as to being or action, on the horse or cage.

—Flavel, 1630–1691.

(4657.) I once heard a preacher trying to teach young children that the soul would live after they were all dead. They listened, but did not understand what he was saying. But at last, taking his watch from his pocket, he said—

"James, what is this I am holding in my hand?"

"A watch, sir."

"Do you all see it?"

"Yes, sir."

"How do you know it is a watch?"

"It ticks, sir."

"Very well, can any of you hear it tick? all listen now."

After a pause—

"Yes, sir; we hear it."

He then took off the case, and held the case in one hand and the watch in the other.

"Now, children, which is the watch? You see there are two which look like watches."

"The little one in your right hand, sir."

"Very well again; now I will lay the case aside, and put it away down there in my hat. Now let us see if you can hear the watch tick."

"Yes, sir, we hear it," exclaimed several voices.

"Well, the watch can tick, and go, and keep time, you see, when the case is taken off and put in my hat. The watch goes just as well. So it is with you, children. Your body is nothing but the case; your soul is inside. The case—the body—may be taken off and buried in the ground, and the soul will live and think just as well as the watch will go, as you see, when the case is off!"

(5.) The soul contains within itself prophecies of immortality.

(4658.) Among these and other excellent arguments for the immortality of the soul, there is one drawn from the perpetual progress of the soul to its perfection without a possibility of ever arriving at it; which is a hint that I do not remember to have seen opened and improved by others who have written on this subject, though it seems to me to carry a great weight with it. How can it enter into the thoughts of man, that the soul, which is capable of such immense perfections, and of receiving new improvements to all eternity, shall fall away into nothing almost as soon as it is created? Are such abilities made for no purpose?

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(4659.) In the desire for immortality man has sure proof of his capacity for it.

—Southey, 1774-1843.

(4660.) Nature never deceives. All the instincts, all the faculties which are in any of its creatures—there is always something to meet them. Nature does not disappoint. If there is a particular appetite, there is something to meet it; if there is a particular faculty, there is something to meet it; if there is a particular instinct, there is something to meet it. Well, then, the moral aspirations of man, the spiritual instincts, the irrepressible anticipations of which he is capable and which are in him, part of himself, faculties and instincts which nature has bestowed, is she to play fast and loose with them? Is she to deceive him with regard to them? She deceives in nothing besides. She meets every appetite and instinct of inferior creatures, she meets them with that which is appropriate; but the highest affections, the noblest aspirations, the spiritual instincts, are they all a make-believe? Is nature deceiving and tantalising man in all that? You take an egg out from under the parent bird when she has been sitting on it, and it is nearly come to perfection; you hold the egg in your hand: there it is, as it were, a dark world with its single inhabitant. You take off the top; you look in. There in that darkness are tiny wings. What are they? Of what use are they there in that little dark world occupied by that individual? Why, they are a prophecy that the creature is intended for a world in which there is an atmosphere, intended to be born into an atmosphere, and there is its preparation. These tiny wings are a prophecy and preparation for its future condition. Have the souls of men no wings? Are not the spiritual aspirations, desires, hopes, anticipations—are not these wings of the spirit? Are they not instincts which are given to us here, which are a prophecy to us of the future for which we are intended?

—Binney.

(4661.) The spirit or soul of man knows itself to be capable, I will not say of unlimited, but of continuous progress and development. However vigorous the tree or the animal may be, it soon reaches the point when it can grow no more. The time comes when the tree has borne all the leaves and fruit and buds which it can bear, when its vital force is exhausted, and it is no more. The animal may have done its best, it may have reached a high condition of strength and beauty, but when its limit is reached it can grow no more. With the soul of man as a living and thinking power it is far otherwise; he has never exhausted himself. When the man of science has made some noble discovery, when the literary man has written a great book, when the statesman has carried a series of important measures, we cannot say that he has exhausted himself. The spiritual man is indeed dependent on the material man, and as the body moves on towards decay and dissolution it extends something of the influence of its weakness and incapacity to its spiritual companion; but even then the soul resists this and asserts its separate existence; the mind of man knows that each separate effort instead of exhausting his powers tends to strengthen them, and so he will go on continually making larger and nobler and more vigorous efforts. So, too, is it with conscience and duty; with these there is no finality. One great act suggests another, one sacrifice makes another easier; the virtuous impulse in the soul is not like the growth in the tree, a self-exhausting force, but it is always moving on, always advancing. "Be not weary in well-doing"—this is the language of the Eternal to the human will; but never is "Be not weary of growing" said to the tree or the animal, because organic matter differs from spirit in this, that it does reach the limit of its activity, and then it turns backwards towards non-existence.

—Liddon.

(4662.) Oh, if this life were all that I could have, I should weep, it seems to me, from the present hour to the very end, unless I could say, as the ancients did, "Let us eat, drink, and be merry. To-morrow we die, so let us make the best of the little time that is left us." I should be in a state of wanton, merry despair, on the one side; or of tearful, sad despair, on the other side. I must live again. I must make the experiment of life once more. I have made poor work here, but I have met with just success enough to feel that if I had a better chance I could do something. I am like a man that takes the first canvas to paint a picture. He does not know what he will do. He lays in forms in all sorts of ways without coming to any satisfactory result. At last he says, "I cannot make anything of that picture; but I have a conception. Bring me a fresh canvas, and I will try again, when I think I shall have better success." I have long been trying to paint a true life, and have only partially succeeded; but if God Almighty will give me another canvas, I think I can paint better. And He will. He that brought forth from the dead our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, will bring me forth.

—Becher.

(4663.) The faith of immortality is the world's peculiar need. We need this faith from the sense of the incompleteness which there is in this mortal state; and we need it just in proportion as we rise toward perfection ourselves. We need it because life in us awakens a thousand ideas and recognitions of possibilities which, after all, we cannot realise in this world, nor fulfil. We are perpetually receiving seeds in our temperate zone, from foreign zones: seeds from South America, and seeds from the Orient. They have great promise in them: some of fruit, some of esculent vegetable, and some of blossom; and the torment of our summer to those who are enthusiastic in regard to such things, is that it is not warm enough nor long enough to bring forth their excellence. The flower will not blossom; the fruit will not develop its saccharine nature. Hundreds and thousands of men plant these seeds, and nourish them till they begin to develop all the habits of their respective species, and throw out buds which give promise of fruit, and excite confident expectation. With great care the gardener protects the plants from the first frosts, hoping thereby to enable it to come to maturity. But at last winter smites it before it has even blossomed, and he cannot but say, "The growth of this plant was not completed; it was susceptible of further development; but I could not carry it any further because the season was not long enough nor warm enough." And all the reasoning in this world could not convince him that God created that plant to stop growing where it did. He says he stakes his being on it, he declares that it stands to reason (for that is the expression which men employ when they feel all all over that a thing is true, when they have an instinct in them that it is true, but when they have no reason about it) that the seed of this partly developed plant was meant somewhere to have a summer long enough for its full development. Or, if he carries it so far as to bring out a flower, he says, "Thank God for the flower; but I want to see if under other conditions I cannot carry the plant far enough to develop seed or fruit." For there is many a summer that is long enough and warm enough to develop buds, which is not long enough and warm enough to develop flowers; and there is many a summer that is long enough and warm enough to develop flowers, which is not long enough and warm enough to develop seed or fruit. And he says, "If I can get another seed, I will see if I cannot bring it to ripeness." He tries, and fails; the summer is too short; and he says to himself (and in your thought and feeling every one of you justifies his conclusion), "There must be, somewhere, a clime to which this seed is adapted. It grew somewhere, and somewhere there is a summer warm enough and long enough for it. And if I could find that place, and plant it, it would grow, through the kindly months, until it swelled into ripeness, developing in their turn bud, and blossom, and fruit." Now I declare that human life in this world is a seed whose development here stops far short of those possibilities which are foreshadowed in its experiences. Here men are not fully developed in any single faculty of their being, except those which are related to time and earth.

—Becher.

(6.) The condition of the soul in the future life.

(4664.) Thank God, when I go home to heaven, I shall leave behind many things that will be of no use to me there. When an engine is taken from one boat and placed in another, it is not necessary that the fastenings should go with it. The screws and clamps and feeding-pumps that belong to that peculiar ship from which it is taken may be left behind. The screws and clamps and feeding-pumps that have been necessary to keep my mind in this body, and that it has given me so much trouble to patch and mend, I shall leave in the grave. But my supremest reason, my divinest sentiments of religion, my affections and loves, my tastes—these God, the blessed Pilot, shall carry safely through the grave and its darkness, and I shall be planted again in heaven, where snows never fall, where frosts never come, and I shall bring out leaf and blossom and fruit; and then, with leaf and blossom and fruit, I will present myself at the Throne of God, saying, "Thou hast given me life, and life again, and life for ever: to Thee, and to Thee only, be praise and honour and glory evermore."

—Becher.

(7.) The developments it renders possible.

(4665.) The caterpillar, on being converted into an inert scaly mass, does not appear to be fitting itself for an inhabitant of the air, and can have no consciousness of the brilliancy of its future being. We are masters of the earth, but perhaps we are the slaves of some great and unknown being. The fly that we crush with our finger or feed with our viands has no knowledge of man, and no consciousness of his superiority. We suppose that we are acquainted with matter and all its elements; yet we cannot even guess at the cause of electricity, or explain the laws of the formation of the stones that fall from meteors. There may be beings, thinking beings, near or surrounding us, which we do not perceive, which we cannot imagine. We know very little; but, in my opinion, we know enough to hope for the immortality, the individual immortality, of the better part of man.

—Sir Humphrey Davy, 1778-1829.

(8.) If an error, a delightful error.

(4666.) But if I err in believing that the souls of men are immortal, I willingly err; nor while I live would I wish to have this delightful error extorted from me; and if after death I shall feel nothing, as some minute philosophers think, I am not afraid lest dead philosophers should laugh at me for the error.

—Cicero, B.C. 106-43.

(9.) How faith in the soul's immortality should manifest itself.

(4667.) If the soul be immortal, it requires to be cultivated with attention, not only for what we call the time of life, but for that which is to follow,—I mean eternity; and the least neglect in this point may be attended with endless consequences. If death were the final dissolution of being, the wicked would be great gainers by it, by being delivered at once from their bodies, their souls, and their vices; but as the soul is immortal, it has no other means of being freed from its evils, nor any safety for it, but in becoming very good and very wise; for it carries nothing with it but its bad or good deeds, its virtues and vices, which are commonly the consequences of the education it has received, and the causes of eternal happiness or misery.

—Socrates, B.C. 469-339.

TEMPTATION.

I. WHY IT IS PERMITTED.

1. That our hearts may be revealed to us.

(4668.) Worms, and other insects, take up their habitation under the surface of the earth. A plot of ground may be outwardly verdant with grass, and decorated with flowers;—but take a spade in your hand, and turn up the mould, and you soon have a sample of the vermin that lurks beneath. Temptation is the spade which breaks up the ground of a believer's heart, and helps to discover the corruptions of his fallen nature. —Salter.

2. That our character may be tested.

(4669.) We know not what patience we have, what courage, what zeal, till we be put to it. A man is that he is when he is tempted. Some presume more than they can; so did Peter—"Though I should die with Thee, I will not deny Thee:" alas! he knew not his own weakness. Others doubt of that they can, as Naaman; God be merciful to me when I come into the house of Rimmon: here I can serve God constantly, but when I wait on my master to the idolatrous temple, what shall I do then? Lord, be merciful to me in this. Go in peace, saith the prophet; God will strengthen thee. Every cock-boat can swim in a river, every sculler sail in a calm; every man of a patient temper or cheery disposition, can hold up his head in ordinary gusts. But when a black storm rises, a tenth wave flows, deep calls unto deep, nature yields, spirit faints, heart fails; here is the trial, how dost thou now? When our hopes are adjourned, our expectation delayed, and instead of pleasing contents we find bitter sorrows; this will discover our hearts. If, then, faith prevail above sense, and hope against all natural reason and fear, our graces shall shine like orient pearls, in true and perfect beauty. After all the prorogations of promised ease, still to stand erect and triumph; here is the assurance of faith, that hath the word for compass, Christ at the helm, and the voyage is salvation. —Adams, 1654.

(4670.) A further reason why you are thus tempted and tried is, that God, in His wise providence, is now testing you to see whether you are a fit man for His work. Before a fire-arm is sold it is taken to the proof-shop, and there it is loaded with a charge, perhaps four or five times heavier than it will ever have to carry at the ordinary sportsman's hand. The barrels are fired, and if they burst in the proof-house no great hurt is done; whereas it would be exceedingly dangerous if they should burst in the hands of some unskilful man. So God takes His servants. Some He will make special use of, He puts to the proof, perhaps loads them with five times more temptations than He means they should ordinarily have to endure, in order that He may see, and prove to onlookers, that they are fit men for the Divine service. We have heard that the old warriors, before they would use their swords, would bend them across their knees. They must see whether they had the right stuff or no before they would venture into battle with them. And God does this with His servants. Martin Luther had never been the Martin Luther he was, if it had not been for the devil. The devil was, as it were, the proof-house for Martin Luther. He must be tried and tempted by Satan, and then he becomes fit for the Master's use. —Spurgeon.

3. That our vigilance may be increased.

(4671.) The Lord permits Satan continually to assail us with his temptations, to the end that we may continually buckle upon us the whole armour of God, that we may be ready for the battle. For as those who have no enemies to encounter them cast their armour aside and let it rust because they are secure from danger, but when their enemies are at hand and sound the alarm, they both wake and sleep in their armour, ready for the assault; so, if we should not continually skirmish with our spiritual enemies, we would lay aside the spiritual armour; but when we have continual use for it, both day and night we keep it fast buckled upon us, that being armed at all points, we may be able to make resistance and not be surprised at un-awares. —Downham, 1642.

4. That our assurance may be strengthened.

(4672.) God sometimes permits Satan to assail His dear children, the more to strengthen them in His spiritual graces, and to confirm them more fully in the assurance of His love and their salvation.

For as a city which has been once besieged and not sacked will ever after be more strong to hold out if it be assaulted by the like danger, because the citizens will carefully fortify their walls and increase their bulwarks, and as he who has been once robbed by thieves will ever after ride better prepared to make resistance, that he do not again fall into their hand; so those who are besieged and assaulted by their spiritual enemies will ever after more carefully arm themselves against them with the graces of God's Spirit, that they may not be overcome nor foiled by them.

We know that whilst men quietly enjoy their possessions and inheritance they rest secure, keeping their writings in a box without ever looking on them from year to year; but when their title and right is called into question, and some man labours to thrust them out of their possession, then they peruse their writings and deeds with all diligence. And not satisfied with their own judgment, they resort to skilful lawyers, craving their counsel how they may maintain their right, and answer the plea which their adversary makes against them. Whereby oftentimes it comes to pass that they make their title not only much more strong in itself, but also more clear and evident unto all others, so that afterwards none dare once adventure to trouble them again, or call their right into question. So whilst we never doubt of our heavenly inheritance we rest secure, and let the book of God, which is our best deed and evidence, lie under our cupboards till it mould for want of use. But when Satan by his temptations calls our title into question, and pleads that we have no right to God's kingdom, then do we most carefully and diligently peruse the book of God, then do we go unto God's ministers, desiring their counsel how we may answer Satan's plea and clear our title; then do we most carefully use all good means to increase our knowledge, that thereby we may thoroughly inform ourselves of our right, and confirm our assurance against all cavils and objections. And hereby it comes to pass that those who before had very weak titles to their heavenly inheritance, whilst they lived reckless and secure, and but slender assurance ever to enjoy it; now, by their care, pains, and diligence have so confirmed it unto themselves, and so cleared it to all the world, that Satan dare never after call it in question; unless he do it, like many contentious men in these days, rather that he may trouble and vex them with a tedious suit, than for any hope of prevailing in the end. —Downham, 1642.

II. HOW IT ASSAILS US.

1. Under false masks.

(4673.) Satan like a pirate hangs out flags of truce, to signify peace and friendship, till he have gotten us within his reach and command : and then he grapples with us, ransacks us of all God's graces, and casts us overboard into the sea of destruction.

—Downham, 1642.

(4674.) When Satan assaults any poor soul, he suffers nothing to appear to the eye but pleasure, profit, a sweet satisfaction of our desires, and a phantasma of happiness. There is also wrath, and judgment, and torment, and sting of conscience belonging to it ; these must be, but these shall not be seen. All the way is white snow, that hides the pit. Green grass tempts us to walk ; the serpent is unseen. If temptations, like plaises, might be turned on both sides, the kingdom of darkness would not be so populous. If David could have foreseen the grief of his broken bones ere he fell upon Bathsheba, those aspersions of blood and lust had not befallen him. If Achan could have foreseen the stones about his ears before he filched those accursed things, he would never have fingered them. But as it is said of Adam and Eve after their fall, "Then their eyes were opened ;" then, not before. Judas was blind till he had done the deed, then his eyes were opened, and he saw it in its true horror.

—Adams, 1653.

(4675.) Temptations, like Delilah, tell us a fair tale, but their end is to bring us a-sleep, and pluck out our eyes.

—Adams, 1653.

(4676.) "I am very sharp," said the Hook which was holding the struggling Fish.

"I know that but too well," answered the poor captive ; "but let me tell you, it was not owing so much unto your sharpness that I am captured, as to the bit of bait by which I was tempted."

"It is the way all Hooks succeed," observed the other ; "there must be trick in order to decoy. Had you seen my point, and been aware of the danger, you should have wisely kept out of the way instead of so readily swallowing the worm."

By disguised temptations the great enemy hopes, and frequently succeeds, to get souls into his power. How often a Hook is hid within a Lure ! and in what multitudes of instances souls have perished through catching at the Bait, which Satan placed in the way.

—Bowden.

3. In many forms.

(4677.) If there were but one cup alone, it would cloy, and satiate, and procure loathing, as even manna did to Israel ; therefore Satan doth diversify his drinks, to keep the wicked man's appetite fresh and sharp. If he be weary of one sin, behold, another stands at his elbow. Hath Dives dined ? He may walk up to his study, and tell his money, his bags, his idols ; or call for the key of his wardrobe, to feed his proud eye with his silks : for divitia et delicia, riches and pleasure, serve one another's turn. If Nabal be weary of counting his flocks, or laying up their fleeces, he may go and make himself drunk with his sheep-shearers.

—Adams, 1653.

(4678.) If thou dost not stumble at this stone, the devil hath another at hand to throw in the way. He is not so unskilful a fowler as to go with one single shot into the field ; and therefore expect him, as soon as he hath discharged one, and missed thee, to let fly at thee with a second.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

3. In forms specially adapted to our weakness.

(4679.) The devil plagues and torments us in the place where we are most tender and weak. In Paradise he fell not upon Adam, but upon Eve.

—Luther, 1483-1546.

(4680.) The world is Satan's bait. He seldom throws out a naked hook. Let murder, fraud, lying, or idolatry be presented in their undisguised turpitude, and few of good education and correct morals can be taken captive by him. But he conceals the hook in a goodly bait, and like a skilful angler. He knows how to use that part of the world which is best suited to our taste and most likely to decoy. For one he has a golden bait ; for another, pleasure ; for a third, worldly consequence and honour. And his line is thrown out in every place,—in the place of business, in our families, studies, and at our tables, and on our pillows.

—Jackson, 1640.

(4681.) Satan, like a fisher, baits his hook according to the appetite of the fish.

—Adams, 1653.

(4682.) An enemy before he besiegeth a city, surroundeth it at a distance to see where the wall is the weakest, best to be battered, lowest, easiest to be scaled, ditch narrowest to be bridged, shallowest to be waded over ; what place is not regularly fortified, where he may approach with least danger, and assault with most advantage : so Satan walketh about, surveying all the powers of our souls, where he may most probably lay his temptations, as whether our understandings are easier corrupted with error, or our fancies with levity, or our wills with frowardness, or our affections with excess.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(4683.) Sometimes a man shall see the scene of things round about him so fitly laid, and prepared to serve him in the gratification of his corrupt desire, that he cannot but conclude that there was something more than blind chance which brought him into that condition. For when we see a net or snare curiously and artificially placed, we may be sure that there is something intended to be caught, and that the fowler is not far off, whether we see him or no.

—South, 1633-1716.

4. From opposite quarters.

(4684.) Temptations may be compared to the wind, which when it has ceased raging from one point, after a short calm frequently renews its violence from another quarter. The Lord silenced Satan's former assaults against you, but he is permitted to try you again in another way.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

III. IN WHAT ITS STRENGTH LIES.

(4685.) Let Satan present such a bait as honour, pleasure, pelf, and the naughty heart of man skips after it as a hungry dog would at a crust.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4686.) Let any temptation whatever be proposed to a man, the suitableness of whose matter to his corruptions or manner of its proposal makes it a temptation, immediately he has not only to do with the temptation as outwardly proposed, but also with his own heart about it. Without further consideration or debate, the temptation has got a friend in him. Not a moment's space is given between the proposal and the necessity there is incumbent on the soul to look to its enemy within. In a city that is at unity with itself, compact and entire, without divisions and parties, if an enemy approach about it, the rulers and inhabitants have no thoughts at all, but only how they may oppose the enemy without, and resist him in his approaches. But if the city be divided in itself, if there be factions and traitors within, the very first thing they do is to look to the enemies at home, the traitors within, to cut off the head of Sheba, if they will be safe.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(4687.) "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed." If you apply a magnet to the end of a needle that courses freely on its pivot, the needle, affected by a strange attraction, approaches as if it loved it. Reverse the order, apply the magnet now to the opposite end—to the other pole, and the needle shrinks away, trembling, as if it did not love, but hated it. So it is with temptation. One man rushes into the arms of vice; another recoils from them with horror. Joseph starts back, saying, "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" What is loved by one, is loathsome in another's eyes; and according as the nature it addresses is holy or unholy, temptation attracts or repels; gives pain or pleasure; is loved or hated. It is our corrupt and evil passions that give its power to temptation. These are the combustibles it fires; the quick and fiery powder, that a spark, which a dewdrop had quenched, flashes into an explosion.

—Guthrie.

(4688.) It is in our own bosom that the power of temptation is found. Temptation is but a spark; and if a spark fall upon ice, if it fall upon snow, if it fall upon water, what is the harm of a spark? but if it fall upon powder—the powder is yours, the spark only is the devil's.

—Becher.

(4689.) The power of temptation depends upon two elements: first, the power of presenting inducement or motive on the part of the tempter; and, secondly and mainly, the strength in the victim of the passion to which this motive is presented. No man could tempt to pride one that had not already a powerful tendency to pride. The chord must be there before the hand of the harper can bring out the tone.

—Becher.

(4690.) The power of temptation is in proportion to the nature of the soul tempted. A thoughtless miner takes an uncovered light into the mine; where there is but little gas there is but a wavering and flickering of a transient flame,—hardly flame indeed; but where there is an accumulation of gas, the uncovered light occasions an explosion which shivers the rocks and brings swift destruction upon all who are in the mine. In both cases it was the same mine, the same light, the same miner, but the condition of the air was different. So is it with the fiery darts of the wicked one; they are shot into all human hearts, and just in proportion to the materials, so to speak, which are found there will be the success or failure of the enemy.

—Joseph Parker.

IV. REASONS FOR SHUNNING IT.

1. Because our safety lies in avoiding it.

(4691.) [On a spider in his window.] See how cunningly this little Arabian hath spread out his tent for a prey; how heedfully he watches for a passenger. So soon as ever he hears the noise of a fly stir off, how he hastens to his door! and if that silly heedless traveller do but touch upon the verge of that unsuspected walk how suddenly doth he seize upon the miserable booty; and, after some strife, binding him fast with those subtle cords, drags the helpless captive after him into his cave.

What is this but an emblem of those spiritual freebooters that lie in wait for our souls? They are the spiders, we the flies; they have spread their nets of sin; if we be once caught, they bind us fast, and hale us into hell.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4692.) The best way to conquer sin is by Parthian war—to run away.

—Adams, 1653.

(4693.) "A companion of fools shall be destroyed." Sin is a disease which is communicated by contagion. Shun, therefore, the place of infection. More than if they had plague or fever, avoid the company of the infected. Abjure every scene, abstain from every pleasure, abandon every pursuit, which experience has taught you tends to sin, dulls the fine edge of conscience, unfits for religious duties, indisposes for religious enjoyments, sends you prayerless to bed, or dull and drowsy to prayer. As the seaman does with surf-beaten reef or iron-bound shore, give these a wide berth; and, passing on, hold straight away, under a press of canvas, in your course for heaven.

—Guthrie.

(4694.) A holy life is impossible to any but those who stand on their guard against the beginnings of evil. Take alarm at an evil thought, wish, desire. What are these but the germs of sin—the winged seeds which, wafted on by the wind, drop into the heart, and, finding in our natural corruption a fat and too favourable soil, spring up into actual transgressions? These, like the rattle of the snake, the hiss of the serpent, reveal the presence and near neighbourhood of danger. Besides, does not the experience of all good men prove that sin is most easily crushed in the bud, and that it is safer to flee from temptation than to fight it? Fight like a man when you cannot avoid the battle, but rather flee than fight. Be afraid of temptation, avoid it, abhor it; and if caught by the enchantress, tear yourself from her encircling arms, seek safety in flight, your answer that of Joseph's chastity, "Shall I do this great evil and sin against God?"

—Guthrie.

(4695.) Stand in awe of God, and in fear of temptation. "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." It is not safe to bring gunpowder within the fall even of a spark; nor safe, however dexterous your driving, to shave with your wheels the edge of a beetling precipice; nor safe in the best-built bark that ever rode the waves, to sail on the outmost rim of a roaring whirlpool.

—Guthrie.

(4696.) If you have bad habits of temper, take care that you do not go where your temper will be tried. If you have had drinking habits, be careful that you do not go where the sight or smell of liquor will tempt you to drink again. If you are going to maintain your good resolutions, if you are going to reform your habits, keep away from evil. Pass not by it. Turn from it. Avoid it. Avoid the very appearance of it. A man who has been leading a lustful and lascivious life, cannot afford to go into the company of those who have been accustomed to go with him. No amount of resolving to do right will save a man if he remains under the influences which have led him to go wrong. If a man wears garments in which powder is wrought into the texture, he cannot safely go and hire out in a blacksmith's shop.

—Becher.

(4697.) Our passions are inflammatory. If once a spark falls upon them they explode, and you cannot prevent it. You can keep fire away from powder; but when you have once touched fire to powder it will do no good to say your prayers; you will go up in spite of yourselves if there is enough of it. Our appetites and passions are of such a nature that you must cure them or keep them away from temptation if you would avoid any explosion. If a man is very passionate, and he has been accustomed to give way to his passion, and he wants to overcome it, he must watch against being tempted. If the fire comes to the powder you will have a discharge. You must look out beforehand.

—Becher.

(4698.) Camping down upon the edges of a sin from which a man has just escaped is dangerous work. A person in such a position is like one who, upon finding himself in the running current of a river which is rising, swollen by heavy rains, struggles desperately until he reaches its banks, and there settles himself in false security. In the morning the waters of the freshet are booming about him, and he flies to the meadow, a little higher. But the floods are out, and they rise and rise, faster than he can run, and the man who by fleeing at once to the mountains when he came up from the river would have been saved, by tarrying upon the lowlands perishes.

—Becher.

(4699.) Our Lord bids us watch and pray that we "enter not into temptation." Let us avoid the entrance to the cave, if we would not fall victims to the lion that lurks there. If we would save the big ship, let us stop the small leak. If we would preserve the palace from flames, let us put out the spark. If we would prevent the wide wedge bursting asunder our defences, let us not admit its thin point. If we would escape the plague, let us not breathe infection. If we would guard the camp from capture, let us defend the outworks. If we would not enter into temptation, let us watch against the first step that would lead us astray from righteousness, the only path of safety.

—Newman Hall.

(4700.) A man says, "I wish I could be set free from sin to-night," and to-morrow he will mix with gay associates and loose companions, and go to places of amusement, where he is as sure to be led into sin as he would be sure that his coat would burn if he put it into the fire. He goes into the middle of the mischief; he takes the tinder of his heart where he knows there are sparks, and he says, "There will come no harm of it." He puts a candle near the gunpowder, and he hopes he will not be blown away. The man who means to conquer sin, and resolves to conquer it, will keep himself out of mischief's way, that he may be clean before the living God.

—Spurgeon.

2. Because exposure to it is perilous.

(4701.) Jonah was no sooner come to Joppa, but he goes to the haven, or meets with mariners, and presently understands of a ship, not going to Nineveh, but to Tarshish. As soon as he set forward to fly from God, Satan straightway prepared a ship, so that temptation and occasion of sin do always go together. Shall Judas lack money, or Jonah stay for a ship? No, saith Satan, by the mouth of his ministers: Here, Judas, take thee money, and betray thy Master; and, Jonah, here is a ship for thee: go, haste thee away, and fly from the service of the Lord. For the devil is always a very serviceable and pleasant devil to such as fly from God. He can find occasion at all times, and means, and instruments fit for that purpose. If thou wilt fly from God, the devil will lend thee both spurs and a horse, yea, a post-horse, and that will carry you swiftly and lustily away unto all vanity and ungodly lusts.

—Henry Smith, 1560-1591.

(4702.) Many think they may allow themselves to come near a temptation, and they come so near that they fall into the pit. As sometimes in your houses, when you light a candle, you see moths that will flutter up and down the light, and then approach nearer till at length they singe their wings and perish; so it is with many, at first they think they will not do such a thing—Oh! God forbid that they should do so and so; but they will come nigh a temptation, and be tampering with it, till at length they are ensnared by it and destroyed.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(4703.) Satan presents some sinful motion handsomely dressed up to the eye of the soul, that the Christian, ere he is aware of it, may take this brat up, and handle it in his thoughts, till at last he makes it his own by embracing it; and, may be, this boy sent in at the window will open the door to let in a greater thief.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4704.) Consider how apt a temptation is to diffuse, and how prone our nature is to receive an infection. It is dangerous dwelling even in suburbs of an infected city. Not only the touches, but also the very breath of a temptation, is poisonous: and there is sometimes (if I may so express it) a contagion even without a contact.

And if the conscience has not wholly lost its native tenderness, it will not only dread the infection of a wound, but also the aspersion of a blot. For though the soul be not actually corrupted and debauched by a temptation, yet it is something to be sullied and blown upon by it, to have been in the dangerous familiarities of sin, and in the next approach and neighbourhood of destruction. Such being the nature of man, that is hardly possible for him to be near an ill thing, and not the worse for it.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4705.) Fly therefore the occasions and appearances of evil. If you would not be drowned, what do you so near the water-side? If you would not be wounded, why do you thrust yourself among your enemies? If you would escape the hook, meddle not with the bait; walk not among the lime-twigs if you would not be entangled.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4706.) It is the tempter's care to bring the temptation near enough, or to draw the sinner near enough to it; the net must come to the fish, or the fish to the net; the distant fire will not burn the wood. The devil's chief confidence is in the sensitive appetite, which worketh strongest at hand. If he get the drunkard into the alehouse, and show him the cup, he hath half conquered him already ; but if he be scrupulous and modest, some one shall drink a health, or importune him, and put the cup into his hand. The thief with Achan shall see the bait, and the sight will work a covetous desire. The glutton shall have a variety of tempting dishes before him, and be at a table which by the variety of delicious food is fitted to become a snare ; whereas, if he hath nothing set before him but the poor man's simple food, which hath nothing in it fit to tempt him, he might easily have escaped. The fornicator shall have his beautiful dirt brought near him, and presented to him in a tempting dress ; for at a sufficient distance there had been little danger. The ambitious person shall have preferment offered him, or brought so fair to his hand that with a little seeking it may be attained. The fearful coward shall be threatened with the loss of estate or life, and hear the report of the cannons, guns, and drums of Satan. Peter is half conquered when he is got among questioning company in the High Priest's hall. Thus David, thus Lot, thus ordinarily sinners are drawn into the snare.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4707.) Weak dallying with forbidden desires is sure to end in wicked clutching at them. Young men, take care ! You stand upon the beetling edge of a great precipice, when you look over, from your fancied security, at a wrong thing ; and to strain too far, and to look too friendly, leads to a perilous danger of toppling over and being lost ! If you know that a thing cannot be won without transgression, do not tamper with hankerings for it. Keep away from the edge, and shut your "eyes from beholding vanity."

—MacLaren.

(4708.) What we are taught to seek or shun in prayer, we should equally pursue or avoid in action. Very earnestly, therefore, should we avoid temptation, seeking to walk so guardedly in the path of obedience that we may never tempt the devil to tempt us. We are not to enter the thicket in search of the lion. Dearly might we pay for such presumption. This lion may cross our path, or leap upon us from the thicket, but we have nothing to do with hunting him. He that meeteth with him, even though he winneth the day, will find it a stern struggle. Let the Christian pray that he may be spared the encounter. Our Saviour, who had experience of what temptation meant, thus earnestly admonished His disciples,—"Pray that ye enter not into temptation." But let us do as we will, we shall be tempted ; hence the prayer, "Deliver us from evil."

—Spurgeon.

2. Because we are unable to resist it.

(4709.) Thy grace is weak :—It concerns thee, so much the more, to be cautious in avoiding occasions of temptation. He that carries brittle glasses is chary of them, that they take not a knock ; whereas, strong metal fears no danger. He that hath but a small rush-candle walks softly, and keeps off every air.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4710.) If we mean not to be burnt, let us not walk upon the coals of temptation ; if not to be tanned, let us not stand where the sun lies. They sure forget what an insinuating wriggling nature this serpent hath, that dare yield to him in something, and make us believe they will not in another. Who will sit in the company of drunkards, frequent the places where sin is committed, and yet pretend they mean not to be such ? That will prostitute their eye to unchaste objects, and yet be chaste ? That will lend their ears to any corrupt doctrine of the times, and yet be found in the faith ? This is a strong delusion that such are under. If a man hath not power enough to resist Satan in the less, what reason hath he to think he shall in the greater ? Thou hast not grace (it seems) to keep thee from throwing thyself into the whirl of temptation, and dost thou think, when in it, thou shalt bear up against the stream of it ? One would think it is easier, when in the ship, to keep from falling overboard, than when in the sea, to get safely into the ship again.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4711.) The soul, tested by temptation, is like iron tried by weights. No iron bar is absolutely infrangible. Its strength is tested by the weight which it will bear without breaking. No soul is absolutely impeccable. It seems as if all we can dare to ask even of the holiest is how much temptation he can bear without giving way.

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

(4712.) In Eden, our first parents and the tempter were not unequally matched. Belonging to a superior race of intelligent beings, he had more mental, but they, on the other hand, being still innocent, were superior to him in moral power. Thus Eve, like one who, though he brings less strength, brings better weapons to the field of battle than his enemy, might be considered as a fair match for the devil. Vice cannot look virtue in the face, any more than an owl can the sun ; and innocence still, imperfect though it be, seems to possess such power over guilt as the eye of a man has over a lion,—the savage beast quails before his fixed and steady look. Clad in this panoply of heavenly armour, it was Eve's own fault that the simplicity of the dove did not prove more than a match for the cunning of the serpent. But it did not ; and you know the result.

And what chance for us where our first parents perished ? how can guilt stand where innocence fell ? How can poor, fallen creatures, such as we are, expect to conquer an enemy who has won his accursed victories in heaven as well as on earth, and triumphed over the innocence both of angels and of men ! Summoned to a holy war, we are called to fight the good fight, and to resist the devil ; but is it not with us as if I were to raise a sick man from his bed, and, when the earth was spinning round to his dizzy eyes, bid him fight an enemy that had conquered him when health bloomed on his pallid cheek, and strength lay in the arm that hangs powerless by his side ? What chance have infants against the lion that, with bristling mane, lashing tail, and flashing eyes, stands with his paw on the bleeding body of their mother ? When traitors swarm in her streets, what hope has a city to resist the foe that in loyal days scaled, and breached, and carried its walls ? We have been reduced to slavery ; and did bondsmen ever win where freemen lost ? Hope there is none for us out of Christ. Our only hope is David's (1 Sam. xvii. 45).

—Guthrie.

(4713.) If, in early life, when sin was comparatively weak and conscience was comparatively strong, we were so easily and so often overcome by temptation, what hope for us, when this order is reversed; when conscience has become weak, and sin grown strong? If we were no match for the cub, how shall we conquer the grown lion? If we had not strength to pull out the sapling, how are we to root up the tree? If it exceeded our utmost power to turn the stream near its mountain cradle, how shall we turn the river that, red, roaring, swollen, pours its flood on to the sea? If we could not arrest the stone on the brow of the hill, how shall we stop it when, gathering speed at every turn, and force at every bound, it rushes into the valley with resistless might? Sin gaining such power by time and habit, "If we have run with the footmen and they have wearied us, how shall we contend with horses?" Spirit of God! but for Thy gracious aids the attempt were hopeless.

—Guthrie.

(4714.) The heart is deceitful in regard to its powers of resisting temptation. In the halcyon days of youth and inexperience we think that we are proof against all the forms of allurements, and we listen with no pleasurable emotions to those who would warn us of danger. Experience and aged wisdom find it not easy to get and retain the ear of the young, while they portray the dangers of the youthful course, and warn against the alluring customs of the world. And the reason is plain. Those whom we would admonish have had no experience; and they suspect no danger. They confide in their own powers; they see before them a smooth ocean on which they expect to glide without danger. A gallant ship, with her sails all set, leaves the port. She is new, and her virgin sails have not before been fanned by the breeze. The gale springs up and gently swells all her canvas. Before her is the vast ocean—spread out as if to invite her. On her deck stands the young mariner fresh from his home, buoyant with hope, his glad eye looking out on the new scene as the ship dances from wave to wave, and his heart beats with joy. How chilling now, how cold, how incongruous is it, for the weather-beaten seaman—the man of many voyages—to come and tell of rocks, and quicksands, and whirlpools, and furious tempests! How incongruous to suggest that the seams may open, or the canvas be torn to ribbons, or that some unseen current may drift that beautiful vessel into unknown seas, where she may lie becalmed,

"Day after day, day after day,
With neither breath nor motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean!"

So we start on the voyage of life. We flatter ourselves that we are able to meet temptation. We confide in the strength of our principles. We trust to the sincerity of our own hearts. Guileless ourselves—I do not mean guileless in the sense that we have no propensities to evil, but guileless in the sense of sincere and confiding—we suspect no fraud in others. Suspicion is not the characteristic of youth. It is the unhappy work of experience; the influence that comes into our hearts, notwithstanding all our efforts to resist it, from long acquaintance with the insincerity of mankind. The world flatters us, and a thousand temptations, adapted with consummate skill to the young, allure us. Professed friends meet us on the way and assure us that there is no danger. The gay, the fashionable, the rich, the winning, the beautiful, the accomplished, invite us to tread with them the path of pleasure, and to doubt the suggestion of experience and of age. We feel confident of our own safety. We suppose we may tread securely a little farther. We see no danger near. We take another step still, and yet another, thinking that we are safe yet. We have tried our virtuous principles, and thus far they bear the trial. We could retreat if we would; we mean to retreat the moment that danger comes near. But who knows the power of temptation? Who knows when dangers shall rush upon us so that we cannot escape? There is a dividing line between safety and danger. Above thundering Niagara the river spreads out into a broad and tranquil basin. All is calm and the current flows gently on, and there even a light skiff may be guided in safety. You may glide nearer and nearer to the rapids, admiring the beauty of the shore, and looking on the ascending spray of the cataract, and listening to the roar of the distant waters, and be happy in the consciousness that you are safe. You may go a little further, and may have power still to ply the oar to reach the bank. But there is a point beyond which human power is vain, and where the mighty waters shall seize the quivering bark, and bear it on to swift destruction. So perishes many a young man by the power of temptation.

—Barnes, 1798–1870.

4. Because to expose ourselves to it is to tempt God to leave us.

(4715.) Thou temptest God to suffer thy locks to be cut, when thou art so bold to lay thy head in the lap of a temptation. —Gurnall, 1617–1679.

5. Because prevention is better than cure.

(4716.) He is a better physician that keeps diseases off us, than he that cures them being on us. Prevention is so much better than healing, because it saves the labour of being sick. Thou allowest not a surgeon unnecessarily to break thy head to try his skill and the virtue of his plaster.

—Adams, 1653.

6. Because if we expose ourselves to it, and are overcome by it, we are left without excuse.

(4717.) Christ has taught us to pray, "Lead us not into temptation." It is a folly for us to cast ourselves upon it; we draw hatred upon ourselves, and run headlong into dangers without necessity; we must make ourselves amends by repentance, otherwise God will not. If a man set his house on fire, he is liable to the laws; if it be fired by others, or by an ill accident, he is pitied and relieved.

—Manton, 1620–1667.

V. THINGS THAT EXPOSE US TO TEMPTATION.

1. Idleness.

(4718.) Notice the invention used by country people to catch wasps. They will put a little sweet liquor into a long and narrow-necked phial. The do-nothing wasp comes by, smells the sweet liquor, plunges in and is drowned. But the bee comes by, and if she does stop for a moment to smell, yet she enters not, because she has honey of her own to make ; she is too busy in the work of the commonwealth to indulge herself with the tempting sweets. Master Greenham, a Puritan divine, was once waited upon by a woman who was greatly tempted. Upon making inquiries into her way of life, he found she had little to do, and Greenham said, "That is the secret of your being so much tempted. Sister, if you are very busy, Satan may tempt you, but he will not easily prevail, and he will soon give up the attempt." Idle Christians are not tempted of the devil so much as they tempt the devil to tempt them. —Spurgeon.

2. Self-confidence.

(4719.) Many horses fall at the bottom of a hill because the driver thinks the danger past and the need to hold the reins with firm grip less pressing. So it is often with us when we are not specially tempted to overt sin, we are the more in danger through slothful ease. I think it was Ralph Erskine who said, "There is no devil so bad as no devil." The worst temptation that ever overtakes us, is, in some respects, preferable to our becoming carnally secure and neglecting to watch and pray.

"More the treacherous calm I dread Than tempests rolling overhead."

—Spurgeon.

VI. SMALL TEMPTATIONS.

1. Most numerous.

(4720.) As great temptations exceed in quality, so the lesser exceed in quantity, for which reason the victory over them may be comparable to that over the greatest. Wolves and bears are without doubt more dangerous than flies, yet the former neither give us so much trouble, nor exercise our patience so much as the latter. It is an easy thing to abstain from murder, but it is extremely difficult to restrain all the little sallies of passion, the occasions whereof are every moment presenting themselves.

—Francis de Sales.

2. Are most dangerous.

(4721.) As when Pompey could not prevail with a city to billet his army with them, he yet persuaded them to admit a few weak, maimed soldiers, but those soon recovered their strength, and opened the gates to the whole army. And thus it is that the devil courts us only to lodge some small sins, a sin of infirmity or two, which being admitted, they soon gather strength and sinews, and so subdue us. How many have set up a trade in swearing with common interlocutory oaths, as "Faith" and "Truth"? How many have begun thieving with pins and pence? How many drunkenness with one cup more than enough? How many lusts with a glance of the eye? And yet none of them ever dreamt they should be prostituted to those prodigious extremities they afterwards found themselves almost irrecoverably engulfed in. —Prie, 1646.

(4722.) The giving way to a small sin does marvellously prepare and dispose a man for a greater; by giving way to one little vice after another, the strongest resolutions may be broken. For though it be not to be snapped in sunder at once, yet by this means it is untwisted by degrees, and then it is easy to break it one thread after another. —Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4723.) There is no such thing as being wicked to a measure, or playing the knave to a certain degree, and no further. This being (as the comedian says) "dare operam, ut cum ratione insanias."

And therefore he who ventures upon any unlawful or suspicious practice, or supposed advantage, on such terms, is like a man who goes into the water for his pleasure of refreshment: his design (to be sure) is to divert, not to destroy himself, and accordingly with great caution he enters in step by step; but the rapid stream presently draws him in, carries him away, and hurries him down violently, and so the poor man, with all his heart and caution, is drowned. He thought to have been too wise and skilful for the stream, but the stream proved too strong for him.

In the concerns of the soul, as well as of the body, it is a dangerous thing for a man to venture beyond his depth. —South, 1633-1716.

(4724.) The temptation is, to a religious or respectable man, the most dangerous which solicits him to the doing of some little thing. Dr. A. Clarke had a very attentive hearer, who was often much affected by the Word, but who never found peace in believing. At last he turned ill, and after many interviews Dr. Clarke said, "Sir, it is not often that God deals thus with a soul so deeply humbled as yours, and so earnestly seeking redemption through the blood of His Son. There must be a cause for this." The gentleman raised himself in bed, and fixing his eyes on the minister, told how, years ago, taking his voyage to England, he saw some merchants of the place give the captain a bag of dollars to carry to a correspondent. He marked the captain's carelessness in leaving it rolling on the locker day after day, and for the purpose of frightening him, he hid it. No inquiry was made, and on arriving at their destination, the merchant still retained it, till it should be missed. At last the parties to whom it was consigned inquired for it, and an angry correspondence commenced; hearing of which the gentleman got frightened, and resolved to keep his secret. The captain was thrown into prison, and died. "Guilt," added the dying man, "had by this time hardened my mind. I strove to be happy by stifling my conscience with the cares and amusements of the world—but in vain. I at last heard you preach; and then it was that the voice of God broke in on my conscience, and reasoned with me of righteousness and of judgment to come. Hell got hold upon my spirit! I have prayed, I have deplored, I have agonised at the throne of mercy, for the sake of Christ, for pardon; but God is deaf to prayer, and casts out my petition; there is no mercy for me; I must go down into the grave unpardoned, unsaved." The captain's widow was still alive, and to her and her children Dr. Clarke was the medium of paying over the sum, with compound interest, obtaining an acknowledgment which he kept till his dying day; and soon after, the conscience-stricken penitent died in peace, having obtained the hope of pardon. But the incident illustrates the subtlety of Satan. The man was respectable, and had it been put to him, "Are you capable of stealing? Do you think you could commit a murder? Are you one that could allow an innocent man to languish in prison for your crime, and go down to the grave covered with infamy, for a fault which, not he, but you committed?" "Is thy servant a dog?" would have been the indignant reply to the revolting suggestion. But for the fine-grained timber, for oaks and cedars, the devil has sharp wedges, as well as coarser instruments for ignoble natures; and here the edge was very fine; a trick—a practical jest—a frolic—but a frolic which, like many fools' firebrands, ended in a sad conflagration; in theft and murder, in orphanage and widowhood, in the ruin of a reputation, and in the misery and remorse of the perpetrator.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(4725.) If the devil comes to my door with his horns visible, I will never let him in; but if he comes with his hat on as a respectable gentleman, he is at once admitted. The metaphor may be very quaint, but it is quite true. Many a man has taken in an evil thing because it has been varnished and glossed over, and not apparently an evil, and he has thought in his heart there is not much harm in it; so he has let in the little thing, and it has been like the breaking forth of water,—the first drop has brought after it a torrent. The beginning has been but the beginning of a fearful end.

—Spurgeon.

2. Are sufficient to overthrow most of us.

(4726.) There be some that will say they were never tempted with kingdoms. It may well be, for it needs not when less will serve. It was Christ only who was thus tempted; in Him lay an heroic mind that could not be allured with small matters. But with us it is nothing so, for we esteem far more basely of ourselves. We set our wares at a very easy price; he may buy us even dagger-cheap, as we say. He need never carry us so high as the mount. The pinnacle is high enough; yea, the lowest steeple in all the town would serve the turn. Or let him but carry us to the leads and gutters of our own houses, nay, let us but stand in our windows or our doors, if he will give us but so much as we can there see, he will tempt us thoroughly; we will accept it and thank him too. He shall not need to come to us with kingdoms. If he would come to us with thirty pieces, I am afraid many of us would play Judas. Nay, less than so much would buy a great sort, even "handfuls of barley and pieces of bread" (Ezekiel xiii. 19). Yea, some will not stick to buy and sell the poor for a pair of shoes, as Amos speaketh. . . . A matter of half-a-crown, or ten groats, a pair of shoes, or some such trifle, will bring us on our knees to the devil.

—Sanderson, 1587-1662.

VII. ITS RELATION TO MORAL RESPONSIBILITY.

1. It is no excuse for sin.

(4727.) We may have leaders into temptation, but it is our fault if we follow them. Nay, to come closer home, do not we tempt ourselves? Satan is not the sole cause of evil. The fowler sets his glass, spreads his net, whistles like the bird; yet cannot all this make the fowl come into his net whether she will or no. If we had not pliable ears and flexible affections, the syrens might sing in vain.

—Adams, 1653.

(4728.) There is a secret disposition in the heart of all, to all sin; temptation doth not fall on us as a ball of fire on ice or snow, but as a spark on tinder, or lightning on a thatched roof, which presently is on a flame. Hence in Scripture, though tempted by Satan, yet the sin is charged on us, "Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lusts, and enticed." Mark! 'tis Satan tempts, but our own lust draws us. The fowler lays the shrap, but the bird's own desire betrays it into the net.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4729.) It is useless for the sinner to allege that he is swept away by temptation: "he conceiveth mischief, and he bringeth forth falsehood;" and if he is swept away, it is as the suicide who repairs to the river, stands on its brink, and, leaping in, is swept off to his watery grave.

—Guthrie.

2. Even this invalid plea of "temptation" is often falsely urged.

(4730.) While I do not deny the influence and agency of evil spirits, I believe that unquestionably Satan is charged with a vast deal of mischief of which he knows nothing, and has need to know nothing. Men usually exempt from the agency of Satan those who probably are the chief objects of his assaults; and they charge Satan with tempting those whom he never would squander any time upon. If a man is a notorious drunkard, and commits a crime, it is said that the devil tempted him. What use was there of the devil's tempting him? How superfluous is temptation under such circumstances! When a man is bent, by the whole stress of his nature, to do wickedly, do you suppose that Satan will take the trouble to work upon him? Time is too precious on his hands. Some men are monstrous liars, and they plead that Satan tempts them to lie. They do not need any temptation to lie. If the wood be green, we use the bellows; but if the wood be dry and inflammable, a spark ignites it, and a man would be foolish indeed that should use a bellows to blow it then. If a man wants to sin, and has the habit of sinning, and loves sin, and will sin, and will not be hindered from sinning, do not say that the devil tempted him.

—Becher.

VIII. HOW IT IS TO BE RESISTED.

1. Promptly.

(4731.) We are most carefully to withstand Satan's temptations when they are first suggested, and to give him the repulse as soon as we perceive that he is but beginning to make an entrance.

For this gliding serpent, if he can but thrust in his head, will easily make room for his whole body: and therefore we must nip and bruise him in the head, and use his temptations like the serpent's brood, which if men desire to kill, they do not tread upon their tails, for so they would turn again and sting them, but upon their heads, and then they have no power to hurt them. So we are not fondly to think that we can without hurt vanquish Satan's temptations in the end if we have long entertained them: for unless they be nipped in the head, and withstood in the beginning, they will mortally poison us with the sting of sin.

For as thieves coming to break into a house, if they can but find room for the point of their wrench to enter, will easily by turning and winding about the vice make the doors, though very strong, fly open and give them entrance; so if this cunning thief Satan can find any entrance for his first temptations, so as we can be content to think upon them, and revolve them in our minds with any liking, he will easily burst open the gates of our souls, and entering further will rob us of all God's graces. Let us therefore "give no place to the devil."

As wise citizens, being besieged, do not let their enemies scale the walls and enter the town, with a purpose then to repel and beat them back again; but they withstand them as soon as they give the first assault, and keep them, if they can, from approaching near their walls with sconces and bulwarks; so we are not to suffer Satan our enemy, and the troops of his temptations to enter into our hearts, but to give them the repulse at their first approaching, lest it be too late afterwards when they have surprised and wounded us with sin.

—Downname, 1642.

(4732.) As often as a man finds his corruption renewing its assaults, let him set upon it with a renewed opposition. As soon as that stirs let him strike, at no hand suffering it to get ground of him; for every motion of it not resisted gives it an advance. And we know that, after it has made some progress, it is then harder to be subdued than at the first repulsed. When an enemy is but rising, it is easy to knock him to the ground again, but when he is up, and stands upon his legs, he is not then so easily thrown down. It is less difficult to hinder and prevent, than to stop and restrain, the course of sin.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4733.) Stand in awe, dear brethren, of many things, but of nothing stand more in awe than of your own selves, and of the dread potentialities of evil no less than of good which you bear about with you. Believe me, there is no smallest spark from Satan's stithy, which if duly fanned, or even if left unquenched and not trodden out, might not increase into a flame, which should set on fire in you the whole course of nature; even as in this material world there is in each tiniest spark a possible conflagration, such as should wrap whole forests or cities in a flame. Resist evil at the beginning. Then it is weak and you are strong; but after a little allowance the conditions will be reversed, and you will be weak and it strong. Blessed is he who taketh these little ones of Babylon, and dasheth them against the stones of God's law. Stand in awe, I would say again, of your own selves. He knows very little of himself who does not know that, as there is a possible heaven, so there is a possible hell within him. In the passing thought of impurity there is that which, being admitted, indulged, cherished, followed up whither it seeks to lead, would mould us at last into the hideous likeness of a Tiberius or a Louis XV. In the smallest act, word, or thought of genuine malice, there is shut up a whole world of cruelty, of intensest delight in the suffering of others, such as a Domitian or an Eccellino never surpassed.

—Trench.

(4734.) That memorable fire which two centuries ago laid nearly one-half of this city in ashes, which defied for days and days the efforts of thousands of men, there was no doubt a moment when a pitcher of water in the hands of a little child might have quenched it. So, too, the sin which has now grown to such a fearful mastery of a man that it is the tyrant of his life; it was once but a wandering temptation, a vague floating suggestion to evil, against which if he had resolutely shut the door of his heart when it first presented itself for admission, he might perhaps never have heard of it again.

—Trench.

(4735.) An enemy who desired to destroy you by your own deed, would not lead you straight to a yawning precipice, and bid you cast yourself down. He would rather lead you along a flowery winding path, until you should insensibly be drawn into a spot which would give way beneath you. Enticements to moral evil will generally take that form. You will not be persuaded all at once to plunge into deeds of darkness, knowing them to be such. Few young men who have enjoyed a religious education come to a sudden stand, and at once turn their back upon God and godliness. Most of those who do fall, diverge at first by imperceptible degrees from the path of righteousness. When it is intended, by a line of rails, to conduct a train off the main trunk, and turn it aside in another direction, the branch line at first runs parallel with the trunk. It goes alongside for a space in the same direction; but when it has thus got fairly off, then it turns more rapidly round, and bounds away at right angles to its former course. As engineers avoid the physical, so the tempters avoid the moral difficulty. An abrupt turn is not attempted in either case. The object is far more surely attained by a gently graduated divergence. The importance of the ancient rule, Obsta principis (resist the beginnings), can never be overrated.

—Arnol.

(4736.) Temptation is resistible at one time; it is almost irresistible at another. Temptation when it first begins to act upon us may be overcome, I think, I may say, may be easily overcome. And he who, when an evil desire rises within him, flies at once to the throne of grace, who cries out to God to help him, will see his temptation fading away. But when we yield to the temptation, which so easily we might have resisted at first, then it gathers strength, and with each new indulgence its demands are more imperious, its fascinations more seductive, and its thrall more complete; until a day comes when a man awakens up to a new intention, and finds that his power is gone, that he cannot galvanise into vigour a long unused moral organ, that he sees his danger, that he sees the quick-coming ruin, but it is too late—he must, he must; and like a wave that lifts itself wildly over a foundering ship, so does temptation triumph.

W. Page-Roberts.

2. Unhesitatingly.

(4737.) The whole of this probation for the future often depends on some single action that shall determine the character, and that shall send an influence ever onward. Everything seems to be concentrated on a single point. A right or a wrong decision then settles everything. The moment when in the battle at Waterloo the Duke of Wellington could say, "This will do," decided the fate of the battle and of kingdoms. A wrong movement just at that point might have changed the conditions of the world for centuries. In every man's life there are such periods; and probably in the lives of most men their future course is more certainly determined by one such far-reaching and central decision, than by many actions in other circumstances. They are those moments when honour, wealth, usefulness, health, and salvation seem all to depend on a single resolution. It seems to be a small matter for a young man to deliberate whether he shall or shall not partake of a social glass of intoxicating drink with a friend ; and yet on the result of such a deliberation has depended the whole career of many a man. So it may seem a small matter for him to visit a gambling-room, or a theatre once ; or to form a friendship with some well-introduced and genteel-looking stranger ; and yet the whole of his future destiny may depend on the decision of that moment. The reason is this : it is the crisis of the life. It settles a principle. It determines whether he will listen to the voice of reason and conscience ; to parental counsel and to God, or whether he is to be under the control of passion and appetite. Everything is concentrated on that point—like one of Napoleon's movements at the bridge of Lodi, or at Austerlitz. If that one point is carried, the whole field may soon be won. In the decision which a young man often makes at that point, there is such a breach made on his virtuous principles ; there is such an array of temptations pouring into the breach—like an army pouring into a city where a breach is made in a wall—that henceforward there is almost no resistance, and the citadel is taken. Of all those who have become the victims of intemperance, it would be found, probably, that the mischief was done at some such decisive moment in their lives ; and of those who have lived honoured and useful lives, it might also be found that their whole career was determined by some single act of decided resistance to temptation.

—Barnes, 1798–1870.

(4738.) Decision of character and promptitude of action, qualities so important on board ship in a storm, in the manoeuvring of troops in battle, are indispensable to the Christian life—both to our getting through the “strait gate,” and our getting on in the “narrow way.” How often, for example, does it happen that to hesitate even for one moment between resisting and yielding to temptation is to fall ! The battle is lost in that moment of vacillation. In such cases, our safety lies in coming to an immediate decision ; in promptly resolving to dally with the tempter not an instant, to flee if we can, and if we cannot flee to fight—so resisting the devil that if we cannot flee from him, he shall flee from us, and leave us, as when he spread out his wings and, vanquished at all points, relieved our Lord of his hateful presence.

—Guthrie.

3. Uncompromisingly.

(4739.) As he that casts himself from a steep cliff does not break his neck till he touch the ground, but yet he is truly said to have killed himself when he threw himself towards the ground ; so in those preparations and invitations to sin we perish, before we perish, before we commit the act, the sin itself,—we perished then, when we opened ourselves to the danger of the sin.

—Donne, 1573–1631.

(4740.) The trees of the forest held a solemn parliament, wherein they consulted of the innumerable wrongs which the axe had done them ; they therefore made an act that no tree should hereafter lend the axe an helve, on pain of being cut down. The axe travels up and down the forest, begs wood of the cedar, oak, ash, elm, even of the poplar ; not one would lend him a chip. At last he desired so much as would serve him to cut down the briars and bushes, alleging that such shrubs as they did but suck away the juice of the ground and hinder the growth and obscure the glory of the fair and goodly trees. Hereon they were all content to afford him so much ; he pretends a thorough reformation, but behold a sad deformation ; for when he had got his helve, down went cedar, oak, ash, elm, and all that did but stand in his way. Such are the subtle reaches of sin and sinful men. Give but a little advantage on their fair promises to remove the troubles of the body, and they will cut down the soul also. Therefore obsta principii, crush the cockatrice in the egg, refuse all iniquity at the first, in what extenuation of quantity or colour of quality soever it be offered ; for if Satan cannot get leave for his whole army of lusts, yet he will beg hard for his weak ones—his little ones—sins of weakness and infirmity, which, if once admitted, will soon unbolt the doors of the heart, let in all the rest of their company, and so make a surprisal of the soul and endanger it to all eternity.

—Adams, 1653.

(4741.) Satan would seem to be mannerly and reasonable ; making as if he would be content with one-half of the heart, whereas God challengeth all or none : as, indeed, He hath most reason to claim all that made all. But this is nothing but a crafty fetch of Satan ; for he knows that if he have any part, God will have none : so the whole falleth to his share alone.

My heart, when it is both whole and at the best, is but a strait and unworthy lodging for God. If it were bigger and better, I would reserve it all for Him. Satan may look in at my doors by a temptation,—but he shall not have so much as one chamber-room set apart for him to sojourn in.

—Hall, 1574–1656.

(4742.) If you yield to Satan in the least, he will carry you further and further, till he has left you under a stupefied or terrified conscience : stupefied, till thou hast lost all thy tenderness. A stone at the top of a hill, when it begins to roll down, ceases not till it comes to the bottom. Thou thinkest it is but yielding a little, and so by degrees art carried on, till thou hast sinned away all thy profession, and all principles of conscience, by the secret witchery of his temptations.

—Manton, 1620–1667.

(4743.) Take heed that you do not yield to anything, that you may be rid of ; that you do not yield to any part of the temptation, that you may be delivered from. It is more easy to keep the enemy out of the town, than to get him out when he is come into it. It is an easy thing to keep a stone on the top of an hill while it lies there ; but when it once begins to roll down, it is a hard thing to stay it, and you cannot say how far it shall go. How many are there that say when they are tempted, “I will yield but once, I will yield but a little, and I will never yield again, this is the last time !” Oh ! but your once yielding, and your yielding but a little, engages your heart to the whole work. You should watch and pray against temptation. “Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.” He does not say, Watch and pray, that you be not tempted ; but, “Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation.” It is one thing for temptation to knock at the door, and another thing to come in :

when temptation enters you, you enter into temptation ; take heed of that.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4744.) As soldiers by cowardly leaving some outwork they are set to defend, give place to their enemy who enters the same, and from thence doth more easily shoot into the city than he could before. Thus yielding in one temptation, we let the devil into our trench, and give him a fair advantage to do us the more mischief. The angry man, while he is raging and raving, thinks, may be, no more but to ease his passion by disgorging it in some bitter keen words ; but, alas ! while his fury and wrath is sallying out at the portal of his lips, the devil, finding the door open, enters and hurries him further than he dreamt of. We have not to do with a Hannibal, who, though a great swordsman, yet wanted the art of following and improving the advantages his victories gave him, but with a cunning devil, that will easily lose no ground he gets ; our best way, therefore, is to give him no hand-hold.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4745.) When Satan comes to tempt, he is modest, and asks but a little ; he knows he may get that at many times which he should be denied if he asked all at once. A few are let into a city, when an army coming in a body would be shut out ; and therefore that he may beget no suspicion, he presents, may be, a few general propositions, which do not discover the depth of this plot ; these, like scouts, go before, while his whole body lies hid, as it were, in some swamp at hand. Thus he wriggled into Eve's bosom, whom he doth not at first dash bid take and eat ; no, he is more mannerly than so ; this would have been so hideous, that as the fish with some sudden noise, by a stone cast into the river, is scared from the bait, so would she have been affrighted from holding parley with such a one ; no, he propounds a question which shall make way for this, "Hath God said?" "Art not mistaken? Could this be His meaning whose bounty lets thee eat of the rest, to deny thee the best of all?" Thus he digs about, and loosens the roots of her faith, and then the tree falls the easier the next gust of temptation. This is a dangerous policy indeed. Many have yielded to go a mile with Satan, that never intended to go two ; but when once on the way, have been allured further and further, till at last they know not how to leave his company. Thus Satan leads poor creatures down into the depths of sin by winding stairs, that let them not see the bottom whither they are going. First, he presents an object that occasions some thoughts, these set fire on the affections, and these fume up into the brain, and cloud the understanding, which being thus disabled, now Satan dares a little more declare himself, and boldly solicits the creature to that it would even now have denied. Many who at this day lie in open profaneness, never thought they should have rolled so far from their profession, but Satan beguiled them, poor souls, with their modest beginnings. O Christians, give not place to Satan, no, not an inch in his first motions ; he that is a beggar, and a modest one without doors, will command the house if let in ! Yield at first, and thou givest away thy strength to resist him in the rest ; when the hem is worn, the whole garment will ravel out, if that be not mended by timely repentance.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4746.) Every inclination to sin, every compliance with temptation, is a going down the hill. While we keep our standing we may command ourselves ; but if we once put ourselves into violent motion downward, we cannot stop when we please.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

4. Hopefully.

(4747.) The Christian's safety lies in resisting. All the armour here provided is to defend the Christian fighting, none to secure him flying. Stand, and the day is ours ; fly or yield, and all is lost. Great captains, to make their soldiers more resolute, do sometimes cut off all hope of a safe retreat to them that run away. Thus the Norman Conqueror, as soon as his men were set on English shore, sent away his ships in their sight, that they might resolve to fight or die. God takes away all thought of safety to the coward. Not a piece to be found for the back in all God's armoury. Stand, and the bullets light all on your armour ; fly, and they enter into your hearts. 'Tis a terrible place (Heb. x. 38) : "The just shall live by faith, but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

IX. HOW IT IS TO BE OVERCOME.

1. By being forearmed.

(4748.) "The man that endureth temptation" is the man who has learnt and is enabled to bear up under it ; or, as we sometimes express ourselves, he will weather it. He expects it ; and, when it comes on him, he is not surprised. He knows that it is impossible to give place to it, in any degree with safety ; he resolves, therefore, by the help of God, to make a stand ; and though the current may run strong against him, yet he certainly knows that he must either go against the current, or be carried away, and perish for ever.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(4749.) After we have got the better of the tempter, we must do as the mariners in a calm, mend our tackling, as not knowing how soon another storm may come.

—Watson, 1676.

(4750.) Though no combatant be near, though the deep be calm and clear, a wary warrior is ever on his guard, the wary pilot is never asleep : even in peace and in calm he prepares his arms, trims his sail, ready, whatever chance presents itself, to meet the battle or the gale.

—Metastasio.

(4751.) I would urge, as another branch of Christian prudence in the resisting of evil, that we do not wait till the temptation comes, and then begin our preparations against it. Arm yourself against it beforehand. What were he for a soldier who, only when the signal of battle had been already given, and when he stood face to face with his foe, began to rivet the joints of his armour, and to put a sharper edge on his sword? Or how would that nation fare that should be providing for the first time fleets and armies and arsenals, when it was already committed to deadly strife with another people as mighty as itself? The conflict is a time for using weapons, not for preparing them. And who can say how suddenly, how fiercely, from what unlooked-for side, a temptation may assail him? How, think you, would it have fared with Joseph, if, cast suddenly as he was into the fiery furnace of temptation, his wanton mistress seeking to entice him to sin, had he not already, and by many prayers going before, sought and obtained the gift and grace of chastity from God? Do we not feel sure, if he had needed then for the first time to seek His grace, he would not have sought, he would not have obtained it, but have been in that fierce furnace scorched and utterly consumed? Say then often to yourselves, I am in a world full of temptation, the fiery darts of the wicked one are flying thick and fast about me; if one lights not on my heart to-day, it will light to-morrow or the next day; my wisdom, my safety, is to seek betimes that grace which sooner or later I must need. It will be too late then first to seek it when the need of it has actually arrived. Neither content yourself with saying this, but actually seek it, and store it against the evil time which is coming, that you may be able to stand in that evil time, and having done all, to stand.

—Trench.

2. By turning our attention to other objects.

(4752.) When a temptation arises, do not always stand to answer it in the kind; but sometimes turn your mind and thoughts off it to another object. It is in our deliverance from a temptation, as in our comforts under an affliction: a man hath a great affliction upon him, possibly the death of some friend that is near and dear unto him, and you go to comfort him, and in comforting him, you fall a speaking of his friend departed: whereas the way to comfort him, is not to speak of the person departed, but fall into conference about some other good thing different: and by that time his heart is settled upon some other thing, then you may come back again and speak of the friend departed without grieving of him; but otherwise, even in your comfort you fetch out tears. And so I say in regard of temptation: the way to avoid temptation is not always to apply a salve directly pertinent to the temptation; but turn off your mind and your thoughts to some other good object, and by that time your mind is settled upon other objects, you will be easily able to meet with the temptation.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

3. By considering whether we are able to bear the burden of sin.

(4753.) Porters, when they are called to carry a burthen on their shoulders, first look diligently upon it, then they poise and lift it up, to try whether they shall have strength to carry it when it is once on their backs; and thus should every man do that, for a little pleasure, hath enthrall'd himself to carry the burthen of sin. He should first prove and assay what a weight sin is, what a burthen the punishment of sin is, which he must bear or sink under it; and by this means he shall soon find himself at a loss, "For a wounded spirit who can bear!"

—Serdonius de Granatensis.

4. By regarding its ultimate issues.

(4754.) Satan gives Adam an apple, and takes away Paradise. Therefore in all temptations let us consider not what he offers, but what we shall lose.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4755.) When thou seest the fisher baiting his hook, thou mayest think of the policy of the devil, who sugars over his poisoned hooks with seeming profit and pleasures. Eve's apple was candied with Divine knowledge; "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil."

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4756.) When you maturely look into the nature and design of temptations, you will find the most taking to be but as so many cheats, which, under the visor of some delight or profit, would rob you of your integrity, and betray you to enmity both with God and yourself. And therefore, when you entertain any temptation to sin, you do as wisely as he who takes those into his house whom he knows are come on purpose to spoil him of what he esteems most precious.

—Dr. Lancelot Addison, 1632-1703.

(4757.) Let not that man who would not be fooled in so vast an interest as his salvation, fix his eye either upon the outside or the beginning of a temptation. Ever the beginning of a tragedy is pleasant, but the close of it is not so. Let him not judge of what the tempter intends by what he offers; for be it what it will, look it never so gay or great, can any one, not quite abandoned by common sense, imagine that his mortal, avowed enemy is at all concerned for his pleasure, profit, or preferment? Assuredly nothing less, in all this he is but setting his trap; and no man sets a trap, but he baits it too. He hates most implacably while he offers most plausibly. His drift in every one of his temptations is to separate between the soul and its chief good for ever, and to plunge it into a state of misery both intolerable and unchangeable.

—South, 1633-1716.

5. By self-examination.

(4758.) The special trials and temptations of men call for the exercise of their thoughts in a peculiar manner with respect unto them. If a man have a bodily disease, pain, or distemper, it will cause him to think much of it whether he will or no—at least, if he be wise he will do so; nor will he always be complaining of the smart, but he will inquire into the causes, and seek their removal.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

6. By humility.

(4759.) Want of humiliation many times brings men to desperate stands, and sometimes to untimely deaths. In time of war, when the great cannon fly off, the only way to avoid them is to lie down in a furrow, and so the bullets fly over. So in all temptations of Satan lie low, and be contented to be at God's disposing, and all these fiery temptations shall not be able to hurt you.

—Ambrose, 1664.

7. By instant recourse to the throne of grace.

(4760.) Take heed that you do not stand poring upon your temptations, whatsoever your temptations be. When the children of Israel were stung by the serpents in the wilderness, they did not stand poring upon the arm that was stung, crying out, "Oh, my arm! oh, how it is swelled!" but they looked up upon the brazen serpent. If they had look upon their arm, and stood poring upon that, they had never been cured. So now, if in case we be tempted, the way is not to stand poring upon the temptation, but to look off unto Christ. Set the Lord always before your eyes, His all-sufficiency, His fulness, His grace, His goodness: "I have set the Lord always before me, at my right hand," saith David, "and therefore I shall not fall;" so do you.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4761.) Think not to comfort or relieve yourself in temptation with mere philosophical or moral reasons. For the disease of temptation is stronger than that physic. Temptations answered by reason will return again; but temptations dipt in the blood of Christ will return no more, or not with such violence and success. Ye see how it is with a candle that is blown out, it is easily lighted again; but if you put it into water, then it is more hard to light. So temptations blown out with resolutions and moral reasons do easily return; but quenched in Christ's blood do not so. Christ is an universal good; reason can hold forth but a particular good. Now there is that in an universal good which will answer unto all ills; but as for moral reasons, the tempter will say to them, "Christ we know, and the Promise we know, but who are ye?"

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4762.) As soon as you perceive yourself tempted, follow the example of children, when they see a wolf or a bear in the country; for presently they run into the arms of their father or mother, or at least they call out to them for help or assistance. It is the remedy which our Lord has taught (Matt. xvi. 41). Pray, lest you enter into temptation.

—Francis de Sales.

8. By fervent prayer.

(4763.) Let a man be but as earnest in praying against a temptation as the tempter is in pressing it, and he needs not proceed by a surer measure. He who prays against it coldly and indifferently, gives too shrewd a sign that he neither fears nor hates it; for coldness is, and always will be, a symptom of deadness, especially in prayer, where life and heat are the same thing.

The prayers of the saint are set forth in Scripture at much another rate, not only by calls and cries, cries even to a roaring and vociferation (Ps. xxxviii. 8); and sometimes by "strong cries with tears" (Heb. v. 7); sometimes again by "groanings not to be uttered" (Rom. viii. 26); things too big for vent, too high for expression. In fine, he who prays against his spiritual enemy as he ought to do, is like a man fighting against him upon his knees; and he who fights so, by the very posture of his fighting shows that he neither will nor can run away.

Lip-devotion will not serve the turn: it undervalues the very thing it prays for. It is indeed the begging of a denial, and shall certainly be answered in what it begs; but he who truly and sensibly knows the invaluable happiness of being delivered from temptation, and the unspeakable misery of sinking under it, will pray against it, as a man ready to starve would beg for bread, or a man sentenced to die would entreat for life. Every period, every word, every tittle of such a prayer is all spirit and life, flame and ecstasy; it shoots from one heart into another, from the heart of him who utters to the heart of him who hears it.

And then well may that powerful thing vanquish the tempter, which binds the hands of justice, and opens the hands of mercy, and, in a word, overcomes and prevails over Omnipotence itself; for, "Let Me go," says God to Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 26); and, "Let Me alone," says God to Moses (Exodus xxxii. 10). One would think that there was a kind of trial of strength between the Almighty and them; but whatsoever it was, it shows that there was and is something in prayer which He, who made heaven and earth, neither could nor can resist; and if this be that holy violence which heaven itself (as has been shown) cannot stand out against, no wonder if all the powers of hell must fall before it!

—South, 1633-1716.

9. By exercising faith in God.

(4764.) If you would not be discouraged under your temptations, take heed that when you are in temptation you do not expect too much from any one means of help. Over-expectation breeds disappointment; disappointment breeds discouragement. It is not the sadness of your condition, but disappointment that causes discouragement. If a man be in debt, and under an arrest, so long as he thinks he has friends to bail him, or some goods and commodities to make sale of, he is not discouraged; but if he expect much from his friends, and all fail him, and his goods be seized, that he cannot have help to come in at that door, nor from any other means which he expected from, then he is quite discouraged. If a man be in the water, wherein there is danger of drowning, so long as he can get hold of something that will bear him up, he is not discouraged; but if he lay hold of some tuft of grass on the bank-side, and that breaks, he falls back again and is more plunged into the water, and if he be not scared out of all thoughts, he is more discouraged than ever. So here in temptation: we are as in the water, and in fear of drowning, crying out, "We sink, we sink!" Then we fly to some tuft of grass, some means or other, and if that break or fail, then we are quite cast down. Would you not be dejected, therefore, or cast down in temptation? Take heed that you do not lay all your strength upon one tuft of grass,—this or that man's counsel, this or that particular means; but say rather, "I am now indeed in the deep, and in fear of drowning; I see no means of deliverance; but God's ways are in the deep, He has ways and means that I know not of; therefore though I use the means, yet I will not rest on them, and though all tufts of grass break, and anchors come home, yet I will wait upon God."

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4765.) It was the speech of Taulerus, one that Luther prizeth above all: says he, Though the mariners may make use of their oars in the time of calm, yet when a storm comes down the mariners leave all and fly to their anchor. So, though at other times we may make use of resolutions, and vows, and the like, yet when the storm of temptation comes down, nothing then but fly to the anchor of faith, nothing then like to casting of anchor into the vail.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

10. By quenching it in the blood of Christ.

(4766.) Whether you would overcome, or whether you would prevent temptation; whatever means you use, be sure of this, that you take your temptation and dip it in the blood of Christ. Take a candle that is lighted, and only blow out the candle, the candle is easily lighted again; but when the candle is out, take it and put it into the water, and then it is not so easily lighted again: so now a temptation comes, and you blow it out with a resolution, and you will not yield to it; alas! it is easily lighted again: but now take this candle, take this temptation, and come and dip it in the blood of Jesus Christ, and it will not be so easily lighted again; so you shall be able to prevent temptation for the time to come. Never rest alone in resolving, but, oh! take your temptation and dip it in the blood of Jesus Christ.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

X. CONSOLATIONS FOR THE TEMPTED.

1. Temptation is not sin.

(4767.) If a man finds weeds growing in his garden and naturally springing out of his own ground, he taketh much pains to weed them out; but if he seeth that they have no rooting there, and are only cast over the wall by some ill-willer, he careth not much for it, because he can with as small pains cast them out again as they took that cast them in. So, if we perceive that the weeds of temptation are rooted in our sinful nature, and spring from our corrupt flesh, we must take the more care and pains to weed them out; but if they be only injected by the malice of Satan, we are not to be so much moved therewith, but to cast them out of our minds and hearts, as often and as easily as he casts them in.

—Downname, 1644.

2. Temptations are specially experienced by God's children.

(4768.) The saints are passed, by the power of God, out of Satan's kingdom, and therefore he does spite them as not of his family; as dogs used to bark and bite, not those of the house they are in, but strangers.

—Bayne, 1618.

(4769.) As men cherish young plants at first, and fence them about with hedges and other things to keep them from hurt, but when they are grown, they remove these, and leave them to the wind and weather; so God besets His children first with props of inward comforts, but afterwards exposes them to storms and winds, because they are better able to bear it. Therefore let no man think himself the better because he is free from troubles. It is because God sees him not fit to bear greater.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4770.) The devil desires to winnow Peter, not Judas. The more faithful servants of God we be, the more doth Satan bruise us with the flail, or grate us with the fan.

The thief does not break into an empty cottage, but into some furnished house or full granary, where the fatness of the booty is a fitness to his desires. This unclean spirit finds no rest in an atheist, usurer, drunkard, swearer, &c. He knows a canker has overrun their consciences already; and that they are as sure as temptation can make them. No prince makes war with his own tractable subjects. What need he tempt them that tempt themselves? The fowler shoots at birds that be wild, not at doves and yard-fowls, tame, and in his own keeping.

—Adams, 1653.

(4771.) Temptations are rather hopeful evidences that thy estate is good, that thou art dear to God, and that it shall go well with thee for ever, than otherwise. God had but one Son without corruption, but He had none without temptation. Pirates make the fiercest assaults upon those vessels that are the most richly laden; so does Satan upon those souls that are most richly laden with the treasures of grace, with the riches of glory. When nothing will satisfy the soul, but a full departure out of Egypt, from the bondage and slavery of sin, and that the soul is firmly resolved upon a march for Canaan, then Satan, Pharaoh-like, will furiously pursue after the soul with horses and chariots, that is, with a whole army of temptations. Well, a tempted soul, when it is worst with him, may safely argue thus—"If God were not my friend, Satan would not be so much my enemy. If there were not something of God within me, Satan would never make such attempts to storm me. If the love of God were not set upon me, Satan would never shoot so many fiery darts to wound me. If the heart of God were not towards me, the hand of Satan would not be so strong against me." The jailor is quiet when his prisoner is in bolts; but if he be escaped, then he pursues him with hue and cry; you know how to apply it.

—Brooks, 1680.

(4772.) Those whom God intends to make choice instruments in His service, are first seasoned with strong temptations, as timber reserved for the strong beams of a building is first exposed to sun and wind, to make it more compact for its proper use.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(4773.) Satan doth not tempt God's children, because they have sin in them, but because they have grace in them. Had they no grace, the devil would not disturb them: where he keeps possession all is in peace (Luke xi. 21). His temptations are to rob the saints of their grace. A thief will not assault an empty house, but where he thinks there is treasure; a pirate will not set upon an empty ship, but one that is full fraught with spices and jewels; so the devil most assaults the people of God, because he thinks they have a rich treasure of grace in their hearts, and he would rob them of that. What makes so many cudgels be thrown at a tree, but because there is so much fruit hanging upon it? The devil throws his temptations at you, because he sees you have so much fruit of grace growing upon you. Though to be tempted is a trouble, yet to think why you are tempted is a comfort.

—Watson, 1696.

(4774.) Believers are soldiers: all soldiers, by their profession, are engaged to fight, if called upon, but who shall be called to sustain the hottest service, and be most frequently exposed upon the field of battle, depends upon the will of the general or king. Some of our soldiers are now upon hard service in America, while others are stationed round the palace, see the king's face daily, and have no dangers or hardships to encounter. These, however, are as liable to a call as the others; but if not called upon, they may enjoy with thankfulness the more easy post assigned them. Thus, the Captain of our salvation allots to His soldiers such stations as He thinks proper. He has a right to employ whom He will, and where He will. Some are comparatively at ease; they are not exposed to the fiercest onsets, but live near His presence: others are, to appearance, pressed above measure, beyond strength, so that they despair even of life; yet they are supported, and in the end made more than conquerors through Him that hath loved them. Long observation convinces me that the temptations which some endure are not chastisements brought upon them by unfaithfulness, or for anything remarkably wrong in their spirit or walk; I often rather consider that in this warfare, as in worldly wars, the post of danger and difficulty is the post of honour, and as such assigned to those whom he has favoured with a peculiar measure of His grace.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(4775.) If the temptations that beset and assail us do not occupy such a place in our thoughts and lives—for they give some men no trouble—that admits of an obvious but melancholy explanation. It is not that the man who is without regrets, anxieties, daily and hourly struggles, is a better man than he who has “fightings without and fears within.” It is not that he is holy, never tempted, or that he never yields to temptation. On the contrary, it is because he, unresisting, yields to it. What more pleasant and easy than the motion of a vessel that, gliding down the stream, is borne onwards to the cataract that shall hurl it to destruction? But bring the boat’s head round, and a struggle begins; peace is gone now; she trembles from stem to stern; and by her violent plunges, the waves that break over her bows, and, shaking every timber, threaten to engulf her, you know the power and presence of a current that had been quietly waiting her on to ruin.

Thus it is with man and temptations so soon as he is converted. No sooner is peace with God through Christ settled, than war is proclaimed, and the man involved in its arduous and life-long struggles. I have seen one that had grown grey in the army, and yet had never been under fire, or seen the serried bayonets glance but on parade. The Captain of our salvation has no such soldiers; His have given and suffered many wounds, and have all a sore fight for it. This conflict begins with conversion; and, if I might borrow an illustration from heathen fables, the infant Hercules has to strangle serpents in his cradle. So soon as a man is new-born, and turns his face heavenward, he has hell to confront and fight with. —Guthrie.

(4776.) Alas! there are some here who are not thus tempted, and who are, perhaps, congratulating themselves, and saying, “I was never tempted like that.” Ah! you are never emptied from vessel to vessel; you are settled on the lees; and why are you left to be so quiet? Is it not possible there is no spiritual life in you? You are dead in trespasses and sins. You are the devil’s own; therefore why should he hunt you? A man does not go forth with a lasso to hunt a horse that stands in his stable ready bridled and saddled for him to ride whenever he likes, but he goes forth to hunt the wild horse that is free. So the devil knows that he has you bridled and saddled, and that he can ride you whenever he pleases, and he does not need to hunt you; but he will hunt the free Christian upon whose back he cannot place a saddle, and into whose mouth he cannot fix a bit. I wish you were tempted. I wish there was something in you worth the devil’s efforts.

—Spurgeon.

8. Temptation is not necessarily hurtful.

(4777.) It is not the laying the bait hurts the fish, if the fish do not bite. —Watson, 1696.

(4778.) “My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience.” Temptation is that which puts to the test. Trials sent by God do this. A test is never employed for the purpose of injury. A weight is attached to a rope, not to break but to prove it. Pressure is applied to a boiler, not to burst it, but to certify its power of resistance. The testing process here confers no strength. But when a sailor has to navigate his ship under a heavy gale and in a difficult channel, or when a general has to fight against a superior force and on disadvantageous ground, skill and courage are not only tested but improved. The test has brought experience, and by practice is every faculty perfected. So, faith grows stronger by exercise, and patience by the enduring of sorrow. Thus alone it was that “God did tempt Abraham.”

—Newman Hall.

(4779.) It is when a child of God is fullest of grace; when he has been declared to be a “son,” even a “beloved son” of God; when he has made a public profession of Christianity, that he is most of all exposed to temptation. It seems strange at first thought that it should be so, but a little reflection dissipates the strangeness. Let me try to illustrate this. A toolmaker, I suppose, has finished an instrument, but it is not yet sent forth. Why? Because he has not “tested” it. Well! Enter we his workshop. You look in and observe the process. Your first impression is he is going to break it. But it is not so. Testing is not an injury. The perfect weapon comes out the stronger and receives the stamp that will carry it over the world. Even so the testing and trying of the Christian is not an injury. He who has formed the believer for Himself is not going to break or destroy the work, the beautiful work of His own hands. He is purifying, fitting, fashioning, polishing. Carry this along with you, my dear friends, and you will understand how it comes about that at the very moment of your being “full” of the Holy Ghost, at the very moment of your announced sonship, you are most violently assailed.

—Grosart.

4. Temptation develops and displays the spiritual excellencies of God’s people.

(4780.) Man is a ship: if God be the Pilot, sitting at the helm and steering the vessel, the voyage is safe and happy; but if concupiscence hold the stern, all runs to ruin. There are not more unruly mariners in a ship than members in the body: let the soul look to all, that must answer for all. St. Paul prays for his Thessalonians, that their whole spirit, and soul, and body may be sanctified. By spirit, conceive the understanding; by soul, the will and affections; by the body, itself with all the members. Turn man into a bark; and then the steersman is reason, or rather religion and grace; the sails are the affections, the helm is the will. The sails are apt to take every wind, and to carry the ship as that drives them. If the pilot let all alone,—sleep, revel, and never mind it,—there will be sudden destruction. But let him sit at the stern, fix his eye on the compass, and guide his hand by his eye, and the vessel by his hand; thus he shall even cheat the wind, and as it were compel it to blow for him. Such is the power of grace, that it makes the object of temptation become the matter of humiliation; and we prove the better even by that which would have made us worse.

—Adams, 1653.

(4781.) Temptation to faith is as fire to gold (1 Peter i. 7). The fire doth not only discover which is true gold, but makes the true gold more pure; it comes out maybe less in bulk and weight, (because severed from that soil and dross which embased it), but more in value and worth.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4782.) Satan by his temptations aims at the defiling of the Christian’s conscience, and disfigurling that beautiful face of God's image, which is engraven with holiness in the Christian's bosom; he is an unclean spirit himself, and would have them such, that he might glory in their shame; but God outwits him, for He turneth the temptations of Satan to sin to the purging them from sin; they are the black soap with which God washeth His saints white.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4783.) There may some perplexing temptations befall the mind of a believer, or some corruption take advantage to break loose for a season, it may be for a long season, which may gall the soul with its suggestions, and so trouble, disturb, and unquiet it, as that it shall not be able to make a right judgment of its grace and progress in holiness. A ship may be so tossed in a storm at sea as that the most skilful mariner may not be able to discern whether they make any way in their intended course and voyage, whilst they are carried on with success and speed. In such cases, grace in its exercise is principally engaged in an opposition to its enemy, which it has to conflict withal, and so its thriving other ways is not discernible.

If it should be inquired how we may discern when grace is exercised and thrives in opposition to corruptions and temptations, I say that, as great winds and storms sometimes contribute to the fruit-bearing of trees and plants, so corruptions and temptations to the fruitfulness of grace and holiness. The wind comes with violence on the tree, ruffles its boughs, it may be breaks some of them, beats off its buds, loosens and shakes its roots, and threatens to cast the whole to the ground; but by this means the earth is opened and loosed about it, and the tree gets its roots deeper into the earth, whereby it receives more and fresh nourishment, which renders it fruitful, though it bring not forth fruit visibly, it may be, till a good while after. In the assaults of temptations and corruptions the soul is woefully ruffled and disordered—its leaves of profession are much blasted, and its beginnings of fruit-bearing much broken and retarded; but, in the meantime, it secretly and invisibly casts out its roots of humility, self-abasement, and mourning, in a hidden and continual labouring of faith and love after that grace, whereby holiness really increases, and way made for future visible fruitfulness.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(4784.) Temptations, when we meet them at first, are as the lion that roared upon Samson; but if we overcome them, the next time we see them we shall find a nest of honey within them.

—Bunyan, 1628-1688.

(4785.) Godly temptations cause the increase of grace. Unus Christianus temptatus mille: "one tempted Christian (saith Luther) is worth a thousand." He grows more in grace: as the bellows increaseth the flame, so the bellows of a temptation doth increase the flame of grace.

—Watson, 1696.

(4786.) That is precious faith which, like the star, shines brightest in the darkest night. 'Tis good that our graces should be brought to a trial; thus we have comfort, and the Gospel honour.

—Watson, 1696.

(4787.) Yes! multitudinous temptations are, indeed, a great dignity, as helping to assimilate us to the image of Christ; and if we comport ourselves well under them, a great means of spiritual advancement. When a hard winter sets in, and the earth is covered with a mantle of snow, and each little knot and spray in the hedgerow is encrusted with icicles, vegetation seems to be killed, and every green thing blighted. But it is not so. The genial forces of the earth are driven inward and working deep in her bosom. The snow mantle is doing for her what the fur mantle does for the human frame,—concentrating and preserving the vital heat within. So it is in temptation: the time of temptation is a cheerless and dreary hour, when everything seems at a standstill, and the spiritual pulse can no longer be felt, it beats so faintly to the outward touch; but if the will is faithful and true, and the soul patient, the life is really concentrating itself, and rallying its forces within. The cheerless outward aspect is nothing: there are hidden agencies at work, which in due time shall bring out the full bloom and redolence of a spiritual spring. There have been moderate Christians, there have been shallow Christians, without very much temptation; but there never yet was a saintly Christian, never yet one who pressed to the higher summits of the spiritual life, never one whose banner bore the strange device, "Excelsior," who was not made the victim of manifold temptations.

—Goulburn.

(4788.) It is quite true that even from these temptations themselves we may derive good; that they, even with issues sorrowful for the time as these, may yet be to us sources of ultimate strength; that thus it may prove with us as with the oyster, which stops with a precious pearl the hole in the shell which was originally a disease; as with the broken limb, which, having been set, may be stronger than if it had never been broken. It may fare with us as islanders of the Southern Ocean fancy that it fares with them; counting, as they do, that the strength and valour of the warrior whom they have slain in battle passes into themselves, as their rightful inheritance; for so it proves indeed with the Christian man and the temptations which he conquers and slays; and this even though the victory may have been won not without hurts to himself, gotten in the conflict. The strength which lay in the temptation has shifted its seat, and passed over into the man who has overcome the temptation.

—Trench.

5. God sympathises with His tempted people.

(4789.) If God our Father pities His children under their temptations, and the more they are tempted by Satan, the more they are pitied by God, then have they no reason to be discouraged, whatever their temptations be. How is it with yourselves? If you had two children, one that is in your house with you at home, and another that is in Spain or Italy, abroad, exposed to great temptations, is not your pity most towards that child that is abroad, and exposed to most temptations? Your love may be expressed to him that is at home as much another way, but your pitying love is most to him that is abroad. As in the time of a storm, great rain or hail, if you have one child lying in your bosom, or sitting up on your knee; and another that is abroad in the open field; though your love, in one kind, may run out to him that is upon your knee, yet does not your pitying love run out more to him that is abroad in the open fields?

Thus it is with God : He has two sorts of children, some that are exposed to more temptations, and some that are exposed to less ; though His grace and love may run out more in one kind to them that are tempted, yet His pitying love runs out most to those that are most tempted. And upon this account you will find in Scripture, that when God saw any of His children were to go into any sad temptation, He did either immediately before, in, or after, more than ordinarily reveal Himself to them. The more you are tempted by Satan, the more you are pitied by God. Why, then, should you be discouraged, although your temptations be never so great?
—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4790.) What it was "to be tempted," our Saviour knew of old, by the sure, but sharp convictions of His own experience ; and therefore treats such as are tempted with all sympathising tenderness, that fellowship in suffering can produce in a mind infinitely merciful of itself ; as it is expressly affirmed : "For in that He Himself hath suffered, being tempted, He is able to succour those also who are tempted." To which we may add these words, "That He liveth for ever, to make intercession for us." And from both together we have all that comfort that a boundless compassion, supported by an infinite power and an endless duration, can afford.

And this is that invaluable advantage which we reap from having such an "High Priest, as can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." For as he who has broke a limb, having his choice of several chirurgeons equally skilful, would much rather choose one who had not only cured many others, but had also suffered the same disaster, and felt the same pain and anguish of a broken limb himself : for that from such a hand he might rationally expect not only a sound, but a gentle cure ; a cure in which compassion should combine with skill, and make one ingredient in every application.

In like manner, it is not so much the greatness, the power, and majesty of our Intercessor that should animate persons under a temptation to address Him, as His "having drank of the same cup," and passed through the same furnace Himself. From which one endearing consideration it is, that the prayers of such persons find stronger arguments to enforce them in the breast of Him who hears, than they can drive from the heart of him who makes them. For as it is commonly, and perhaps very truly, said, that none knows the heart of a father but he who has been a father ; so none knows what it is to be pursued and worried with the restless buffets of an impure spirit, but he who has endured the same terrible conflict himself. Christ has endured it, and His experience moves His compassion, and His compassion engages His prayers : and where He has promised us His prayers, we may promise ourselves the success.
—South, 1633-1716.

6. Go! succours His tempted people.

(4791.) Thou art weak ? thy God is strong. Dost thou not see the feeble child that finds he cannot go alone, how fast he clings to the hand of his mother, more trusting to her help than to his own strength ? Do thou so to thy God ; and say, with the blessed Psalmist, "Hold up my goings in Thy paths, that my footsteps slip not." "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe. Uphold me according to Thy word, that I may live ; and let me not be ashamed of my hope." Peter was a bold man, that durst step forth and set his foot upon the liquid face of the waters : but he that ventured to walk there upon the strength of his faith, when he felt the stiff wind and saw the great billow, began to sink in his weakness ; but no sooner had Jesus stretched forth His hand and caught him than he takes courage, and walks now with the same confidence upon the sea that he went to walk upon the land. Together with a check, he receives more supportation from Christ than his own legs could afford him. Fear no miscarriage through thine own weakness while thou art held up by that strong Helper.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4792.) If the Lord Jesus Christ be a succouring Christ, then why should we yield unto our sins and to our temptations ? Though the siege be strait, and violent, and fierce, if a city be beleagured, if it have but hopes that succour and relief will come, it will hold it out ; and if it know for certain that succour will come, it will hold out unto great extremity. There is never a temptation, but you are beleagured by it : and when your temptation is about you, say, "O my soul, be quiet, yield not ; the Lord Jesus Christ is a succouring Christ, and succour will come, and therefore hold out." Shall the Lord Jesus Christ succour me against my temptations with His bosom, and shall I take my sins and temptations into mine own bosom ? Shall He come to succour me against my sins, and shall I succour my sins that He comes against ? What a mighty argument is here to keep us from all our sins, and from yielding to our temptations. Jesus Christ is a succouring Christ to tempted souls.
—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4793.) This is no small support that Christ succours the tempted. The mother succours the child most when it is sick ; she sits by its bedside, brings it cordials ; so when a soul is most assaulted, it shall be most assisted.
—Watson, 1696.

(4794.) Christ succours His people by taking off the tempter. A shepherd, when the sheep begin to straggle, may set the dog on the sheep to bring it nearer the fold, but then he calls off the dog again.
—Watson, 1696.

7. Temptations are of short duration.

(4795.) Let this encourage thee, O Christian, in thy conflict with Satan ; the skirmish may be sharp, but it cannot be long. Let him tempt thee, and his wicked instruments trounce thee, 'tis but a little while, and thou shalt be rid of both their evil neighbourhoods. The cloud while it drops is rolling over thy head, and then comes fair weather and eternal sunshine of glory. Canst thou not watch with Christ one hour or two ? keep the field a few days ? If thou yield, thou art undone for ever ; persevere but while the battle is over, and thine enemy shall never rally more. Bid faith look through the key-hole of the promise, and tell thee what it sees there laid up for him that overcomes ; bid it listen and tell thee, whether it cannot hear the shouts of those crowned saints, as of those that are dividing the spoil, and receiving the reward of all their services and sufferings here on earth ; and dost thou stand on the other side, afraid to wet thy foot with those sufferings and temptations, which like a little plash of water run between thee and glory?

—Gerrall, 1617-1679.

2. Temptations promote God's glory.

(4796.) He that would know the skill of the pilot must not look on him lying quietly in his bed in a safe port, nor sailing in a fair sea with a prosperous wind, but when he is in the midst of syrtis and sands, tossed and endangered with boisterous storms and cruel tempests—then to quit his ship and self out of these perils, and to bring it safe into the wished-for haven, argues the greatness of his skill, and gains him the reputation of a cunning mariner. And therefore the Lord brings us into a sea of miseries, and tosses us with the tempest of temptations, that by well acquitting ourselves in these perils, our skill, wherewith He has endued us, may be manifested and approved.

—Downname, 1644.

(4797.) The Lord tries His people, and by trial discovers both His gifts to them and the measure of them, chiefly for His own glory. For as the art of the shipwright appears when the ship brooks all weathers, continues firm and strong in all storms and tempests, and sails well with all winds in every sea; and as the cutler's and armourer's skill is made manifest, not whilst the sword hangs by the side in a velvet scabbard, or whilst the armour is clean kept and well oiled in the armoury, but when the one is tried in fight, or by smiting the anvil or bar of iron, and the other in the field with the culiver or musket shot: so the works of God's Spirit, these sanctifying and saving graces, do then most commend their Workmaster, when they come to be tried in this sea of misery and with these bullets of temptation; for if they then hold out, and neither leak nor sink, and being neither pierced nor much battered, do preserve us from all outward violence in this combat against our spiritual enemies, then the wisdom and skill, power and bounty of God, who both made and gave them, clearly shine and manifestly appear.

—Downname, 1644.

(4798.) God suffers His children to be tempted, that so those spiritual graces which He has bestowed upon them may the more clearly shine to His glory. For who can know whether they be God's golden vessels before they be brought to the touchstone of temptation? Who could know the faith, patience, and valour of God's soldiers, if they always lay quietly in garrison and never came to skirmish? Who could feel the odouriferous smell of these aromatic spices, if they were not pounded and bruised in the mortar of afflictions? Who would have discerned Abraham's faith, Job's patience, Paul's courage and constancy, if they had never been tempted, which now, to the glory of God, shine to all the world?

—Downname, 1644.

(4799.) "Let no man, when he is tempted, say, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted of evil; neither tempteth He any man." God tempteth thee not, my son: yet know that being His, thou couldst not be tempted without Him; but permitting and ordering that temptation to His own glory and thy good. That grace which thy God hath given thee He will have thus exercised, thus manifested. So we have known some indulgent father, who, being assured of the skill and valour of his dear son, puts him upon tiltings, and barriers, and public duels; and looks on with contentment, as well knowing that he will come off with honour. How had we known the admirable continency of good Joseph if he had not been strongly solicited by a wanton mistress? How had we known David's valour if the Philistines had not had a giantly challenger to encounter him? How had we known the invincible piety of the three children if there had not been a furnace to try them? or of Daniel if there had been no lions to accompany him? Be confident, thy glory shall be according to the proportion of thy trial: neither couldst thou ever be so happy, if thou hadst not been beholden to temptations.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4800.) "The Lord knows them that are His, and no weapon formed against them can prosper." That this may appear with the fullest evidence, Satan is allowed to assault them. We handle vessels of glass or china with caution, and endeavour to preserve them from falls and blows, because we know they are easily broken. But if a man had the art of making glass malleable, and, like iron, capable of bearing the stroke of a hammer without breaking, it is probable that instead of locking it carefully up, he would rather, for the commendation of his skill, permit many to attempt to break it, when he knew their attempts would be in vain. Believers are compared to earthen vessels, liable in themselves to be destroyed by a small blow; but they are so strengthened and tempered by the power and supply of divine grace, that the fiercest efforts of their fiercest enemies against them may be compared to the dashing of waves against a rock. And that this may be known and noticed, they are exposed to many trials; but the united and repeated assaults of the men of the world, and the powers of darkness, afford but the more incontestible demonstration, that the Lord is with them of a truth, and that His strength is made perfect in their weakness. Surely this thought, my friend, will afford you consolation; and you will be content to suffer, if God may be glorified by you and in you.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

XI. DUTIES OF THE TEMPTED.

1. They are not to permit temptation to cause them to doubt their sonship.

(4801.) Suppose that your father should leave you a great estate, and give you good evidences; and a cunning lawyer comes and writes upon the back side of your evidence, Naught, naught: will ye because of that, join with him and say that your father hath given you nothing? Christ hath given you a great estate of mercy, and hath given you good evidences for it; and Satan now comes and writes upon the back side of your evidence, and says, This is naught. Will you join with him against God and Christ? what wrong is this to His love? think of it, I pray, you that are the saints and people of God. Be humbled under every temptation, though it be never so small; but never question your condition, though your temptation be never so great.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4802.) But suppose there seem to be no obedience, neither in your own nor in another's eye; yet the root of the matter may be in you. Ye know how it is with the fish that are in the water in a windy and a stormy day. Ye put many fish into a pond, and in a fair sunshiny day ye see them playing upon the water, upon the uppermost part of the water; but in a rainy and stormy day ye see none of them there, but yet you say they are all there, they are in the water, they are at the bottom, though you see them not. And so, it may be, in this stormy time of temptation, your obedience and profiting is not seen, but it may be there as heretofore. Satan does never more press a child of God to try himself by signs of grace drawn from his own conversation than in the time of temptation.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4803.) God had one Son without sin; but He has no son without temptation. —Spurgeon.

2. More earnest prayer.

(4804.) If temptation do arise, be sure that you make some improvement of it for the better. If an enemy come and make an assault against one of your garrison towns, and he goes away and gets no hurt, he is encouraged and invited to come again; for, says he, "Though I did not carry the town, yet I lost nothing." But now, if upon his assault he loses many men and his ordnance; "I will come no more there," says he, "for there I had such and such a great loss." Thus it is with Satan when he comes before a soul with his temptations: "There is a soul," says he, "I came before him with my temptations, and though, indeed, I did not get the thing I would, yet I lost nothing, and therefore I will go again. But there is a soul, I came before him with my temptations, and I confess I lost much: I tempted and he prayed, and the more I tempted the more he prayed, and the more I tempted still, the more he did go to Jesus Christ, and therefore I will tempt him no more."

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

3. Confidence in the sufficiency of divine grace.

(4805.) The torchlight of faith shall be kept burning, notwithstanding the winds of temptation continue blowing.

—Watson, 1696.

XII. DELIVERANCE FROM TEMPTATION.

1. Is an undeserved mercy.

(4806.) God promises deliverance out of temptation to the godly, and yet their godliness is not the cause of this deliverance, any more than of God's making such a promise. It is indeed the qualification of the person who is to be delivered; so that without it the deliverance (upon a federal account, as was said before would not be; but still the cause of it is quite another thing.

A prince, for instance, has a hundred of his subjects in captivity, and makes a declaration that he will redeem so many of them as are of such a certain age, taking no notice of the rest. Now, in this case, we cannot say that their being of such an age was the first impulsive cause inducing their prince to redeem them; but his own good pleasure, which first made him take up a resolution to redeem such persons, and to make this the condition of it. Their being indeed of such an age is the qualifying condition, rendering them the proper objects of such a redemption; so that such, and none but such, are redeemed; but the cause of that redemption is not, that being (as we have shown) to be sought for elsewhere.

Now the case is much the same, where God vouchsafes to deliver men out of temptation. Whence is it, that, upon such trials befalling men, some few escape, and in the issue are brought off without ruin, while "thousands fall at their right hand and at their left"? Is it the extreme misery of our condition moving God's compassion, or the worthiness of their persons requiring this of His justice, which causes their deliverance? No; these are not; cannot be the cause, for the reasons before mentioned; they are indeed the proper qualifications rendering them fit to be delivered, but the free mercy or good pleasure of God is the main, leading, impulsive cause that actually they are delivered.

The thing, therefore, which is eminent from first to last in the whole transaction is mercy; mercy, which is its own argument; mercy, the first and grand motive of which is itself. For if it were not so, what could there be in a sinful, polluted creature to engage it? There is indeed enough to need, but nothing to deserve it. But the divine compassion, wheresoever it fixes, removes all obstacles, answers all objections, and needs no other reason of its actings, but its own sovereign, absolute, unaccountable freedom.

—South, 1633-1716.

XIII. IMMUNITY FROM TEMPTATION.

1. How it is to be secured.

(1.) By filling the heart with the thoughts of the love of Christ.

(4807.) Beloved in the Lord, labour to keep the sense of His love warm upon your hearts. Look as it is with water in winter; so with your hearts in this respect: so long as the fire is under the water, and the water is hot, it freezes not; but when the heat goes off, and the water is cold, then ice comes upon it. And so long as your heart is kept up in the sense of Christ's love, and warm with Christ's love; so long the ice comes not, the temptation comes not. The slumber of grace is a preparation to temptation.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(2.) By growth in grace.

(4808.) Gardeners know that fumigations of tobacco are inadequate devices of getting rid of aphides that cluster on plants. The truest remedy for these things is to make the plant outgrow them. Give it nourishment so that it shall grow faster than they can take possession of it, and its growth will deliver it from all insect invasion. And there are ten thousand insect, pestiferous temptations, that creep in and trouble the soul, which can be most easily overcome by moral growth. Mould and mildew collect on plants where there is no vigour and no growth, but where there is vigour and wholesome growth the plant goes bravely on to blossom and fruit.

—Becker.

TRINITY, THE.

1. An object of faith.

(4809.) "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; there are three distinct persons: in the Name, not names; there is one essence. The Holy Ghost is called the finger of God, Christ the hand of the Father: now, as the finger is in the hand, and the hand on the body; so of one and the same most pure and simple essence is the Father, Son, and Spirit. But as it was reported of Alanus, when he promised his auditory to discourse the next Sunday more clearly of the Trinity, and to make plain that mystery; while he was studying the point by the sea-side, he spied a boy very busy with a little spoon, trudging often between the sea and a small hole he had digged in the ground. Alanus asked him what he meant. The boy answered, I intend to bring all the sea into this pit. Alanus replies, Why dost thou attempt such impossibilities, and mispend thy time? The boy answers, So dost thou, Alanus: I shall as soon bring all the sea into this hole, as thou bring all the knowledge of the Trinity into thy head. All is equally possible: we have begun together, we shall finish together; saving of the two my labour hath more hope and possibility of taking effect. I conclude with, It is rashness to search, godliness to believe, safeness to preach, and eternal blessedness to know the Trinity: yet let us know to praise the Trinity in the words of our Church; "Glory be to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost." And let all answer, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen."

—Adams, 1653.

(4810.) The Trinity is purely an object of faith, the plumb-line of reason is too short to fathom this mystery; but where reason cannot wade, there faith must swim. There are some truths in religion may be demonstrated by reason; as that there is a God: but the Trinity of persons in the unity of essence is wholly supernatural, and must be believed by faith. This sacred doctrine, though it be not against reason, yet it is above reason.

—Watson, 1696.

2. It is incomprehensible by us.

(4811.) As to the point of Divine subsistence, Jehovah Elohim, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: three persons, but one God; or in Leo's expression—one God without division in a Trinity of persons, and three persons without confusion in an unity of essence—it is a discovery altogether supernatural. Yea, nature is so far from finding it out, that now when Scripture has revealed it, she cannot by all the help of art comprehend, or set it forth as she does other things: grammar itself wanting proper and full words whereby to express; logic strong demonstrations whereby to prove; and rhetoric apt similitudes whereby to clear so mysterious a truth. The terms essence, persons, Trinity, generation, procession, and such like, which are commonly made use of for want of better, have been and will be cavilled at as short of fully reaching the mystery in all its dimensions.

Of the similitudes usually brought for its illustration that which Hilary said is most true. "They may gratify the understanding of man, but none of them exactly suit with the nature of God." For example, not that of a root, a trunk, and a branch, the trunk proceeding from the root, the branch from both, yet but one tree; because a root may for some time be without a trunk, and a trunk without a branch; but God the Father never was without His Son, nor the Father and Son without their co-eternal Spirit. Neither that of a crystal ball held in a river on a sunshiny day, in which case there would be a sun in the firmament, begetting another sun upon the crystal ball, and a third sun proceeding from both the former, appearing in the surface of the water, yet but one sun on all; for in this comparison two of the suns are but imaginary, none real save that in heaven; whereas the Father, Word, and Spirit are distinct Persons indeed, but each of them truly and really God.

Well, therefore, may rhetoricians say, "It is not in us and in our similitudes fully to clear this high point." Logicians also, "It is not in us and in our demonstrations fully to prove it." For however reason be able from the creatures to demonstrate a Godhead, yet it cannot from thence a Trinity, no more than he who looks upon a curious picture can tell whether it was drawn by an Englishman or an Italian, only that the piece had an artificer, and such an one as was a prime master in that faculty; because the limner drew it as he was an artist, not as one of this or that nation. So the world is a production of that essence which is common to all Three, not any personal emanation from this or that subsistent, which is the reason why a Deity may be inferred from thence, but not any distinction of Persons, much less the determinate number of a Trinity. The doctrine whereof is like a temple filled with smoke, such smoke as not only hinders the view of the quickest eye, but hurts the sight of such as dare with undue curiosity pry into it. A mystery which my faith embraces as revealed in the Word, but my reason cannot fathom. Whilst others run themselves on ground, and dispute it till their understanding be nonplussed, may I be enabled to believe what Scripture testifies! Verily this light is dazzling, and our eyes are weak. It is a case wherein the wisest clerks are punies, and the ablest orators infants. Yet is the mystery itself written in Scripture as it were with the sunbeams.

—Arrowsmith, 1602-1659.

(4812.) Our narrow thoughts can no more comprehend the Trinity in Unity, than a little nutshell will hold all the water in the sea.

—Watson, 1696.

3. Yet it is not incredible. [See also §§ 851, 854, 2229-2240.]

(4813.) Respecting the doctrines to be believed, it is objected that they are mysterious; they relate to persons and things in another world, which are therefore hidden from us. What, then, is to be done? Why, certainly, we must believe the account which God, by His prophets and apostles, has been pleased to give us: and we must form our notions of them, as well as we can, by comparison with those things which are the objects of our senses. Our state, with regard to God and the glories of His heavenly kingdom, is exactly like the state of a blind man, with regard to the sun and the light thereof. He cannot see the sun, or the light that issues from it; yet he would be unreasonable should he refuse to believe what his friends, who do see it, tell him concerning it; though, after all, they can give him but a very poor, imperfect idea of it. If it pleased God to open his eyes, and bestow on him the blessing of sight, he would know more of the matter in one single moment, than description, study, and meditation could have taught him in a hundred years, or a thousand years, or ten thousand years. Such is our case. We cannot see God; we cannot see the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; we cannot see how they are three, and how they are one. But shall we therefore, in opposition to the authority and word of God Himself, deny that they are so? We may reason and dispute upon the subject for ages: but in that instant, when we are admitted to His presence, and "see Him as He is," every doubt and difficulty will vanish at once; and we shall know—how little we did know, or possibly could know before.

Tell a blind man your sight can travel over the space of one hundred millions of miles as soon as it can move the distance of ten yards, how full of absurdity, contradiction, and impossibility must this assertion appear to him, who can perceive of motion only in slow succession! yet it is a certain truth; for let a person be led forth, in a clear night, with his eyes closed; on opening them he will see the remotest star in the firmament that can be seen at all as soon as he will see a candle at the distance of a few yards from him.

This instance may serve to show how very ill qualified we are to dispute with our Maker concerning His own nature and existence, and the things of another and invisible world. Of the truth of revelation we have the most decisive evidence, of the senses, in the miracles wrought by Christ and His apostles, of which the eyes and ears of men were sufficient judges. Knowing, therefore, assuredly, that God hath spoken, and giving diligent attention to that which He hath spoken, it is our part, at present, to believe what we shall one day be permitted to see.

—Horne, 1730-1792.

(4814.) A distinction in the divine nature, inconceivable by us but plainly revealed in terms, must be admitted upon the testimony and authority of Him who alone can instruct us in what we are concerned to know of His adorable essence. "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one" (1 John v. 7). To each of these three the perfections of Deity are attributed and ascribed in various parts of Scripture. Each of them therefore is God; and yet we are sure, both from Scripture and reason, there is, there can be, but one God. Thus far we can go safely; and that we can go no farther, that our thoughts are lost and overwhelmed, if we attempt to represent to ourselves how or in what manner three are one, and one are three, may be easily accounted for, if any just reason can be given why a worm cannot comprehend infinity. Let us first, if we can, account for the nature, essence, and properties of the things with which, as to their effects, we are familiarly acquainted. Let us explain the growth of a blade of grass, or the virtues of the loadstone. Till we are able to do this, it becomes us to lay our hands upon our mouths, and our mouths in the dust.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

4. The difficulty of defining "Unity."

(4815.) The word "unity" is ambiguous and difficult to define. It may mean merely the numerical basis of calculation; the contrast between one thing and two or more things of the same kind. But if used in the sense of a unit, it is clear that every one thing is made up of many parts, possesses many qualities, stands in various relations, and though in itself only one thing, is also a part of many other things. By unity is often meant more than the antithesis of many. Though the unity of God means that there is only one God, in opposition to the claims of lords many and gods many, yet the phrase implies that whatever internal distinctions there may be in the essence of the Most High, that essence is one essence—a whole, a unity in itself. Unity is individuality in spite of the recognitions of the multiplicity of elements of which it is compounded. Thus a crystal of quartz of any magnitude is a unity distinct from all other crystals. It is one thing, as distinct from the hand that holds it, or the sun that shines upon it. It possesses a multitude of curious properties as long as it remains that one thing, pure and simple, undivided, and unanalysed. But let me dash it on a rock and break it into a thousand pieces, large and small, and it might soon be proved that every fragment, even to the minutest dust of quartz adhering to each one of the particles, was preserving the same peculiar shape as the original unbroken crystal, and possessed in its measure all its properties. Yet these fragments, though many, previously formed one whole. Consider, again, a tree or plant; its root and stem, its branches and leaves, and flowers and seed, form one whole of mysterious beauty; and though each twig and leaflet is a perfect creation, having an independent life in itself, yet the many parts do not fail to form a well-appreciated and comprehended unity. Further, playing in the branches of this tree there is a world of more mysterious life. Every leaf has its colony of insects, every bough its parasitical growth; the bees are humming in its fragrant flowers, and the birds are building their nests in its branches. But each lichen and moss, each insect and animalcule, each bee and bird, is as wonderful in its mysterious combination of many opposites, and subordinate and dependent structures, and wondrous balancing of powers, as was the forest tree itself. But while I am considering crystal and tree, and insect and bird, I find that I myself am just such a combination of many parts, faculties, passions, and relations, each of which is sufficiently individual, and yet the whole of which seem all but indispensable to constitute my self-conscious unity. I am a strange combination of body, soul, and spirit; and yet I am reckoned as one man in this world of ours. My senses, reflections, and passions, my body, understanding, and will, seem at times capable of individualisation, and to be unities in themselves; but it is the mutual relation and dependence of the parts that constitute the unity of the whole.

With this self-consciousness of multiplicity in unity to help me, the revelation that the blessed God has made of His threefold nature is less perplexing than it otherwise would be. The unity of the Divine nature, like the unity of all other things, is a unity consistent with the self-inclusions of various constituent elements. In the case of the Divine Being, the unity and the multiplicity are more expressly intimated and maintained than in any other unity, so that we actually use words which seem almost self-contradictory in order adequately to express that wondrous "unity in Trinity" which "neither divides the substance nor confounds the persons" of the adorable Godhead.

—Reynolds.

A. Various attempts to illustrate the mystery of the Trinity.*

(4316.) That Trinity is One God, not so that the Father be the same Person, who is also the Son and the Holy Ghost; but that the Father be the Father, and the Son be the Son, and the Holy Ghost be the Holy Ghost, and this Trinity one God, as it is written, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord your God is One God."

Nor is it wonderful that these things are said concerning an ineffable nature, when even in those very things which we see with the eyes of the body, and judge of by the sense of the body, some such thing happens.

For when as being asked concerning the fountain, we cannot say that it is itself the river; nor, being asked concerning the river, can we call it the fountain; and again, the draught which is of the fountain or river, we can neither call the river nor the fountain. Yet in this trinity, we use the word "waters," and when the question is put concerning such, we answer of each, Water. For, if I ask whether it be water in the fountain, it is answered, Water; and if we ask whether it be water in the river, there is no other answer made, and in that draught no other answer will be possible; and yet we call them not three waters, but one.

Certainly, good heed must be taken, that no one so think of the ineffable substance of that Majesty as of a visible and corporeal fountain, or river, or draught. For in these the water, which is now in the fountain, goes forth into the river, and abides not in itself; and, when it passes from the river, or from the fountain, into the draught, it abides not there, whence it is taken. Therefore it may be that the same water belongs at one time to the term fountain, at another to the term river, at another to the term draught: whereas in that Trinity we said, that it cannot be that the Father at one time is the Son, at another the Holy Ghost: as in a tree, the root is nothing else than the root, nor the trunk anything else than the trunk, nor the boughs anything else than the boughs; for what is called root, that cannot be called trunk and boughs; nor can that wood which pertains to the root by any passage be at one time in the root, at another in the trunk, at another in the branches; that rule of the name remaining, that the root is wood, and the trunk wood, and the boughs wood; and yet they are not called three woods, but one wood.

Or, if these have some dissimilitude, so that they may be not absurdly called three woods, by reason of difference in solidity, yet that other at any rate all allow, if from out one fountain three cups be filled, that they may be called three cups, but cannot be called three waters, but altogether one water; although when asked concerning each several cup, you answer that in any one of them is water; although there in this case take place no passage, such as we were just now speaking of, from the fountain into the river.

But these instances in bodies have been given, not by reason of their likeness to that Divine nature, but because of the unity even in things visible, that it might be understood to be possible that some three things, not only singly, but also together, may have one single name; and that no one wonder, or think it absurd, that we call the Father God, the Son God, the Holy Ghost God, and yet that we worship not three Gods in that Trinity, but One God, and One Substance.

—Augustine, 353-429.

(4817.) Let no man deceive himself so as to say or to believe that there are three Gods, or that any person in the Holy Trinity is less mighty than other. Each of the three is God, yet they are all one God; for they have all one nature, and one Godhead, and one substance, and one counsel, and one work, and one majesty, and like glory, and co-eternal rule. But the Son alone was incarnate and born to man of the holy maiden Mary. The Father was not invested with human nature, but yet He sent His Son for our redemption, and was ever with Him, both in life and in passion, and at His resurrection, and at His ascension. Also all the Church of God confesses, according to true faith, that Christ was born of the pure maiden Mary, and of the Holy Ghost. Yet is not the Holy Ghost the Father of Christ; never shall any Christian man believe that: but the Holy Ghost is the Will of the Father and of the Son; therefore it is very rightly written in our belief, that Christ's humanity was accomplished by the Holy Ghost.

Behold the sun with attention, in which there is heat and brightness; but the heat dries, and the brightness gives light. The heat does one thing, and the brightness another; and though they cannot be separated, the heating, nevertheless, belongs to the heat, and the giving light to the brightness. In like manner Christ alone assumed human nature, and not the Father, nor the Holy Ghost: they were, nevertheless, ever with Him in all His works and in all His course.

We speak of God, mortals of the Immortal, feeble of the Almighty, miserable beings of the Merciful; but who may worthily speak of that which is unspeakable? He is without measure; because He is everywhere. He is without number, for He is ever. He is without weight, for He holds all creatures without toil; and He disposed them all in three things, that is, in measure, and in number, and in weight. But know ye that no man can speak fully concerning God, when we cannot even investigate or reckon the creatures which He has created. Who by words can tell the ornaments of heaven? Or who the fruitfulness of earth? Or who shall adequately praise the circuit of all the seasons? Or who all other things, when we cannot even fully comprehend with our sight the bodily things on which we look? Behold thou seest the man before thee, but at the time thou

* It is sometimes erroneously supposed that such illustrations as this are intended to explain how the sacred mystery is question is possible, whereas they are merely intended to show that the words we use concern it are not self-contradictory, which is the objection most commonly brought against them. To say that the doctrine of the Son's generation does not trench upon the Father's perfection and immutability seems at first inconsistent with what the words Father and Son mean, till another image is adduced, such as the sun and radiance, in which that alleged contradiction is seen to exist in fact. Here one image corrects another; and the accumulation of images is not, as is often thought, the restless and fruitless effort of the mind to enter into the mystery, but is a safeguard against any one image, nay, any collection of images, being supposed sufficient. If it be said that the language used concerning the sun and its radiance is but popular, not philosophical, so again the Catholic language concerning the Holy Trinity may, nay, must be economical, not adequate, conveying the truth, not in the tongues of angels, but under human modes of thought and speech.—John Henry Newman.

seest his face, thou seest not his back. So also if thou lookest at a cloth, thou canst not see it all together, but turnest it about, that thou mayest see it all. What wonder is it, if the Almighty God is unspeakable and incomprehensible, who is everywhere all, and nowhere divided?

—Elfric, 1051.

(4818.) The sun which shines over us is a bodily creature, and has, nevertheless, three properties in itself: one is the bodily substance, that is the sun's orb; the second is the beam or brightness ever of the sun, which illumines all the earth; the third is the heat, which with the beam comes to us. The beam is ever of the sun, and with it; and the Son of Almighty God is ever of the Father begotten, and ever with Him existing, of whom the Apostle said, that He was the brightness of His Father's glory. The heat of the sun proceeds from it and from its beam; and the Holy Ghost proceeds ever from the Father and from the Son equally.

Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost, may not be named together, but yet they are nowhere separated. The Almighty God is not threefold, but is Trinity.

—Elfric, 1051.

(4819.) As there is in man the soul, the spirit, and the body, three distinct substances, which nevertheless do make but one man and not three; in the soul there is the mind, the understanding, and the will, but these do not make three souls, but one; in the sun there is the very substance of it, the heat and the light, and yet these be not thereby made three suns, but one; if the light and shining be taken from the sun, we should then see the body of it no more; and if the heat or warmth be taken from the sun, we should then not feel whether there were any sun in the sky or no: even so, if the Word and Spirit be taken from God, we should then come by no knowledge of Him at all; therefore, whereas the Son and the Holy Ghost are joined unto the Father, it doth further nothing to the making of many Gods, but to the manifesting of one true God in nature and essence, and three in persons and properties, which manifestation was to be spread throughout the world by the preaching of the Gospel.

Like as the sun in the firmament hath three distinct and sundry things, of which every one differeth from the other—as the globe, the light, and the heat; and although every one of these keep severally their properties, yet it is but one sun, and is not divided into three suns: so, in the Deity, the unity of essence is not taken away by the distinction of persons, and yet for all that is there no confounding of persons or changing of one into another. For as there is but one sun in and through the whole world, no more is there but one God. And as the sun showeth himself by his beams: even so God, as Father, doth show Himself by His Son Jesus Christ, who is His Word and eternal wisdom. And as the sun by his heat doth make us feel his force: even so God maketh us feel His virtue by His Holy Spirit, which is His infinite power.

As reason, will, and memory are not three souls, but one and the same soul: so the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are three, distinct in property, and yet one God.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(4820.) In a fired coal there is the substance of the coal, the light of the coal, the heat of the coal, and yet but one fired coal: so soon as the coal is fired there are these three—substance, light, and heat. So in the Divine Essence, though in a more transcendent way, is there the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Again, it may be shadowed out in a man's self: as soon as ever he is born into this world he is a creature to God, a child to his parents, & subject to his prince, and yet he is but one. So, so soon as ever that God is—that is, from all eternity—He is Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, yet but one God.

—Abbot, 1562–1635.

(4821.) It is a threefold way in which God has revealed Himself to man—as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. First, as a Father in opposition to that doctrine which taught that the whole universe is God, and every part of the universe is a portion of God. He is the Father who hath made this universe—God distinct from us: outside of us: the Creator distinguished from the creation. Secondly, God has revealed Himself as a Son, as manifested in Humanity, chiefly in Christ. Throughout the ages past there has been a mediatorial Humanity. Man is in a way the reflection of God's nature—the father to the child. The prophets, the lawgivers, and especially Moses, are called mediators, through whom God's name was known. The mediatorial system culminated in Christ, attained the acme of perfection in one—the man Christ Jesus—the express image of His Father. The Son is the human side of the mind of God. Thirdly, God has revealed Himself as the Holy Spirit: not as a Father external to us, nor as reflected in Humanity still outside us, but as God within us mingling with our being. The body of man is His temple. "In Him we live and move, and have our being." This is the dispensation of the Spirit: He has told us that every holy aspiration, every thought and act that has been on the side of right against wrong, is a part of His holy essence, of His Spirit in us. This is the threefold manifestation made of Himself to us by God. But this is not all, for this alone would not be the doctrine of the Trinity. It is quite conceivable that there might be one Living Force manifested in three different ways, without its being a Trinity. Let us try and understand this by an illustration. Conceive a circular thin plate of metal; above it you would see it such; at some yards distance as an oval; sideways, edgeways, a line. This might be the account of God's different aspects: in one relationship to us seen as the Father, in another as the Son, in another as the Spirit; but this is not the doctrine of the Trinity, it is a heresy, known in old times by the name of Sabellianism or modal Trinity, depending on our position in reference to Him. Further, this is not merely the same part of His nature, seen in different aspects, but diverse parts of His complex being—persons—three causes of this manifestation. Just as our reason, our memory, our imagination, are not the same, but really ourselves. Let us take another illustration. A single white ray of light falling on a certain object appears red; on another, blue; on another, yellow. That is, the red alone in one case is thrown out, the blue or yellow in another. So the different parts of the one ray by turns become visible; each is a complete ray, yet the original white ray is but one. So we believe that in that Unity of Essence there are three living Powers which we call Persons, distinct from each other. It is in virtue of His own incommunicable Essence that God is the Father. It is the human side of His nature by which He is revealed as the Son, so that it was not, so to speak, a matter of choice whether the Son or the Father should redeem the world. We believe that from all eternity there was that in the mind of God which I have called its human side, which made it possible for Him to be imaged in Humanity; and that again named the Spirit, by which He could mix and mingle Himself with us. This is the doctrine of the Trinity, explained now, not to point the damnatory clause of the Athanasian creed, but only in order to seize joyfully the annual opportunity of professing a firm belief in the dogmatic truth of the Trinity.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

TRUTH.

1. Its characteristics.

(1.) It is simple.

(4822.) That is a very ill cause which wants colourable reason for it; that is a very ill reason which wants a Tertullus to plead it; and he is an ill Tertullus that wants words to defend it. Yea, error hath always most words, like a rotten house that needs most props and crutches to uphold it. Simple truth evermore requires least cost, like a beautiful face that needs no painting, or a comely body which any decent apparel becomes. We plaster over rotten posts and ragged walls; substantial buildings are able to grace themselves. We cannot but suspect that cause whereon the lawyer wastes so much of his time and tongue. Multitude of words is not unlike the thick painting in some popish church windows, a mere device to keep out the light.

—Adams, 1654.

(2.) It is harmonious.

(4823.) All truths are reducible to an unity; like lines, they lovingly meet in one centre, the God of truth, and so far from jostling and clashing, that (as stones in an arch) they uphold one another.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3.) It is self-manifesting.

(4824.) Divine truth exerts on the mind of man at once a restorative and self-manifesting power. It creates in the mind the capacity by which it is discerned. As light opens the close-shut flower-bud to receive light, or as the sunbeam, playing on a sleeper's eyes, by its gentle irritation opens them to see its own brightness; so the truth of God, shining on the soul, quickens and stirs into activity the faculty by which that very truth is to be perceived.

—Caïrd.

(4.) It appeals to the understanding.

(4825.) Though error, like a thief, comes thus in at the window; yet truth, like the true owner of the house, delights to enter at the right door of understanding, from thence into the conscience, and so passeth into the will and affections. Indeed, he that hits upon truth, and takes up the profession of it, before he is brought into the acquaintance of its excellency and heavenly beauty by his understanding, cannot entertain it becoming its heavenly birth and descent; 'tis as a prince that travels in a disguise, not known, therefore not honoured. Truth is loved and prized only of those that know it; and not to desire to know it, is to despise it, as much as knowing it, to reject it. It were not hard to cheat that man of truth who knows not what he hath. Truth and error are all one to the ignorant man, so it hath but the name of truth. You have, may be, heard of the covetous man that hugged himself in the many bags of gold he had, but never opened them, or used them; when the thief took away his gold, and left him his bags full of pebbles in the room, he was as happy as when he had his gold, for he looked not of the one or other. And verily an ignorant person is in a manner no better with truth, than error on his side: both are alike to him, day and night, all one to a blind man.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5.) It is always and everywhere the same.

(4826.) Truth is the same in all ages; not like an almanac, to be changed every year, or calculated peculiarly for one meridian.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(6.) It is infinite.

(4827.) The Truth is infinite as the firmament above you. In childhood, both seem near and measurable: but with years they grow and grow; and seem further off, and further, and grander, and deeper, and vaster, as God Himself; till you smile to remember how you thought you could touch the sky, and blush to recollect the proud and self-sufficient way in which you used to talk of knowing or preaching "The Truth."

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(7.) It is invincible and immortal.

(4828.) It lies not in the power of men, or malice of devils, to disgrace the truth; for it shall shine glorious, when heaven and earth perish, and all her maligners subjected under her conquering feet. It is of the nature that God Himself is, whose glory is not capable of any augmentation, nor passive of any diminution. He is said to be dishonoured by our sins, to be magnified and glorified by our good works. But let our works be good or evil, still Thou continuest holy, O Thou Worship of Israel. Whether the Turks despise Jesus, or the Christians adore Him, still He abides the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever. Such is the immutability of truth, the patrons of it make it not greater, the opposers make it not less; as the splendour of the sun is not enlarged by them that bless it, nor eclipsed by them that hate it.

—Adams, 1654.

(4829.) Besides the men of weak nerve and strong fears, there are not wanting others who, from their observatory, tell us that sceptical philosophy is rolling onward to interpose between the orb of pure evangelism and the Church. It may be so, I am afraid it is so; but of one thing I am certain, and in that assurance I am as calm and confident as I am when looking upon the obscuration of the sun, that it will prove only an eclipse, not an extinction; and an eclipse partial, and not total. The great luminary of evangelic truth, sustained, irradiated, and guided by the hand of its divine Author, will emerge from the shadow, and hold on its resplendent course, when the cause of its temporary obscuration shall have passed away.

—Jama.

(4830.) There is vitality in truth. Neither the sword of the tyrant, nor the pen of the infidel, can slay it. From both it is safe, under the protection of its divine Author. It still lives in the very region of death, incorruptible, indestructible, immortal. The seed which the Egyptians buried with their mummies, though enclosed in the catacomb, though held in the grasp or laid in the bosom of death for thousands of years, still retains its germ of vitality; and on being exhumed after its long interment, sowed in congenial soils, and exposed to the action of the heavens, vegetates as certainly and as luxuriantly as if but yesterday it had dropped from the plant. What are some churches but ecclesiastical mummies, in which the incorruptible seed of the kingdom has been shut up for ages in the icy hand of death, yet all the while retaining its own imperishable life, and when brought out from its grave, and sown in the earth, displaying its power and producing its kind? The doctrine of justification by faith, when brought by Luther out of the catacomb of Rome, was as vigorous and fruitful as when first preached by the great apostle of the Gentiles. Yes; and though now entombed in the rationalism of the continent, or the Puseyism of our country, it preserves even there the living germ, and shall come forth to prove its power and to produce its fruit.

—James.

(4831.) The excellent Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, was obliged to quit the city in consequence of the increasing persecutions; he went with his faithful disciple Crescens to the region in the vicinity of Smyrna. —And in the cool of the evening the bishop was walking under the shade of the magnificent trees which stood in front of his rural abode. Here he found Crescens sitting under an oak tree, leaning his head on his hands and weeping. Then the old man said, "My son, why weepest thou?" Crescens lifted up his head, and said, "Shall I not mourn and weep, when I think of the kingdom of truth on earth? Tempests and storms are gathering round, and will destroy it in its beginning. Many of its adherents have become apostates and have denied and abused the truth, proving that unworthy men may confess it with their lips, though their heart is far from it. This fills my soul with sorrow, and my eyes with tears." Thus replied Crescens.

Then Polycarp smiled and answered: "My dear son, the kingdom of Divine truth is like unto a tree that a countryman reared in his garden. He set the seed secretly and quietly in the ground and left it; the seed put forth leaves, and the young tree grew up among weeds and thorns. Soon the tree reared itself above them, and the weeds died, because the shadow of the branches overcame them. The tree grew, and the winds blew on it and shook it; but its roots clung firmer and firmer to the ground, taking hold of the rocks downwards, and its branches reached unto heaven. Thus the tempest served to increase the firmness and strength of the tree. When it grew up higher, and its shadow spread further, then the thorns and the weeds grew again around the tree; but it heeded them not in its loftiness; there it stood in calm peaceful grandeur—a tree of God."

Thus said the excellent bishop; then stretching out his hand to his disciple, he continued smiling: "When thou art lifting up thy eyes to the summit of the tree, wilt thou regard the weeds that cling about its roots? Trust in Him who planted it."

Then Crescens arose, and his heart was gladdened; for the venerable father walked by his side.

Bent was he with years; but his spirit and his countenance were as those of a youth.

—F. A. Krummacher.

(4832.) It is defeat that turns bone to flint; it is defeat that turns gristle to muscle; it is defeat that makes men invincible; it is defeat that has made those heroic natures that are now in the ascendancy, and that has given the sweet law of liberty for the bitter law of oppression. Do not, therefore, be afraid of defeat. You are never so near victory as when you are defeated in a good cause. For then they had Christ when they kissed Him; but that kiss, so foul on Judas' lips, on the face of Christ shone like a jewel. Yes, then they had Him when they hauled Him before the Sanhedrim at midnight; but it was like a triumphal march. Then, when they led Him toward Calvary, they had Him. And then, when to the music of hammers they lifted Him up, and He hung suspended and groaning, and with imprecations of unutterable agony died, and the heavens were dark, their victory was accomplished, and so was their everlasting defeat; for not till He died could He live, or we in Him. It was slaying Him that gave Him power. And so of everything that has the nature of Christ in it—every truth, every cause, every sanctity, every noble thing. Slay it if you can, and, like the gashes of Milton's angels, its wounds will close by the healing, heavenly virtues of its own nature, and it will stand forth with even greater power than before.

—Becher.

2. Its relations to goodness.

(4833.) The apostle joins the spirit of power and a sound mind together (2 Tim. i. 7). Holiness in practice depends much on a sound judgment. Godliness is the child of truth, and it must be nursed by its own mother. "Desire the sincere milk of the Word, that ye may grow thereby."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4834.) God, who gives an eye to see truth, must give a hand to hold it. What we have from God we cannot keep without God; keep, therefore, thy acquaintance with God, or else truth will not keep her acquaintance with thee. God is light; thou art going into the dark, as soon as thou turnest thy back upon Him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4835.) When men have orthodox judgments and heterodox hearts, there must needs be little love to truth, because the judgment and will are so unequally yoked. Thus, like a scolding couple, they may dwell together a while, but being dissatisfied with each other, the wretch is easily persuaded to give truth a bill of divorce at last, that he may espouse other principles better suited to his corrupt heart.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4836.) There is a natural affinity between all truths and all forms of goodness. They may be separable as they are distinct; but when any one great truth is held fast, it wards off some evil influences; when any good, loving habit is retained, it keeps the heart open to truth. In the highest sphere of being truth and goodness are one; and in our nature they are not easily disjoined. As the nerves of perception and sensation are distinct yet mutually dependent, as the rays of light and heat are distinct yet all but inextricably intertwined, while both are indispensable alike to the most important functions of animal life and the development of organised existences, so truth and goodness by their commingled influence quicken and sustain the inner man, keep together their hold upon our spirit, and can only be held fast when thus conjoined.

—F. C. Cook.

8. Its relation to the human mind.

(1.) The mind craves for it.

(4837.) The mind has its wants, and perhaps as numerous as those of the body. It longs for knowledge; everything that can be known is necessary to it; and nothing proves more clearly that truth is its pole-star, nothing perhaps reflects more glory upon it, than the charm which it feels, and sometimes in spite of itself, in the driest and most thorny investigations of algebra.

—Fomenville.

(2.) Yet it is often unpopular.

(4838.) As the friar wittily told the people, that the truth he then preached unto them seemed to be like holy water, which every one called for apace, yet, when it came to be cast upon them, they turned aside their faces as though they did not like it. Just so it is that almost every man calls fast for truth, commends truth, nothing will down but truth, yet they cannot endure to have it cast in their faces. They love truth when it only pleads itself, and shows itself; but they cannot abide it, when it presses upon them and shows them themselves; they would have it shine out unto all the world in its glory, but by no means so much as peep out to reprove their own errors.

—Senhouse, 1618.

(4839.) Something sure is in it, that impostors find such quick return for their wares, while truth hangs upon the hand. And is it not this? that they offer to sell heaven cheaper to their disciples than Christ will to His? He that sells cheapest will have the most customers, though at last the best will be the cheapest; truth with self-denial will be a better pennyworth than error with flesh-pleasing.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4840.) Truth is so connatural to the mind of man, that it would certainly be entertained by all men, did it not by accident contradict some beloved interest or other. The thief hates the break of day; not but that he naturally loves the light as well as other men; but his condition makes him dread and abhor that which, of all things, he knows to be the likeliest means of his discovery.

—South, 1633-1716.

(3.) It is difficult to fix it in the mind.

(4841.) When Daguerre was working upon his sun-pictures, his greatest difficulty was to fix them. The light would imprint his image, but as soon as the tablet was taken from the camera the image vanished. At last he discovered a chemical solution which would fix the image and give him a permanent picture. So the truth is hard to fix in man's heart.

4. Its importance.

(1.) All truth is important.

(4842.) The doctrine of the gospel is like a bridge, by which alone men can go from this valley of misery to the regions of bliss and happiness; and the principles of religion, or truths of the gospel, are like so many arches which, united together, make up this bridge: and therefore these errors that overturn any of these principles do, as it were, cut out an arch from the bridge, whereby a breach is made, and the passage by it into heaven is either cut off, if the error be fundamental, or greatly obstructed, if it nearly concerns the fundamentals of religion.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(4843.) The least truth ought to be sacred to every one of us, who are called to prove all things, and hold fast that which is good; for, the loss of the least truth, whether you reckon it fundamental or not, is of dangerous consequence: the loss of the least divine truth, is as the loss of a diamond out of a ring; or of a jewel out of the Mediator's crown. The gospel is like a ladder that hath so many steps, or rounds; every truth is like a round of the ladder; and by these rounds we climb up to heaven: if you break off any round, you are in danger of falling; and your climbing up is rendered either difficult or impossible. The truths of the gospel are like stepping-stones over a deep water; take away any of these stones, and you make such a wide and dangerous step that you are in hazard of falling into the deep.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(2.) Yet all truths are not all equal in value.

(4844.) There is as much difference in the value of truths, as there is of coins: whereof one piece is but a farthing, another no less than a pound, yet both current, and in their kind useful.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(3.) Some truths are vital.

(4845.) I can conceive a living man without an arm or a leg, but not without a head or a heart; so there are some truths essential to vital religion, and which all awakened souls are taught.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(4.) The most important truths are within the reach of all.

(4846.) God hath graciously ordered it, that the most useful and necessary truths for afflicted saints hang, as I may so say, on the lower boughs of this tree of life (the Bible), within the reach of a poor Christian, who is but of an ordinary stature in knowledge.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5.) Seemingly slight departures from truth are not slight evils.

(4847.) To take away from truth the smallest portion of itself, is paving the way for its utter loss and annihilation. In this respect truth resembles the insect which is said to die if deprived of its antennæ. Truth requires to be entire and perfect in all its members, in order to the manifestation of that power by which it is able to gain wide and salutary victories, and extend its triumphs to future ages. Blending a little error with truth, is like casting a grain of poison into a full dish; that grain suffices to change the quality of the food, and death, slow but certain, is the result.

—D'Aubignè.

(4848.) The carpenter's gimblet makes but a small hole, but it enables him to drive a great nail. May we not here see a representation of those minor departures from the truth which prepare the minds of men for grievous errors, and of those thoughts of sin which open a way for the worst of crimes? Beware, then, of Satan's gimplet. —Spurgeon.

5. Controversaries concerning truth.

(1.) Are not to be entered upon rashly.

(4849.) Every man is not a proper champion for truth, nor fit to take up the gauntlet in the cause of verity : many from the ignorance of these maxims, and an inconsiderate zeal for truth, have too rashly charged the troops of error, and remain as trophies unto the enemies of truth. A man may be in as just possession of truth as of a city, and yet be forced to surrender : 'tis therefore far better to enjoy her with peace than to hazard her on a battle : if therefore there rise any doubts in my way, I do forget them, or at least defer them, till my better settled judgment and more manly reason be able to resolve them.

—Sir T. Browne, 1605-1682.

(2.) Are not to deter us from the service of God.

(4850.) Though there be many sects and heresies, many false religions, and but one Truth, this must not make us neglect all till there be an universal agreement ; for as well may we reconcile light and darkness, the children of God, with the children of the devil, grace and natural corruption, truth and error, as the true religion with those which are false, or the professors of the one with the professors of the other.

Those who have important business abroad do not stay at home and refuse to travel because some have gone out of the way. But therefore they are the more careful to inform themselves of every turning in their journey, because they would not err with others.

Those that have a desire to live do not refuse all meat because some surfeit and die by eating that which is unwholesome. But rather hereby they are made more wary in making good choice of such diet as is fit for the preservation of their health.

Those also who are sick do not neglect all physic because there are many cozening and unlearned empirics who kill instead of curing. But this makes them with more circumspection to find out a skilful and learned physician.

Let us therefore follow the like practice in spiritual things. And seeing there is but one direct way which leads unto heaven, and many by-ways which lead to destruction, let not this keep us from travelling this heavenly journey, but rather move us with more diligence to inquire the right way. Seeing also there are many who offer us poison, instead of the wholesome food and physic of our souls, let us learn with more care to make choice, and to put a difference between the one and the other.

—Downname, 1644.

(4851.) Look thou takest not offence at the difference of judgments and opinions that are found amongst the professors of religion. It is a stone which the Papist throws (in these divided times especially) before our feet. How know you, saith he, which is truth, when there are so many judgments and ways amongst you? Some have so stumbled at this, that they have quit the truth they once professed, and by the storm of dissensions in matters of religion, have been, if not thrown upon the rock of atheism, yet driven to and fro in a fluctuation of mind, not willing to cast anchor anywhere in their judgment, till they see this tempest over, and those that are scattered from one another by diversity of judgment, meet together in an unity, and joint consent of persuasions in matters of religion. A resolution, as one saith very well, as foolish and pernicious to the soul, if not more, than it would be to the body, if a man should vow he would not eat till all the clocks in the city should strike twelve just together ; the latter might sooner be expected than the former.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3.) Are no excuse for an irreligious life.

(4852.) Objection. There are so many ways and religions that we know not which to be of ; and therefore we will be even as we are.

Answer. Because there are many will you be of that way that you may be sure is wrong? None are farther out of the way, than worldly, fleshly, unconverted sinners. For they do not err in this or that opinion as many sects do ; but in the very scope and drift of their lives. If you were going a journey that your life lay on, would you stop or turn again because you meet some cross-ways, or because you see some travellers go the horse-way, and some the foot-way, and some perhaps break over the hedge, yes, and some miss the way? Or would you not rather be more careful to inquire the way? If you have some servants that know not how to do your work right, and some that are unfaithful, would you take it well at any of the rest that would therefore be idle and do you no service, because they see the rest so bad?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

6. How it is to be sought.

(1.) Diligently.

(4853.) Like as nature hath hid very deep in the ground stones precious and of much value, but others of no virtue are everywhere to be found : so things of estimation and price, as virtue and learning, are known but unto few, neither can they be obtained without great labour and study.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(2.) Sincerely.

(4854.) Let thy aim be sincere in embracing truths. A false naughty heart, and an unsound judgment, like ice and water, are produced mutually by one another.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3.) Impartially.

(4855.) That man only stands fair for the entertainment of truth, who is under the dominion of no vice or lust ; because he hath nothing to corrupt or bribe him, to seduce him, to draw him aside in his inquiry after truth, he hath no interest but to find the truth, and follow it ; he is inquiring after the way to heaven and eternal happiness, and he hath the indifference of a traveller who is not inclined to go this way rather than another, for his concernment is to find out the right way, and to walk in it : such an indifference of mind hath every good man who sincerely desires to do the will of God ; he stands ready to receive truth when sufficient evidence is offered to convince him of it ; because he hath no manner of concernment that the contrary proposition should be true. As in mathematics a man is ready to give his assent to any proposition that is sufficiently demonstrated to him, because he hath no inclination or affection to one side of the question more than to the other ; all his design and concern-ment is to find out the truth on which side soever it lies; and he is like to find it because he is so indifferent and impartial. But if a man be biassed by any lust, and addicted to any vicious practice, he is then an interested person, and concerned to be partial in his judgment of things, and is under a great temptation to infidelity when the truths of God are proposed to him, because, whatever the evidence for them be, he cannot but be unwilling to own the truth of that doctrine which is so contrary to his inclination and interest. —Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(4.) Prayerfully.

(4856.) We stand at better advantage to find truth, and keep it also, when devoutly praying for it, than fiercely wrangling and contending about it. Disputes roil the soul, and raise the dust of passion; prayer sweetly composeth the mind, and lays the passions which disputes draw forth; and I am sure a man may see further in a still clear day, than in a windy and cloudy. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5.) Courageously.

(4857.) I persuade myself that the life and faculties of man, at the best but short and limited, cannot be employed more rationally or laudably than in the search of knowledge: and especially of that sort which relates to our duty, and conduces to our happiness. In these inquiries, therefore, wherever I perceive any glimmering of truth before me, I readily pursue and endeavour to trace it to its source, without any reserve or caution of pushing the discovery too far, or opening too great a glare of it to the public. I look upon the discovery of anything which is true, as a valuable acquisition of society, which cannot possibly hurt or obstruct the good effect of any other truth whatsoever; for they all partake of one common essence, and necessarily coincide with each other; and like the drops of rain which fall separately into the river, mix themselves at once with the stream, and strengthen the general current. —Middleton, 1683-1750.

(6.) Perseveringly.

(4858.) Let no man, upon a weak conceit of sobriety or an ill-applied moderation, think or maintain that a man can search too far, or be too well studied in the book of God's word, or in the book of God's works,—divinity or philosophy: but rather let men endeavour an endless progress or proficience in both: only let men beware that they apply both to charity, and not to swelling, to use, and not to ostentation; and again, that they do not unwisely mingle or confound these learnings together. —Bacon, 1560-1626.

(4859.) The old tree adds a new ring to its girth each year, and the old mind can do the same unless it turns into a fossil. Humboldt began studying a language at eighty. —Augusta Larned.

7. Must be personally applied.

(4860.) Truths are food. If food be not taken, what good does it do without application? The word of God is a sword: what will a sword do if it hangs up in a man's chamber? or if it be not used when the enemy approaches? The application of the sword of the Spirit gives the virtue to it. It is to no purpose else. Divine truths are physic. If it be not applied, what use is there of physic? —Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4861.) If you carry a candle with you in the open air, you have to cover the flame with your hand, and to keep your eye upon it; any wind may blow it out. But a lamp is safe from the wind; and, if you carry it, your eye is left free. Truth that you only acknowledge, and have not secured by the habit of your life, is like the flame of the candle. You wish the aid of its light to guide you when out in dark places of the world; but, in order to shield it, you have so to look to it that you cannot see by it. Any wind of opposing influence may extinguish it. Put your thought into a habit, and instead of a glaring candle you will have a steady lamp. —Lynch, 1818-1871.

(4862.) Man's fickle mind treats universal truths that come from heaven as the eye treats the visible heaven itself. At a distance from the observer, all around the blue canopy seems to descend and lean upon the earth, but where he stands it is far above, out of his sight. It touches him not at all; and when he goes forward to the line where now it seems to touch other men, he finds it still far above, and the point which applies to this lower world is as distant as ever.

Heavenly truth, like heaven, seems to touch all the world around, but not his own immediate sphere, or himself, its centre. The grandest truths are practically lost in this way when they are left whole. We must rightly divide the word, and let the bits come into every crook of our own character. Besides the assent to general truth, there must be specific personal application. A man may own omniscience, and yet live without God in the world. —Arnold.

(4863.) We, as Christians, have more than an external relation to Gospel truth—even an internal one. We have an external relation to every truth known to the mind—the relation of knowledge, of intellectual apprehension, of mental discernment. Such is the relation which thousands have to the truth of Scripture. Intellectually they believe it. They have a connection with Christianity, and yet are not Christians. They take the Bible very much as the ice takes the sun. They give it a surface-reception: they take it upon themselves, not into themselves. But the Christian takes the truth as it is in Christ, not as the ice, but as the earth takes the sun—into himself. His connection with it is not an external, but an internal, a responsive connection. When the sun comes creeping up the eastern sky in winter, how coldly he is received! The earth gives no greeting; makes no response as he approaches. His beams can send no thrill along the ice; can start no pulsation amid the snow; can quicken no energy in the leafless trees; can bring no flush to the face of the sky. He shines in vain, because his rays elicit no response, quicken no germinant power. And yet the ice, and snow, and trees, and sky have a relation to the sun, even in midwinter; but it is not a warm, lively relation, but a cold and lifeless one—an external relation only. So it is with many touching Gospel truths. It shines upon them; but it stirs no response in their hearts: it sheds itself down upon them; but they give nothing back to it: it brings them out of darkness, even as the sun brings the ice out of the gloom of night; but they keep their fixed, frozen, insensible state still. Their relation to it is a mere external, unsympathetic, accidental relation. But consider the sun when he comes wheeling his way back from the south in the glad spring-season. How the earth hails him each morning with a greeting warmer and sweeter at each repetition ! The ice repents of its coldness, and weeps its iciness away ; the snow hurries along in rivulets, as if glad to lose its own life in ministering to others ; the trees lose their rigidity, and no longer resist the breezes, but yield coquettishly to them : everything seems compliant. And how powerful the sun is ! How the earth-pulses beat at his coming ! How the ground thrills and heaves with up-pushing growth ! How the grasses multiply themselves ! and the flowers—how they bud and blossom ! The leaves thicken along the landscape, and the earth hails the sun in its wealth of overflowing life. It is true the earth would be nothing without the sun ; but how it glorifies him ! how sweetly it responds to his solicitation ! and how it pays him back for all his ministrations to it ! Its relation to him, you see, friends, is far other than it was in winter. It is now an internal, a vital, a responsive relation—a relation powerful in its effects, and beautiful in its results. And so, when Christ comes up in all the glory and warmth of His love, stands over a man, and, in a thousand convictions and ten thousand promptings, sheds Himself down upon him, and the man opens his nature to Him, and receives Him, he is quickened in all the forces of his nature. He begins to flower out morally, and be clothed upon in beauty. His relation to Christ is no longer an external one ; it is no longer inefficient ; it is an internal, a vital, and a vitalising relation. He does more than apprehend truth ; he loves it. Heart, hand, eye, every sense and faculty, are capable of new and happy sensations. Christ is no longer afar off, a being to discuss and speculate about ; He is in him as the leaven is in the loaf—a power whose workings are felt, and whose effects are seen.

—Murray.

8. When once attained is never to be surrendered.

(1.) Not even when its advocates prove inconsistent and unworthy.

(4864.) Truths in many professors' minds, are not as stars fixed in the heavens, but like meteors that dance in the air ; they are not as characters engraven in marble, but writ in the dust, which every wind and idle breath of seducers deface. Many entertain opinions, as some entertain suitors, not that they mean to marry them, but cast them off as soon as new ones come.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4865.) No man that is himself sober will think the worst name of whosoever shall have said the same thing were a prejudice to it, or should more oblige him to reject it, than we should think ourselves obliged to throw away gold or diamonds, because an impure hand has touched them, or to deny Christ, because the devils confessed Him.

—Howe, 1630-1705.

(4866.) You should be careful not to slight any truth because some weak person may happen to hold it, or some bad character may chance to defend it, or because it may be spoken to you in a wrong temper, or at an improper season. Recollect that a guinea is exactly of the same value to you in whatever way it is presented. Regardless of the mind of the giver, you would say—"Gold is gold." Now I only ask that you would, in the same way, reflect that truth is truth, and that truth will serve you where gold cannot. "Buy thou," therefore "the truth, and sell it not" on any account whatever. Stand by it, and it will stand by thee ; truth is great, and shall prevail ! Cecil, 1748-1810.

(2.) Not even when it is assailed by doubt.

(4867.) When the ship shakes, do not throw yourself into the sea. When storms of doubt assault spiritual truth, do not abandon yourself to the wild evil of the world that "cannot rest." The ship rolls in the wind, but by the wind advances. —Lynch, 1818-1871.

(4868.) We must not let go manifest truths because we cannot answer all questions about them. —Jeremy Collier, 1650-1726.

(3.) Not even when its evidences are for a time obscured.

(4869.) When, upon sober trial, you have discerned the evidences of the Christian verity, record what you have found true ; and judge not the next time against those evidences, till you have equal opportunity for a full consideration of them.

In this case the tempter much abuseth many injudicious souls : when, by good advice and most sober meditation, they have seen the evidence of truth in satisfying clearness, he will after surprise them when their minds are darker, or their thoughts more scattered, or the former evidence is out of mind, and push them on suddenly then to judge of the matters of immortality and of the Christian cause, that what he cannot get by truth of argument, he may get by the incapacity of the disputant ; as if a man that once saw a mountain some miles distant from him in a clear day, should be tempted to believe that he was deceived, because he seeth it not in a misty day, or when he is in a valley, or within the house ; or as if a man that in many days' hard study hath cast up an intricate, large account, and set it right under his hand, should be called suddenly to give up the same account anew, without looking on that which he before cast up, when, as if his first account be lost, he must have equal time, and help, and fitness, before he can set it as right again. Take it not, therefore, as any disparagement to the Christian truth, if you cannot on a sudden give yourselves so satisfactory an account of it as formerly, in more clearness and by greater studies you have done.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4870.) If a man came to you, and began by innuendos, and insinuations, or even by explicit assertions for which he offered proof, to endeavour to destroy your confidence in an old and tried friend, what would you do ? Why, I suppose you would indignantly refuse to listen to that man ; you would turn him out. So, I often think, it ought to be with an old tried doctrine, a vital part of our Christian faith. Might we not in such a case say?—"Now, I shall not listen to anything against that. I am sure it is true. I made sure of that long ago. I have my proofs at hand, ready for production : but once upon a time I went fully into them, and satisfied myself : and I will not be made restless and unhappy by having my confidence in that old truth assailed and shaken."

I do not say that the right course is the same for every one here. Doubtless there are those whose vocation it is to face and examine and answer each new objection as it is raised; who have the time, the learning, the training, that are needful; who would shamefully fail of their duty if they failed to do so. But surely the ordinary believer, who can live by the faith of which he would make but a poor defender, may fitly say that there are truths about which he will not reason, as there are dear friends against whom he will not hear a word.

—Boyd.

(4.) Not even when our reasons for holding it are disproved.

(4871.) There is not one Christian of many thousands that at first hath a full sight of the solid evidences of the Christian doctrine; but must grow more and more in discerning those reasons for the truth which he believeth, which in the beginning he did not well discern. It is not the most confident belief that is always the strongest confirmed belief; but there must be sound grounds and evidence to support that confidence, or else the confidence may soon be shaken; and is not sound, even while it seems unshaken. And here young beginners must be forewarned of a most dangerous snare of the deceiver, because at first the truth itself is commonly received upon feeble and defective grounds or evidence. It is the custom of the devil and his deceiving instruments to show the young Christian the weakness of those grounds, and thence to conclude that his case is naught. For it is too easy to persuade such that the cause have no better grounds than they have seen. For having not seen any better, they can have no particular knowledge of them. And they are too apt to think over-highly of their knowledge, as if there were no more reasons for the truth than they themselves have reached to, and other men did see no more than they. And thus poor souls forsake the truth, which they should be built up and confirmed in; and take that for a reason against the truth, which is but a proof of their own infirmity. I meet with very few that turn to any heresy or sect, but this is the cause. They were at first of the right mind, but not upon sound and well-laid grounds; but held the truth upon insufficient reasons. And then comes some deceiver and beats them out of their former grounds, and so having no better, they let go the truth and conclude that they were all this while mistaken. Just as if, in my infancy, I should know my own father only by clothes, and when I grow a little bigger one should tell me that I was deceived, this is not my father, and to convince me should put his clothes upon another, or tell me that another may have such clothes, and hereupon I should be so foolish as to yield that I was mistaken, and that this man is not my father. As if the thing were false because my reasons were insufficient. Or as if you should ask the right way in your travel, and one should tell you that by such and such marks you may know your way; and think you have found those marks a mile or two short of the place where they are; but when you understand that those are not the marks that you were told of, you turn back again before you come at them, and conclude that you have missed the way. So it is with these poor deluded souls, that think all discoveries of their own imperfections, and every confutation of their own silly arguments, to be a confutation of the truths of God which they did hold; when, alas, a strong, well-grounded Christian would make nothing of defending the cause which they give up against more strong and subtle enemies, or, at least, would hold it fast themselves.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

9. Importance of a comprehensive and methodical study of truth.

(4872.) I beseech you, Christians, consider of this weighty truth; it is not the knowledge of the truth that will serve your turns, without a true and solid knowledge of that truth; nor is it the hearing or understanding of the best grounds and reasons, or proofs in the world, that will serve the turn, unless you have a deep and solid apprehension of those proofs and reasons. A man that hath the best arguments may forsake the truth, because he hath not a good understanding of those arguments. As a man that hath the best weapons in the world may be killed for want of strength and skill to use them.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4873.) It is a rare thing to have young professors to understand the necessary truths methodically. And this is a very great defect. For a great part of the usefulness and excellency of particular truths consisteth in the respect they have to one another. This, therefore, will be a considerable part of your confirmation and growth to your understandings, to see the body of Christian doctrine, as it were, at one view, as the several parts of it are united in one perfect frame; and to know what aspect one point hath upon another, and which are their due places. There is a great difference between the sight of the several parts of a clock or watch, as they are disjointed, and scattered about, and the seeing them conjoined, and in use and motion. To see here a pin, and there a wheel, and not know how to set them all together, nor ever see them in their due places, will give but little satisfaction. It is the frame and design of holy doctrine that must be known, and every part should be discerned as it hath its particular use to that design, and as it is connected with the other parts. By this means only can the true nature of theology, together with the harmony and perfection of truth, be clearly understood. And every single truth also will be much better perceived by him that seeth its place and order, than by any other. For one truth exceedingly illustrates and leads in another into our understanding.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4874.) There has seldom been an error which did not include some important truth; but just as surely as it included some truth, so it excluded others. And just as oxygen alone will never make the atmosphere, or hydrogen alone will never make the ocean, or red beams alone will never make the sun, so one fact, or one set of ideas, will never make the truth. A truth, by abiding alone, becomes to all intents an error.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

10. Its gradual development.

(4875.) God hath several truths for several ages and generations: as in a great house there are hangings for every room, and the hangings of this room are not fit for that, and the hangings of that are not fit for another; so God hath several hangings of truth, to furnish several generations; and those that are fit for this, are not fit for that. Says Luther: "I see many things that were not seen by Augustine ; and those that come after me shall see many things that I see not." "Oh," says Augustine, "there is such a depth in Scripture, that I am ignorant of more things than I know." Ye see how it is in a room where there are many pictures ; though ye see some of them presently, yet others have a silken curtain drawn before them, which ye see not immediately ; so here, though God do reveal much unto you, yet there is a silken curtain that is still drawn before some truths, and therefore even a good man may be much mistaken.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

11. New truths are to be welcomed.

(4876.) Pray, friends, why should we be afraid of new lights ? for why should there not be new lights found out in the firmament of the Scripture, as well as the astrologers find out new stars in heaven ? Be not afraid to set open your windows for any light that God shall make known unto you.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4877.) It is a profound mistake to think everything has been discovered ; it is the same as to consider the horizon to be the boundary of the world.

—Lemierre.

(4878.) Truth is many sided, like a cube ; and we should never be so tenacious of the aspect of it which is familiar to us, as not to be ready to come round and view it under another man's aspect. And as for lamenting that progress of thought, which is continually presenting the truth in different aspects, such lamentations are as foolish as they are fruitless. Must the forms of thought, which satisfied men in a former generation, necessarily content us now ? Before they can be expected to do so, you must lay a prohibition upon the intellectual growth of the species, and bid the human mind, as Joshua bade the sun, stand still.

—Goulburn.

WATCHFULNESS.

I. EXPLAINED.

(4879.) The term is one of varied significancy. It seems to mean, sometimes, only alertness ; then vigilance, or that state of attention to one's duty which we familiarly style being wide awake—a state in which a man is prepared for every instant duty. It signifies, also, outlooking, apprehension of danger, as when a sailor is on the outlook, or as when a sentinel is peering on every side, suspicious of some lurking foe. It also includes forecast, a kind of minor prophecy of prudence and sagacity, by which one anticipates dangers or needs, and provides for them before they happen. In short, watching includes every shade of that state which puts a mind in earnest to avoid evil and secure good. It represents a man roused up, and making his moral goodness an object of constant, thorough attention.

—Becher.

II. WHY WATCHFULNESS IS NECESSARY.

1. Because our enemy is always awake.

(4880.) Consider, the devil is always awake ; is it time for them in the city to sleep when the enemy without watch, and may be are climbing the walls ? Our Saviour takes it for granted that if "the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up ;" of all nights in the year, he would not then have slept. Would Saul have slept in his trench if he had thought David had been so near ? or Sisera have lain down to rest if he had seen the hammer and nail in Jael's hand ? "Hannibal is at the gates !" was enough to wake the whole city of Rome, and call them to their arms ; and is not "The devil is at thy door," enough to keep thee out of thy bed of sloth and negligence ?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Because no man is free from temptation.

(4881.) A countryman was riding with an unknown traveller (whom he conceived honest) over a dangerous plain—"This place," said he, "is infamous for robbery ; but, for my own part, though often riding over it early and late, I never saw anything worse than myself." "In good time," replied the other ; and presently demanded his purse and robbed him. Thus it is that no place, no company, no age, no person is temptation-free. Let no man brag that he was never tempted, let him not be high-minded, but fear, for he may be surprised in that very instant wherein he boasteth that he was never tempted at all.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(4882.) All men's faults are not written on their foreheads, and it's quite as well they are not, or hats would need wide brims ; yet as sure as eggs are eggs, faults of some sort nestle in every man's bosom. There's no telling when a man's sins may show themselves, for hares pop out of the ditch just when you are not looking for them. A horse that is weak in the legs may not stumble for a mile or two, but it is in him, and the rider had better hold him up well. The tabby cat is not lapping milk just now, but leave the dairy door open, and we will see if she is not as bad a thief as the kitten. There's fire in the flint, cool as it looks : wait till the steel gets a knock at it, and you will see. Everybody can read that riddle, but it is not everybody that will remember to keep his gunpowder out of the way of the candle.

—Spurgeon.

3. Because we are never safe from temptation.

(4883.) If we would not be surprised and foiled by Satan, we must, after we have resisted him in one temptation, be prepared to withstand another ; we are not securely to give ourselves to rest, as though the war were at an end ; but as soldiers besieged, after they have sustained one assault and given the enemy the repulse, do not securely give themselves to idleness and sleep, but prepare all things ready for the next conflict, so we, in the intermission of the spiritual conflict, are to prepare ourselves for the next assault, using all means to confirm our strength where we discerned in the time of the fight we were most weak. Our enemy, like a roaring lion, continually ranges about, seeking whom he will devour ; his malice will not let him rest. Even when he seems to entertain a truce, he is most busy in plotting means whereby he may work our final destruction ; and, therefore, we are never more carefully to stand upon our guard than when this enemy seems to proclaim a peace, or flee away as though he were vanquished. The Christian soldier must avoid two evils—he must not faint or yield in the time of fight, and after a victory he must not wax insolent and secure. When he has overcome, he is so to behave himself as though he were presently again to be assaulted. For Satan's temptations, like the waves of the sea, do follow one in the neck of the other; and when one is past, another is ready to overwhelm us, if, like skilful pilots, we be not ready to break the violence of that which follows, as well as of that which went before.

—Downham, 1642.

(4884.) When the soul puts her danger furthest off, and lies most secure, then 'tis nearest; therefore labour to be constant in thy holy care—the want of this spoils all. Some you shall have, that after a great fall into a sin that hath bruised them sorely, will seem very careful for a time where they set their foot, how they walk, and what company they come in, but as soon as the soreness of their consciences wears off, their watch breaks up, and they are as careless as ever; like one that is very careful to shut up his shop strongly, and maybe sit up late to watch it also, for two or three nights after it hath been robbed, but then minds it no more.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. Because the path of duty is so narrow.

(4885.) He had need be awake that walks upon the brim of a deep river or brow of a steep hill. The Christian's path is so narrow, and the danger is so great, as calls for both a minute eye to discern and a steady eye to direct; but a sleepy eye can do neither. Look upon any duty or grace, and you will find it lie between Scylla and Charybdis—two extremes alike dangerous. Faith cuts its way between the Mountain of Presumption and the Gulf of Despair; patience, between stupidity and discontent. The like we may say of the rest. No truth but hath some error next door to her; no duty can be performed without approaching very near the enemy's quarters, who soon takes the alarm, and comes out to oppose the Christian. Ought he not then to have always his heart on the watch?
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

5. Because of the difficulty of the Christian's task.

(4886.) The Christian's work is too curious to be done well between sleeping and waking, and too important to be done ill, and slubbered over, no matter how.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

6. Because of the tendency of the heart to recur to its old sins.

(4887.) So long as you bear about these sinful bodies, never count any corruption to be so dead in you that you are perfectly safe from it henceforth. Much that seems dead, by a sad experience, will be shown to have been only sleeping; like snakes, which, frozen in winter, lose for a while their power to harm, appear as though there were no life in them, but, brought to warmth, can hiss and sting again. How many an old corruption is perhaps at this very moment thus torpid within us, which yet only waits the returning warmth of a suitable temptation to revive in all its malignant strength.
—Trench.

7. Because one hour of heedlessness may be the ruin of the soul.

(4888.) A scrivener, after he has spent many days and taken much pains upon a large patent or lease, may at the last word make such a blot that he shall be forced to write it all over again. So some foul and enormous crime may dash and obliterate the fair copy of a virtuous life—may raze all the golden characters of Divine graces printed in the soul. As one drop of ink coloureth a whole glass of clear water, so one sinful and shameful action staineth all the former good life; all our fastings and prayers, all our sufferings for righteousness, all the good thoughts we ever conceived, all the good words we ever uttered, all the good works we ever performed, are lost at the very instant of our backsliding.

—Featley, 1582-1644.

(4889.) We are always alert and watchful when carrying the body among its ten thousand adversaries. This is the only way for the body. Danger must be avoided, and not healed in its effects. Life is not long enough to afford time to patch up all the mischiefs which would ensue if one did not foresee and avoid danger.

But the soul is more sensitive than the body. It has a greater surface, it has more branches, it has more arms and feet, it has more nerves, it has more injurable attributes, than the body. It carries them, too, amidst flying missiles, countless, endless in succession. When the fire touches gauze, it is too late then to interfere; you must not let it touch it. When the rap is given to the crystal vase, it is too late then to save it; you must keep it free from the blow. When the frost has struck the flower, watching is then remediless: you must keep it where the frost cannot reach it. We must keep sensitive things free from rude contacts. That is true wisdom in practical life. And when this task respects the whole soul, and all its tenuous, invisible, super-sensitive faculties, how much more important is pre-vigilance!
—Becker.

(4890.) There is great need, also, of watchfulness on account of dispositions which act subtly, and whose nature is to be instantaneous. When a man has once got into the rapids at Niagara, the next thing he will do will be to go over the Falls. Having once got in, there is no possibility of his getting out. The way for him to escape going over the Falls is not to get into the rapids. When a man has once got a spark in his powder, he need not clap his hand on it to keep it from going off. It will do no good. The only way for him to keep it from going off, is to keep the spark away from it. Many men can let the cup alone if they keep away from it, who cannot if they go where it is. Many men can abstain from lust if they do not go within the circuit of its malaria, who cannot free themselves from it after they have once become infected by it. Many men can control their temper so long as they avoid everything calculated to arouse it, who have no power over it after it has once become aroused. Many of our dispositions must be taken care of beforehand—not afterwards. And when they have led us into wrong courses, our sin consists in the fact that we did not learn enough about ourselves to know that some parts of our nature were not to be exposed—that some parts of our nature can be carried with watching, with vigilant forelooking. It is as if there had been written, in letters of fire, on the signal-posts of life, by the hand of God, the words, "Watch! Watch unto prayer! Watch and pray! Watch unto the end!" to take away the excuses of men for the evils they commit under the influence of their inflammatory dispositions. —Becher.

III. OUR VIGILANCE MUST BE COMPREHENSIVE.

(4891.) A doe that had but one eye used to graze near the sea; and that she might be the more secure from harm, she kept her blind side towards the water, from whence she had no apprehension of danger, and with the other surveyed the country as she fed. By this vigilance and precaution, she thought herself in the utmost security, when a sly fellow with two or three of his companions, who had been poaching after her for several days to no purpose, at last took a boat, and, fetching a compass upon the sea, came gently down upon her and shot her. The doe, in the agonies of death, breathed out this doleful complaint, "O hard fate! that I should receive my death-wound from that side whence I expected no ill, and be safe in that part where I looked for most danger."

—Aesop's Fables.

(4892.) Watch universally; watch thy whole man. The honest watchman walks the rounds, and compasseth the whole town. He doth not limit his care to this house or that. So do thou watch over thy whole man. A pore in thy body is a door wide enough to let in a disease, if God command; and any one faculty of thy soul, or member of thy body, to let in an enemy that may endanger thy spiritual welfare.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4893.) The city cannot be safe, unless the whole line be kept, it is all one whether the enemy breaks in at the front, flank, or rear of an army; or whether the ship be taken at sea, or sink in the haven when the voyage is over.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4894.) Many a city has been taken on its strongest side, which was counted so strong that no watch was kept, even as no danger was dreaded there. We think that we are not exposed to one particular form of temptation; let none be too sure of this; and in resisting one form of evil, never let us forget that there are others in the world. Fleshly sins may be watched against, and yet room be given in the heart for spiritual wickedness, pride, self-righteousness, and the like. The victories gained over the lusts of the flesh may minister to those subtler mischiefs of the spirit; and our fate may be like that of the hero in the Maccabees, who was crushed by the falling elephant himself had slain. There is a white devil of spiritual pride as well as a black devil of fleshly lusts; and if only Satan can ruin us, it is all the same to him by what engines he does it; it is all the same to him whether we go down into hell as gross carnal sinners or as elated self-righteous saints. Set a watch, therefore, all round your heart; not on one side only, but on all; for you can never be sure on which side temptation will assail. —Trench.

IV. THINGS AGAINST WHICH WE NEED TO BE ESPECIALLY WATCHFUL.

1. Our senses.

(4895.) Set a strong guard about thy outward senses: these are Satan's landing places, especially the eye and the ear. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Our weak places.

(4896.) The old Greek poet sang of Achilles that his mother dipped him when a child in the river Lethe, and thereby rendered his whole body invulnerable, except only his heel, by which she held him. He went to Troy, and wrought prodigies of valour in the war; till at last an arrow hit him in the one weak point, and he fell.

This old story has too often its parallel in the Church of God. Some veteran in the Lord's army, who has long fought bravely and successfully for his Captain, suddenly falls, and all men marvel at his fall. There was some weak point in his "breast-plate." The devil saw it and smote him there. Thus it was with Noah, and Abraham, and Moses, and David, and Peter, and a host of eminent saints since. Every Christian man, however holy, has one or more weak points in his character, and over these it behoves him to keep especial guard.

—Aubrey C. Price.

3. Little sins.

(4897.) The truly pious is never at rest in his mind but when he stands upon his guard against the most minute and unobservable encroachments of sin, as knowing them upon this account more dangerous than greater; that the enemy that is least feared is usually the soonest felt. For as in the robbing of a house, it is the custom for the sturdiest thieves to put in some little boy at the window, who being once within may easily open the doors and let them in too, so the tempter, in rifling the soul, despairs for the most part to attempt his entrance by some gross sin, and therefore employs a lesser, that may slide into it insensibly; which yet, little as it is, will so unlock the bars of conscience that the most enormous abominations shall at length make their entrance, and take possession of it. Let no man measure the smallness of his danger by the smallness of any sin; for the smaller the sin the greater may be the stratagem. Some have been choked by a fly, a crumb, a grape-stone: such contemptible things carry in them the causes of death; and the soul may be destroyed by sinful desires, idle words, officious lies, as well as by perjuries, blasphemies, and murders. Those who consider in how many ways a soul may be ruined, will not count it scrupulosity to beware of the least and slenderest instruments of damnation.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4898.) Watch against little sins. So we call them; but in fact no transgression of the laws of an infinite and holy God can be really little. The authority they violate, the majesty they insult, magnifies their guilt. And little sins are the beginnings of great ones. The explosion is in the spark, the upas-tree is in its seed, the fiery serpent is in the smooth egg, the fierce tiger is in the playful cub. "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer:" and "Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." By many little wounds death may be caused as surely as one deep gash. Yes, and through one small vein, if kept open, the heart's blood may flow not less fatally than through a main artery. A few drops oozing through an embankment may make a passage for the whole lake of waters. The tiny streams percolating the mountain side may gather in some hidden chamber until (with strength intensified by every inch of the watery column which enters it from above, though that column be composed of but single drops) by hydraulic pressure it heaves up the solid rocks with earthquake strength. A green log is safe in the company of a candle; but if a few shavings are just lighted, and then some dry sticks, the green log will not long resist the flames. How often has a character which seemed steadfast been destroyed by little sins: Satan seldom assails in the first instance with great temptations. Skillful general! he makes his approaches gradually, and by zig-zag trenches creeps towards the fortress he intends at length to storm.

—Newman Hall.

4. Our old sins.

(4899.) Watch against old sins. Sitting on a flowery bank, a viper crawled forth and bit us. Great were the pain and the peril before the wound was healed. Shall we carelessly choose that very bank on which again to rest? Would it be wise to let the pale primrose and the fragrant violet tempt us where deadly reptiles may still make their nest? Let us watch against the delusion that there is no longer need to watch. After a severe struggle the victory was won over our reigning lusts, and we fancy that the peril is past. But let us watch. The rebellion has been put down; but though its armies have been scattered and its prince dethroned, many traitors lurk in secret places watching for opportunities to renew the struggle. The embankment is weak where it once gave way; and though the breach has been repaired it must be diligently watched. The flames have been put out, but the ashes are still smouldering; and, if the wind rises, the fire may burst forth anew.

—Newman Hall.

5. Beloved and besetting sins.

(4900.) Look upon a city besieged, how wise governors will take care of every postern-door and of every part of the wall, and repair the least decays thereof, but if one gate be more likely to be entered than another, or if any part of the wall be weaker or more easily to be thrown down than another, they will be sure to set the strongest watch in that place where the danger is most. And so it is, or should be, with us in respect of our most precious souls: we have here a fort to keep, which is every day assaulted by our enemies, and we have a diseased soul of our own, distempered with many spiritual maladies; but some of them are worse than others, and some parts of the fort are weaker and more in danger than others are—that is, there are some sins, as sins whereunto by constitution of body we are most inclined, such as are Delilah, bosom-beloved sins, by which the devil more easily surpriseth and captivateth our souls; and therefore, as we should set diligent watch against all sins, so we should especially bend our forces against those that do or may in a more especial manner breed our harm and hinder our salvation.

—Marshall, 1655.

6. New sins.

(4901.) Watch against new sins. "We have turned every one to his own way." But paths hitherto unattractive may allure us. Many a Christian, through lack of watchfulness, has been overpowered by temptations which, before his conversion, never assailed him. That we have never yielded to a particular sin is no proof that we never shall. No act of David's former life rendered conceivable the treacherous murder of his brave and faithful captain; nor could Peter or his companions have imagined that he, the most zealous of them all, would ever, through shame and cowardice, disclaim his discipleship. None can tell what possibilities of wickedness lurk within. We may indignantly ask, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" Yet when the foe finds us slumbering there is no kind of sin by which we may not, like Peter, deny that we know the Lord. He is an unwise commander who plants no sentries in quarters which the foe has never yet assailed. While a show of attack is kept up on yonder bastions, and cannon vainly thunder against the main entrance over which the banner of the garrison flutters defiance, a small but resolute band, without drums and trumpets, without waving plumes and flashing scarlet, but with deadly weapons concealed beneath their gray disguises, are creeping unobserved amongst those rocky crags in the rear, which, because never yet scaled, were supposed to be inaccessible. No sentry above is peering down to detect the coming danger, and in the roar of the sham attack, the accidental noises made by the real assailants are unheard. And now they reach the summit and seize the citadel, while its commander still dreams he is successfully resisting the attack. Ah, how many a fortress has been captured on the side which seemed too safe to need defence!

—Newman Hall.

V. TIMES WHEN WATCHFULNESS IS SPECIALLY NECESSARY.

(4902.) Satan tempts after some discoveries of God's love. As a pirate sets on the ship that is richly laden, so when a soul hath been laden with spiritual comforts the devil will be shooting at him, to rob him of all. The devil envies to see a soul feasted with spiritual joy. Joseph's party-coloured coat made his brethren envy him and plot against him. After David had the good news of the pardon of his sin, which must needs have filled him with consolation, Satan presently tempted him to a new sin in numbering the people; and so all his comfort was spilt.

—Watson, 1696.

(4903.) Be as careful, Christian, after extraordinary prayer, as a man would be after taking strong physic; a little disorder in thy walking may be of sad consequence. Thou mayest soon do thyself more mischief than all the devils in hell can do thee.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4904.) There are critical times of danger. After great services, honours, and consolations, we should stand upon our guard. Noah, Lot, David, and Solomon fell in these circumstances. Satan is a foot-pad: a foot-pad will not attack a man going to the bank, but in returning with his pocket full of money.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(4905.) Demean thyself more warily in thy study than in the street. If thy public actions have a hundred witnesses, thy private have a thousand. The multitude looks but upon thy actions; thy conscience looks into them: the multitude may chance to excuse thee, if not acquit thee; thy conscience will accuse thee, if not condemn thee.

—Quarles, 1592-1644.

VI. MUST BE COMJOINED WITH PRAYER.

(4906.) He that prays, and does not follow it with watching, is like him that sows his field with precious seed, but leaves the gate open for swine to come and rout it up. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4907.) Watchfulness without prayer is presumption, and prayer without watchfulness is a mockery; by the first a man invades God's part in this great work, and by the latter he neglects his own. Prayer not assisted by practice is laziness, and contradicted by practice is hypocrisy; it is indeed of mighty force and use within its proper compass, but it was never designed to supply the room of watchfulness, or to make wish serve instead of endeavour.

God generally gives spiritual blessings and deliverance as He does temporal, that is, by the mediation of an active and vigorous industry. The fruits of the earth are the gift of God, and we pray for them as such; but yet we plant, and we sow, and we plough for all that; and the hands which are sometimes lifted up in prayer, must at other times be put to the plough, or the husbandman must expect no crop. Everything must be effected in the way proper to its nature, with the concurrent influence of the divine grace, not to supersede the means, but to prosper and make them effectual.

And upon this account men deceive themselves most grossly and wretchedly, when they expect that from prayer which God never intended for it. He who hopes to be delivered from temptation merely by praying against it, affronts God, and deludes himself, and might to as much purpose fall asleep in the midst of his prayers as do nothing but sleep after them. Some ruin their souls by neglect of prayer, and some perhaps do them as much mischief by adoring it, while, by placing their whole entire confidence in it, they commit an old piece of idolatry and make a god of their very devotions. I have heard of one, and him none of the strictest livers, who yet would be sure to say his prayers every morning, and when he had done bid the devil do his worst, thus using prayer as a kind of spell or charm; but the old serpent was not to be charmed thus; and so no wonder if the devil took him at his word, and used him accordingly.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4908.) Let watchfulness and prayerfulness keep pace with each other. Some are very vigilant, but too self-reliant. They resemble a sentinel who, in the dark night, discovers the foe approaching, and goes forth alone to meet an armed multitude. They lift up brave hands against their spiritual foes, but do not lift up holy hands without doubting to the Captain of our salvation. Others are very devout, but not so circumspect as they might be.

—T. R. Stevenson.

(4909.) In respect to all your faults, you must watch. Prayer will not help you unless you have done that. It will not have time to help you. Praying is a good thing; but after the boiler is burst, and you are thirty feet in air, it is not exactly the time to pray. You should have watched the steam-gauge, and seen to it that the boiler did not burst.

—Becher.

(4910.) With this vigilance prayer is to be joined. When fleets near the coast at night, they give and receive signals. It is not enough that lighthouses warn them of danger; so they throw up rockets as signals, to be answered by other signals from the land. Now I think these signals are much like our prayers and the answers to them which we receive. God has set lighthouses of promises all through the Bible; but we want something more than these; so He permits us to throw up rockets of desire; and He signals back to us. Therefore watch and pray; watch as those that are talking with God; watch as those that have felt the affinity of God's soul with theirs, and are living as in the presence of the invisible One. Then watching will become easy; and then it will become potent.

—Becher.

VII. ITS ADVANTAGES.

(4911.) In Tynedale, where I was born, not far from the Scottish borders, I have known my countrymen to watch every night and day in their harness, such as they had, and their spears in their hands, especially when they had any privy warning of the coming of the Scots. And so doing, although at every such beckoning some of them spent their lives, yet by such means they defended their country. And those that so died, I think that before God they died in a good quarrel. Shall we not go always armed, ever looking when our adversary shall come upon us by our slothfulness?

—Ridley, 1554.

(4912.) By thy watchfulness thou shalt best learn the evil of a sleepy state; one asleep is not sensible of his own snoring, how uncomely and troublesome it is to others; but he that is awake is apprehensive of both. So, while thou art spiritually awake, thou wilt observe many uncomely passages in the lives of drowsy professors, which will put thee on thy guard against the same drowsiness.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

VIII. WATCHFULNESS AND HAPPINESS ARE NOT INCOMPATIBLE.

(4913.) Watch unto prayer! Many have supposed that it was impossible to be in this state of watchfulness, and yet be a buoyant singing Christian. Just as though a man could not whistle while acting as a sentinel! Just as though he could not think of home, of his lady-love, and of a thousand things beside, while faithfully watching at his post.

—Becher.

IX. A CAUTION.

(4914.) Natures that are constitutionally over-prone to vigilance, are apt conscientiously to redouble that which they do not need in such measure. They are of opinion that fear is almost a positive Christian grace. They not only set a needless number of sentinels about the dwelling of their soul, but they seem to frequent the company of the sentinels without more than that of guests that are, or should be, within. Many a man has little time for Christ inside, because he is so busy watching the devil outside. There is a religion which is more in fear of evil than in enjoyment of good. There are a great many men that have never yet known the profound philosophy of the command: "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." The way to overcome evil is, sometimes, to watch it; but a man who does nothing but watch evil will never overcome it.

—Becher.

WICKED. THE

I. THEIR GUILT.

1. They are practical atheists.

(4915.) As a scholar, if his master should stand in a corner of the school to watch what he will do, will behave himself while he seeth him not as if he were not there: he will play with his fellows and talk to them, as if there were no master in the school; so do the ungodly live in the world, as if there were no God in the world; they think, and speak, and deal with the world, as if there were nothing but the world for them to converse with. As for God, they know Him not, but carry themselves as if they had nothing to do with Him, and ask in their hearts, as Pharaoh once did, "Who is the Lord that I should serve Him?" And perhaps this made David say, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God."

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. Their moral nature is corrupt.

(4916.) The heart of the wicked swarms with sins like an ant-hill with ants. It is like a piece of bad meat full of worms.

—Vianney.

3. They cleave to the world as the chief good.

(4917.) The heart of man cannot be in this world without a hope; and if it hath no hope for heaven, it must of necessity take in at earth, and borrow one there, such as it can afford. What indeed can suit an earthly heart better than an earthly hope? And that which is a man's hope (though poor and peddling) is highly prized, and hardly parted with; as we see in a man like to drown, and hath only some weed or bough by the bank's side to hold by, he'll die with it in his hand rather than let go; he'll endure blows and wounds, rather than lose his hold: nothing can take him from it, but that which he hopes may serve better to save him from drowning. Thus it is with a man whose hope is set upon the world, and who expects his happiness to be paid for from thence. Oh how such a one hugs and hangs about the world! you may as soon persuade a fox to come out of his hole, where he hath taken sanctuary from the dogs. Such a one to cast off his hopes! no, he is undone without this pelf, and that honour; it is that he hath laid up his hopes in, and hope and life are ever kept in the same hand; scare and threaten him with what you will, still the man's heart will hold its own. Yea, throw hell-fire into his bosom, and tell him this love of the world, and making gold his hope, will damn him another day, still he will hold to his way. Felix is a fit instance for this. Paul preached a thundering sermon before him; and though the preacher was at the bar, and Felix on the bench, yet God so armed the word, that he trembled to hear the prisoner speak of righteousness, and judgment to come: yet this man, notwithstanding his conscience was struggling with the fears of judgment, and some sparks of divine vengeance had taken fire on him, could at the same time be sending out his heart on a covetous errand, to look for a bribe, for want of which he left that blessed servant of God in his bloody enemies' hands; for it is said, "He hoped that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. They reject Christ and His salvation.

(4918.) If a wretched thief shall have committed many thefts and murders, and after that his wicked deeds were known the son of a king should be brought to be arraigned and condemned for the same, and so bear the punishment thereof, and this thief to be discharged and pardoned—if, hereupon, the thief should rejoice and make a scoff at him, when he seeth a son of the king to be put to death and suffer the punishment that he deserved, such a caittiff deserveth a most horrible death: even so at this present it fareth with us. Behold our Saviour Christ, the only Son of God, is imprisoned, and we delivered; He condemned, and we pardoned; He put to death, and to all shame, and we received to honour. It is not, therefore, for us to be drowsy-headed, and live securely, and to flatter ourselves in our sins and iniquities.

—Cawodray, 1609.

II. THEIR FOLLY.

1. In neglecting the great calling of their life.

(4919.) Do we count him a wise man, who is wise in anything but in his own proper profession and employment, wise for everybody but himself? who is ingenious to contrive his own misery and to do himself a mischief, but is dull and stupid as to the designing of any real benefit and advantage to himself? Such a one is he who is ingenious in his calling, but a bad Christian, for Christianity is more our proper calling and profession than the very trades we live upon: and such is every sinner who is "wise to do evil, but to do good hath no understanding."

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

2. In sacrificing eternity to time.

(4920.) Take a man that is most addicted to his pleasures, and bring him to the mouth of a furnace red-hot and flaming, and ask him, "How much pleasure wouldst thou take to continue burning in this furnace for one day?" He would answer undoubtedly, "I will not be tormented in it one day, to gain the whole world and all the pleasures of it." Ask him a second time, "What reward would you take to endure this fire half a day?" Propound what reward you will, there is nothing so precious which he could buy at so dear a rate as these torments; and yet how comes it to pass, O God, that for a little gain, and that vile; for a little honour, and that fugitive; for a little pleasure, and that fading; men so little regard hell-fire, which is eternal?

—Swinmock, 1673.

(4921.) To them who believe another life after this, an eternal state of happiness or misery in another world (which is but a reasonable postulation or demand among Christians), there is nothing in mathematics more demonstrable than the folly of wicked men; for it is not a clearer and more evident principle, that the whole is greater than a part, than that eternity, and the concerns of it, are to be preferred before time.

I will therefore put the matter into a temporal case, that wicked men who understand anything of the rules and principles of worldly wisdom may see the imprudence of an irreligious and sinful course, and be convinced that this their way is their folly, even themselves being judges.

Is that man wise, as to his body and his health, who only clothes his hands, but leaves his whole body naked? who provides only against the tooth-ache, and neglects whole troops of mortal diseases that are ready to rush in upon him? Just thus does he who takes care only for this vile body, but neglects his precious and immortal soul; who is very solicitous to prevent small and temporal inconveniences, but takes no care to escape the damnation of hell.

Is he a prudent man, as to his temporal estate, that lays designs only for a day, without any prospect to, or provision for, the remaining part of his life? even so does he that provides for the short time of his life, but takes no care for all eternity,—which is to be wise for a moment, but a fool for ever, and to act as untowardly and as crossly to the reason of things as can be imagined—to regard time as if it were eternity, and to neglect eternity as if it were but a short time. —Tillotson, 1630-1694.

3. In provoking God to anger.

(4922.) Is it wisdom in any man to neglect and disoblige Him who is his best friend, and can be his sorest enemy? or with one weak troop to go out to meet him that comes against him with thousands of thousands? to fly a small danger and run upon a greater? Thus does every wicked man that neglects and contemns God who can save or destroy him; who strives with his Maker and provoketh the Lord to jealousy, and with the small and inconsiderable forces of a man takes the field against the mighty God, the Lord of hosts; who fears them that can kill the body, but after that have no more that they can do; but fears not Him who, after He hath killed, can destroy both body and soul in hell; and thus does he who, for fear of anything in this world, ventures to displease God; for, in so doing, he runs away from men, and falls into the hands of the living God; he flies from a temporal danger, and leaps into hell. —Tillotson, 1630-1694.

4. In deferring repentance.

(4923.) Is not he an imprudent man, who in matters of greatest moment and concernment, neglects opportunities never to be retrieved; who, standing upon the shore, and seeing the tide making haste towards him apace, and that he hath but a few minutes to save himself, yet will lay himself to sleep there till the cruel sea rush in upon him and overwhelm him? And is he any better, who trifles away this day of God's grace and patience, and foolishly adjourns the necessary work of repentance and the weighty business of religion to a dying hour. —Tillotson, 1630-1694.

5. In despising God's threatenings.

(4924.) "The wicked," says the Psalmist, "contemn God;" and why? "because they say, He will not require." Where, they ask, is the promise of His coming? Ah, they forget that it is as true of God's threatenings as of His promises, that although He delays, He does not deny them. A reprieve is not a pardon. It defers the execution; but does not necessarily cancel the sentence. And how many men in business, hard pressed for money, and tottering on the edge of bankruptcy, have known too well that the bill which they had got the money-lender to renew was not thereby paid? that, however often renewed, it has still to be paid? and that the oftener, indeed, it is renewed, with interest added to the capital, the debt but grows the larger, the payment grows the heavier? Just so shall it be with you if you persist in rejecting the Saviour, whom in God's name I now press on your acceptance. Every day of mercy here will but aggravate the misery of hereafter, and the reckoning, by being long of coming, will be the more terrible when it comes—as that storm roars with the loudest thunder which has been the longest gathering.

—Guthrie.

6. In thoughtlessly following the multitude who do evil.

(4925.) I remember a passage a gentleman told me he saw upon a bridge over the Severn. A man was driving a flock of fat lambs, and something meeting them and hindering their passage, one of the lambs leaped upon the wall of the bridge, and his legs slipping from under him, he fell into the stream, and the rest seeing him did one after another leap over the bridge into the stream, and were all, or almost all, drowned. Those that were behind did little know what was become of them that were gone before, but thought that they might venture to follow their companions. But as soon as they were over the wall and falling headlong, the case was altered. Even so it is with unconverted carnal men—one dieth by them and drops into hell, and another follows the same way, and yet they will go after them because they think not whither they are going. Oh! but when death has once opened their eyes, and they see what is on the other side of the wall, even in another world, then what would they give to be where they were? —Baxter, 1615-1691.

7. In their heedlessness of the plainest warnings.

(4926.) Alas! how few thoughts do unholy wretches spend with themselves, in considering what is doing in another world? They see sinners die daily in the prosecution of their lusts, but do no more think what is become of them (that they are in hell burning and roaring for their sin), than the fish in the river do think what is become of their fellows that were twicht up by their gills from them, even now with the angler's hook, and cast into the seething pot or frying-pan alive. No, as those silly creatures are ready still to nibble and bite at the same hook that struck their fellows, even so are men and women forward to catch at those baits still of sinful pleasures, and wages of unrighteousness, by which so many millions of souls before them have been hooked into hell and damnation.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4927.) A recent traveller, relating the incidents of his voyage to India, writes:—"Flocks of greedy albatrosses, petrels, and Cape pigeons, crowded around the ship's stern. A hook was baited with fat, when upwards of a dozen albatrosses instantly rushed at it, and as one after another was being hauled on deck, the remainder, regardless of the struggles of the captured, and the vociferations of the crew, kept swimming about the stern. Not even did those birds which were indifferently hooked and made their escape, desist from seizing the bait a second time." Thus to the letter do ungodly men rush at the baits of Satan; they see others perish, but remain careless, and even when they are all but destroyed themselves they persist in their infatuation.

—Spurgeon.

8. In wasting upon trifles the time that should be used in securing the salvation of the soul.

(4928.) Miserable man, and art thou cutting thy short life out into chips, and spending thy little time upon trifles, when the salvation of thy soul is yet to be wrought out? Art thou tricking and trimming thy slimy carcass, while thy soul is dropping into hell? What is this, but to be painting the door, when the house is on fire; for a man to be curious about trimming his face, when he is not sure his head shall stand a day on his shoulders! It was an unseasonable time for Belshazzar to be feasting and quaffing, when his kingdom lay at stake, and an enemy at the gates. It would have become a wise prince to have been rather fighting on the wall, than feasting in his palace, and fattening himself for his own slaughter, which soon befell him (Dan. v. 30). And it would become thee better to call upon thy God, poor sinner, and lie in tears for thy sins at His foot, if yet haply thy pardon may be obtained, than by wallowing in thy sensual pleasures, to stupefy thy conscience, and lay it asleep, by which thou canst only gain a little ease from the troublesome thoughts of thy approaching misery.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

9. In using that time to prepare for themselves future misery.

(4929.) My children, if you saw a man prepare a great pile of wood, heaping up fagots one upon another, and when you asked him what he was doing, he were to answer you, I am preparing the fire that is to burn me, what would you think? And if you saw this same man set fire to the pile, and when it was lighted throw himself upon it, what would you say? This is what we do when we commit sin. It is not God who casts us into hell; we cast ourselves into it by our sins.

—Vianney.

10. In shrinking from hell but not from sin.

(4930.) You would not burn in hell, but you will kindle the fire by your sins, and cast yourselves into it; you would not be tormented with devils in hell, but you will do that which will certainly procure it in despite of all that can be said against it. It is just as if you would say, "I will drink this ratsbane, or other poison, but yet I would not die. I will cast myself headlong from the top of a steeple, but yet I will not take away my life. I will put this fire into the thatch of my house, but yet I will not burn it." Just so it is with wicked men. They will be wicked, and live after the flesh and the world, and yet they would not be damned. But do you not know, that the means do lead unto the end? and that God hath, by His righteous law, concluded, that ye must repent or perish? He that will take poison may as well say, "I will kill myself;" for it will prove no better in the end; though perhaps he loved it for the sweetness of the sugar that was mixed with it, and would not be persuaded it was poison, but that he might take it and do well enough; but it is not his conceits and confidence that will save his life. So if you will be drunkards, or fornicators, or worldlings, or live after the flesh, you may as well say plainly, "We will be damned;" for so you shall be unless you turn. Would you not rebuke the folly of a thief or murderer that would say, "I would steal or kill, but I will not be hanged;" when he knows, that if he do the one, the judge in justice will see that the other be done. If he says, "I will steal and murder," he may as well say plainly, "I will be hanged;" so if you will go on in a carnal life, you may as well say plainly, "We will go to hell."

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

11. In glorying in their prosperity.

(4931.) A man that is going to the gallows, for the present is well, has a great guard to attend him, an innumerable multitude of people to follow him. You would think that hardly could a man be such a sot and fool as to think all this should be done for his honour, and not for his punishment, and should only consider how he is accompanied, but not whither he goes. Many such fools there are in the world, that only consider how they are attended and provided for, but never consider whither they are going. "O wretch! whither goest thou?" we may say to one that should pride himself in the resort of company to his execution; "dost thou not see thou art led to punishment, and after an hour or two these will leave thee hanging and perishing infamously as the just reward of thine offences?" So many that shine now in the pomp and splendour of worldly accommodations, and are merry and jocund as if all would do well. Alas! poor creatures, whither are they going? "They take the timbrel and the harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ; they spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down into hell." Ye still live, and are going to punishment, but mind it not; but your wealth, and honours, and servants, and friends, will leave you to your own doom; and yet you are merry and jocund as if your journey would never end, or not so dismally; as if you were hastening to a kingdom, and not to an eternal prison. One moment puts an end to all their joy for ever.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

12. In mistaking their prosperity for an evidence of the Divine favour.

(4932.) No marvel if the worldling escape earthly afflictions. God corrects him not, because He loves him not. He is base born and begot. God will not do him the favour to whip him. The worlds afflict him not, because it loves him: for each man is indulgent to his own. God uses not the rod where He means to use the Word. The pillory or scourge is for those malefactors that shall escape execution.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4933.) I do not wonder that the wicked think they have God's blessings, because they are in the warm sun. They are like little children, who think every one loves them that gives them sugar-plums.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

13. In expecting at last to be admitted to heaven.

(4934.) Is he wise, who hopes to attain the end without the means, nay, by means that are quite contrary to it? such is every wicked man who hopes to be blessed hereafter without being holy here, and to be happy, that is, to find a pleasure in the enjoyment of God, and in the company of holy spirits, by rendering himself as unsuitable and unlike to them as he can.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

III. THEIR MISERY.

1. They are ignorant of the Author of their being, the purpose of their existence, and the source of true joy; and are thus pitiable as moral idiots.

(4935.) An ungodly man knoweth not that which he was made for. He is like a knife that cannot cut; a ship that will not endure the water: a house that is not fit to dwell in. What is a man's wit worth, but for its proper end? If man was made but to eat, and drink, and play, and sleep, and build, and plant, and stir awhile about the earth, and have his will over others, and his fleshly pleasure, and then die, then the ungodly may be called wise; but if he be made to prepare for another world, and to know, and love, and live to God, they are worse than bedlams, and more dangerously beside themselves.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4936.) Abraham sat one day in the grove at Mamre, leaning his head on his hand, and sorrowing. Then his son Isaac came to him and said, "My father, why mournest thou? what aileth thee?"

Abraham answered and said: "My soul mourneth for the people of Canaan, that they know not the Lord, but walk in their own ways, in darkness and foolishness."

"Oh, my father," answered the son, "is it only this? Let not thy heart be sorrowful, for are not these their own ways?"

Then the patriarch rose up from his seat, and said: "Come, and follow me." And he led the youth to a hut, and said to him: "Behold!"

There was a child which was imbecile, and the mother sat weeping by it. Abraham asked her: "Why weepest thou?"

Then the mother said: "Alas, this my son eateth and drinketh, and we minister unto him; but he knows not the face of his father nor of his mother. Thus his life is lost, and the source of joy is sealed to him."

Thus said the mother weeping; and Abraham went and preached the name of the Lord who made heaven and earth.

—F. A. Krummacher.

2. They are morally short-sighted.

(4937.) It is the misfortune of some to be afflicted with that kind of defective sight which prevents them from seeing to an ordinary distance; they are unable to distinguish the most towering and colossal objects if placed at a short remove, while the merest atom brought close to the eye is magnified as with a microscope. An affliction analogous to this in the moral sight, but pregnant with incomparably greater danger, is the universal malady of mankind; and our Lord insists on the urgency of its removal. He finds them mistaking phantoms for realities, and realities for phantoms; calling an atom a world, and a world an atom; practising on themselves an endless succession of delusions; and He gives them the alternative of a remedy, or death. He approaches them while gazing on the near prospectus of time, and by raising and extending the point of sight He adds eternity to the view, and leaves them lost in the contemplation of a boundless eternity.

—Harris.

2. They are excluded from the Divine promises, and exposed to the Divine wrath.

(4938.) He is Almighty to pardon; but He will not use it for thee an impenitent sinner. Thou hast not a friend on the bench, not an attribute in all God's name will speak for thee: Mercy itself will sit and vote with the rest of its fellow-attributes for thy damnation. God is able to save and help in a time of need; but upon what acquaintance is it that thou art so bold with God, as to expect His saving arm to be stretched forth for thee? Though a man will rise at midnight to let in a child that cries and knocks at his door, yet he will not take so much pains for a dog that lies howling there. This presents thy condition, sinner, sad enough, yet this is to tell thy story fairest; for that almighty power of God which is engaged for the believer's salvation, is as deeply obliged to bring thee to thy execution and damnation. What greater tie than an oath? God Himself is under an oath to be the destruction of every impenitent soul. That oath which God sware in His wrath against the unbelieving Israelites, that they should not enter into His rest, concerns every unbeliever to the end of the world. In the name of God consider, were it but the oath of a man, or a company of men, that like those in the Acts, should swear to be the death of such an one, and thou wert the man, would it not fill thee with fear and trembling night and day, and take away the quiet of thy life, till they were made friends? What then are their pillows stuffed with, who can sleep so soundly without any horror or amazement, though they be told, that the almighty God is under an oath of damning them body and soul, without timely repentance?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. Their happiness is short-lived, and full of drawbacks while it lasts.

(4939.) In all their jollity in this world, they are but as a book fairly bound, which when it is opened is full of nothing but tragedies. So when the book of their consciences shall be once opened, there is nothing to be read but lamentations and woes.

—Subbs, 1571-1635.

(4940.) This world is indeed "present" to you, sinners, for you cannot say it will be yours the next moment. Were it not wisdom before you truck with the devil, to inquire what title he can give you to earthly joy? Ere long you will have nothing but caveat emptor.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4941.) Many sinners who seem so jocund in our eyes, have not such merry lives as you think for. A book may be fairly bound and gilded, yet have but sad stories writ within it. Sinners will not tell us all the secret rebukes that conscience from the Word gives them. If you will judge of Herod by the jollity of his feast, you may think he wanted no joy; but at another time we see that John's ghost walked in his conscience: and so doth the Word haunt many a one, who to us appear to lay nothing to heart; in the midst of their laughter their heart is sad; you see the lightning in their face, but hear not the thunder that rumbles in their conscience.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4942.) Who would think, now, that sees how quietly the multitude of the ungodly live, that they must very shortly lie roaring in everlasting flames? They go about their work as cheerfully, they talk as pleasantly as if nothing ailed them, or as if they were as far out of danger as an obedient believer. Like a man that hath the falling sickness, you would little think while he is labouring as strongly and talking as heartily as another man, how he will presently fall down, lie gasping and foaming, and beating his breast in torment; so it is with these men. They are as free from the fears of hell as others; yea, and for the most part, they have less doubts and disquiet of mind than those who shall be saved. They are now in their own element, as the fish in the water; but little knows that silly creature when he is most fearlessly and delightfully swallowing down the bait, how suddenly he shall be snatched out and lie dead upon the bank. And as little think these careless sinners what a change they are near. The sheep or the ox is driven quietly to the slaughter, because he knows not whither he goes; if he knew it were to his death, you could not drive him so easily. How contented is the swine when the butcher's knife is shaving his throat, little thinking that it is to prepare for his death! Why, it is even so with these sensual careless men. They fear the mischief least when they are nearest to it, because they see it not.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

5. Their prosperity is short-lived, and an evidence of God's abhorrence of them.

(4943.) Prosperity to the wicked is as wind to a bladder, which swells it until it bursts; like a ship when she is top and top-gallant, soonest cast away; like a spider in a king's house, soonest swept down. When a wicked man is at the highest, then he is nearest his fall; and usually when he is in the ruff of all his bravery, God so orders it that he is humbled on a sudden.

—De Trugillo.

(4944.) The pleasures of the world are God's common gifts, which He bestows as well on the wicked and reprobate, as upon His own children and servants. Yea, in truth much more plentifully have the enemies of God and His grace enjoyed them, from the beginning of the world to this day, than those who have feared and served the Lord. For seeing they are to us, by reason of our corruption, like knives in the hands of children, and sweet and lickerous meats, whereon they are apt to surfeit; therefore the Lord suffering wicked men, as it were slaves and vassals, to take their liberty and use what diet they list, as not regarding their spiritual health and life, nor caring what becomes of them, has always had special care of His own children, dieting them with such a small pittance as they may well digest without impairing the health of their souls, and mixing these delicious drinks of pleasures in the bitter cup of afflictions, whereby He has still purged away these gross humours of corruption, when they began to abound with them through their dainty fare. . . . In which respect the Lord deals with mankind as the wise physician with his sick patients; those over whom he is most careful, in regard both of the love he bears them and the hope he conceives of their recovery, he straitly diets, forbidding them the use of those meats and drinks which, by reason of their disease, they love and desire; and gives them many a bitter potion and troublesome plaster, that he may hereby restore them to health; whereas contrariwise those whom he neglects, because their diseases are desperate and past hope of cure, are permitted to use what diet they list without restraint. And thus the Lord gives to His dear servants whom He intends to cure the bitter potions of afflictions, and restrains them from worldly pleasures which are so delightful to their carnal appetites; whereas He suffers reprobate men who are desperately sick in sin, to glut themselves with these fleshly delights, and to have their own carnal appetite as the rule and direction of their diet.

—Downham, 1644.

(4945.) I have seen the wicked (saith David) in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree. And why like a green bay tree? Because in the winter, when all other trees, as the vine tree, fig tree, apple tree, &c., which are more profitable trees, are withered and naked, yet the bay continueth as green in the winter as the summer. So fareth it with wicked men, when the children of God, in the storms of persecutions and afflictions, seem withered, and, as it were, dead, yet the wicked all that time flourish, and do appear green in the eyes of the world; they wallow in worldly wealth, but it is for their destruction; they wax fat, but it is for the day of slaughter.

—Spencer, 1658.

(4946.) Suppose a man were in prison, committed for some great offence, and condemned to die under the displeasure of his prince or state; and his servant should come to him, saying, "Sir, be of good comfort, your wife is well at home, you have very sweet children, an excellent crop of corn, your neighbours love you dearly, your sheep and cattle thrive, and all your houses are in good repair and order." Would he not answer that servant, and say, "What is all this, so long as I am condemned to die?"

Thus it is with every wicked man. He is under the displeasure of the great God, a condemned man, and God is angry with him every day; and if his heart were open to be sensible of it, he would say, "You tell me of my friends, and goods, and name, and trade; but what is all this, so long as I am a condemned person, and God is angry with me every day I rise?"

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(4947.) Heaviness to a saint may endure for the night of this life, but joy will come in the morning of death; whereas, the freshest streams of sinful delights will end in a salt sea of sorrows and tears. The most prosperous sinner is but like a thief that goeth through a pleasant meadow to the gallows.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4948.) A striking illustration of the folly of counting God out of one's plans for life is given in the course of William M. Tweed, whose death is recently announced. Here was a man who sought wealth and power, and who for a time seemed successful in their pursuit. Apparently he did not propose to obey God or to live for a life to come. What he wanted was worldly prosperity. He thought he had it. He went to Congress. He gathered his millions. He controlled the material interests of the metropolis of his country. He openly defied public sentiment and courts of justice in the prosecution of his plans. He was a brilliant and therefore a dangerous example of successful villany. But the promise of prosperity for even the life which now is, is only to the godly. As William M. Tweed lay dying in a prison-house in the city he once ruled, his confession of bitter disappointment was, "My life has been a failure in everything. There is nothing I am proud of." If any young man wants to come to an end like this, the way to it is simple and plain. "The great God that formed all things both rewardeth the fool and rewardeth transgressors." "The way of the wicked He turneth upside down."—American Sunday School Times, April 20th, 1878.

6. Their consciences are seared.

(4949.) As that man's disease is most perilous who lies sick and feels not his sickness, nor cannot complain of one part more than another, for then the disease hath equally troubled the whole body : so, likewise, they who live wallowing in sin, so forgetting God and all goodness that they feel no remorse of conscience for their sins, are desperate, and almost past all recovery. —Cowdrey, 1609.

7. Even to Divine influences they are insensible.

(4950.) Take a dead man, and put fire to his flesh, pinch him with pincers, prick him with needles, he feels it not ; scourge him, and he cries not ; shout in his ear, he hears not ; threaten him or speak him fair, he regards not, he answers not. This is the condition of one that is spiritually dead in sin : let the judgments of God and terrors of the law be laid home to his conscience, let the flames of hell-fire flash in his soul, he regards it not ; he is sermon-proof and judgment-proof. He hears of judgments abroad and sees judgments on others, nay, let judgments come home to his own doors, yet he thinks all is well. Like Solomon's fool, he outstands all reproof. Let the minister hit him never so home, "They have stricken me," says he, "but I was not sick ; they have beaten me, but they might as well have beaten the air." Such and so deplorable is the sad condition of every senseless sinner. —De Trugillo.

(4951.) The prophet Isaiah, describing his wretched countrymen, in their state of apostacy and obduracy of heart, says of them, "The Lord hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes." Present the most finished and beautiful picture before the eyes of a person asleep ; he sees no more of it than if it was not there. And how often are the pictures of our sin and deformity, and the righteousness and beauty of the Redeemer, drawn by the pencil of the Spirit in the Scriptures of truth, how often are they offered to the understandings of men, who yet see neither ? And why ? Because "a spirit of deep sleep," induced by their attachment to something in the world, that comes in competition with the doctrines or precepts of the gospel, "is fallen upon them," so that, "having eyes, they see not."

Go into the chamber of him that sleepeth, and read to him a piece of the most interesting news, play him the sweetest notes on the finest instrument, or sound the loudest and shrillest trumpet : while he sleeps, he hears nothing. To as little purpose do the ministers of the gospel preach to the obdurate worldling the "glad tidings of great joy, that unto us is born a Saviour," or the awful tidings of as great terror, that "He cometh to execute judgment on all that are ungodly." The heavenly strains of love and mercy sounded forth by the harp of David, when breathed on by the spirit of the Holy One, or the piercing trumpet of eternal judgment, waxing louder and louder on the top of Sinai, are equally unheard by him. He sleeps on still, and takes his rest ; and therefore, "having ears, he hears not."

Offer to the nostrils of one who sleepeth the most fragrant flowers that grow, the rose and the lily in their highest perfection, or the richest spices produced in the warmest climes : the flowers have no fragrance, the spices no odours for him. And are there not, who take no delight in that blessed Person, from the comfort and refreshment He affordeth to the drooping soul, as well as from His matchless beauty and perfection, styled "The Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the valley" ? who can perceive no "sweet-smelling savour of life unto life" in that gospel of peace, which is compared unto "myrrh, and frankincense, and all powders of the merchant" ?

Open the mouth of him that sleepeth, and fill it with the choicest honey ; you have no thanks from him, for he tasteth it not. As little relish hath one in a state of sin and worldly-mindedness for those promises which, when the penitent believer tasteth, he crieth out in transport, "O how sweet are Thy words unto my mouth : yea, sweeter than honey unto my throat !"

Lastly, a person during the time of sleep feels no wounds or bruises, and passes imperceptibly into the regions of death. And this is the very apostolical description of hardened sinners, who have given themselves over to lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness : they are said to be "past feeling, having their conscience seared with a hot iron." —Horne, 1730-1792.

(4952.) The person spoken of (Eph. v. 14) is first said to be asleep ; and surely this gives the idea of one who may be surrounded by danger without knowing it ; may be approached by enemies without perceiving it ; may have the assassin's blow aimed at his heart without attempting to repel it. In like manner, those by whom he is best loved may watch beside his pillow, and he is unconscious of their presence. "A feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined," may be spread before him, yet his appetite is not awakened ; riches and honours may be placed within his reach, yet his hand is not stretched forth to grasp them. And why ? Because he is asleep. His eyes are closed, his ears are dulled, his senses are locked up by the power of slumber ; and forgetfulness of his best interest, and inattention to outward objects, have come upon him.

And thus is it with the unconverted man. He is surrounded by dangers which he heeds not ; by enemies whom he regards not. The murderer of souls has struck at his heart, and he has made no resistance. He may be active in worldly matters, and eager for worldly objects ; but he has no eagerness, no activity for spiritual concerns. Wrath, and that eternal, is even now pursuing him ;—the bottomless abyss has yawned at his very feet—and is ready to engulf him ;—the thunders of the law are pealing forth their denunciations against him ;—and this immortal being remains heedless and unconcerned when there is but one step between him and the lake of fire. And there is an eye of love watching over him for good ; there is a voice of mercy appealing to his soul ;—there is the marriage supper of the Lamb spread, and he is invited thereto ;—there are the unsearchable riches of Christ placed within his reach, with this encouraging inscription, "Ask, and ye shall receive,"—yet he hears not the voice which cries, "Look unto Me, and be ye saved ;"—he sees not the bleeding form which stands between us and the stroke of Divine justice ; the famished wretch hastens not to taste the feast ; the beggar's hand is not put forth to lay hold on the boundless treasures. He is asleep ; and feels not, sees not, hears not, knows not these things.

And yet he is often not devoid of strong feeling with respect to the things of this world ; nor destitute of regard for the decencies of life. He may find, or think he finds, happiness in this very forgetfulness of God ; nay, in his own way, he may make a profession of religion, and have a dreamy prospect of salvation to be hereafter received. He thinks that he may now give his faculties to earthly objects and to self-indulgence,—that he may offer to God the service of the lip whilst his own passions and inclinations receive the adoration of the heart ;—and he flatters himself that he is happy now, and that he shall, unconverted and separated from the love of God as he is, be happy in His presence eternally. Alas ! how delusive is this dream, springing as it does from the sleep of carnal security. When for a moment he thinks seriously, he finds himself not really happy, and when that hour comes in which the unawakened sinner shall be called into the presence of his Judge, where shall be all the joys either on earth or in heaven, which he promised to himself ; “It shall even be as when an hungry man dreameth, and behold, he eateth ; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty ; or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold, he is faint and his soul hath appetite ;” his anticipations were but a dream, founded on self-delusion, and ending in bitter and irretrievable disappointment. —Kyle.

(4953.) He is further said to be dead ; and if the image of sleep expresses his unconcern about spiritual things, that of death denotes no less forcibly the absence of every principle of spiritual exertion, every source of spiritual good. He is dead, not bodily, but spiritually, “in trespasses and sins.” He may indeed appear respectable and decent in his outward conversation ; he may exhibit many virtues in the course of his life ; but these, though they may deceive his fellow-creatures, are seen by the all-discerning eye of God to be “of the earth earthy.” In truth, even as in natural death, there is a difference between one corpse and another in the tokens of mortality, in proportion as corruption has advanced more or less in the work of destruction, so is it with respect to spiritual deadness. Some appear still alive—others lately dead—others so full of corruption as to be absolutely disgusting ; but these are only varieties, while the state in which they are is one and the same. They are bodies without souls, incapable of seeing, or hearing, or feeling, or acting—ready to return to the dust and never to move, or breathe, or think again, until they shall hear from their graves the voice of the Son of Man, and rise to stand before His judgment seat. And even thus there may be, and there are, many degrees of spiritual corruption between the open, abandoned profligate, and the amiable, pleasing, but still unconverted sinner ; but no matter how dissimilar may be the way in which death has touched them, their state is the same, for “he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life.” In truth, the great want of the unconverted is, the absence of the Spirit of God from his soul ; and whilst this is difficult, it is in vain that he may exhibit the most brilliant powers of fancy, the widest grasp of understanding, the hand open to the calls of poverty, or the heart warmed and affectionate to his family and his friends. Lacking the great principle of spiritual life ; the love of God in Christ, these are but the embroideries of the pall which covers the carcass, but the flowers twined round that naked skeleton on whose dry bones the Spirit has not yet breathed. He feels not, and therefore struggles not against the burden of his sins, even as the lifeless body feels not, and struggles not against the mound that is heaped over its grave ; and even as that corpse cannot raise itself again to life, so his condition, as expressed in our Tenth Article, “is such, that he cannot turn” and prepare himself by his own natural strength “and good works, to faith and calling upon God.” He is dead—he is lost—and except a power from without himself quickens him, he is only preparing for “the second death.” —Kyle.

8. They are led captive by the devil at his will.

(4954.) Thou who art in the kingdom of darkness, knowest not whither thou goest. As the ox is driven to the shambles, but he knows not whither he goes ; so the devil is driving thee before him to hell, but thou knowest not whither thou goest.

—Watson, 1696.

9. They carry with them the elements of misery.

(4955.) The wicked carry their prison about with them wherever they go ; because their own heart is a dark dungeon, their passions adamant chains, and scourges to the soul ; whilst, on the contrary, those whom Jesus Christ has delivered, and who have renounced the world, experience the liberty of the children of God, even in the midst of bonds.

—St. Martha.

10. There awaits them a terrible hour when they will be undeceived as to their true state.

(4956.) Like as a man living in health, wealth, and all manner of pleasure, should have this of a sudden made known unto him, that he is condemned of treason committed against his prince and country, and that therefore he is forthwith to be deprived of life and of all those pleasures which he doth enjoy, there being no hope of pardon—we cannot fully conceive in mind, or express in word, the greatness of his grief, sorrow, and fear : even so much more grievous and fearful a thing it will be to incur the displeasure and anger of God, the loss of eternal joy and happiness, together with those endless pains which are prepared for the wicked.

—Cowdrey, 1609.

(4957.) The misery of such as have not God for their God, in how sad a condition are they, when an hour of distress comes ! This was Saul's case : “I am sore distressed ; for the Philistines make war against me, and the Lord has departed from me.” A wicked man, in time of trouble, is like a vessel tossed on the sea without an anchor, it falls on rocks or sands : a sinner not having God to be his God, though he makes a shift while health and estate last, yet, when these crutches, which he leaned upon, are broken, his heart sinks. It is with a wicked man as it is with the old world, when the flood came ; the waters at first came to the valleys, but then the people would get to the hills and mountains, but when the waters came to the mountains, then there might be some trees on the high hills, and they would climb up to them : ay, but then the waters did rise up to the tops of the trees : now all hopes of being saved were gone, their hearts failed them. So it is with a man that hath not God to be his God : if one comfort be taken away, he hath another ; if he lose a child, he hath an estate ; ay, but when the waters rise higher, death comes and takes away all ; now he hath nothing to help him—self with, no God to go to, he must needs die despairing.

—Watson, 1696.

11. Their destruction is sure.

(4958.) A pack-horse, which all the day long hath gone noddling with abundance of treasure, hath at night all taken from him, and is turned a-grazing, or put into a stable, so that all the benefit he hath gained by it is that he hath only felt the weight of it, and probably got a galled back for his labour. Thus many rapacious, wretched rich men, such as are little better than pack-horses, who all their life long carry the things of this world, lade themselves with thick clay, rise early and late, and eat the bread of carefulness to get a little pelf, and a galled conscience to boot, are on a sudden either for ill using or ill getting their wealth, turned, unless God be more merciful, into a filthy stable, into hell, where their pay is everlasting torment.

—Drexelius.

(4959.) As the stone naturally inclines to the centre, the proper place and home; so the wicked are never at home, and in their proper place, till they be in hell.

—Adams, 1654.

(4960.) "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker." 'Tis easy to tell which of these will be worsted. What can he do, but break his shins, that dasheth them against a rock? A goodly battle there is like to be, when thorns contest with stubble, and stubble with fire.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

12. Hence their temporary prosperity is not to lead us to envy them.

(4961.) Would it not be accounted folly in a man that is heir to many thousands per annum that he should envy a stage-player, clothed in the habit of a king, and yet not heir to one foot of land?—who, though he have the form, respect, and apparel of a king or nobleman, yet he is, at the same time, a very beggar, and worth nothing. Thus, wicked men, though they are arrayed gorgeously, and fare deliciously, wanting nothing, and having more than heart can wish, yet they are but only possessors: the godly Christian is the heir. What good doth all their prosperity do them? It doth but hasten their ruin, not their reward. The ox that is the labouring ox is the longer lived than the ox that is put into the pasture; the very putting of him there doth but hasten his slaughter; and when God puts wicked men into fat pastures, into places of honour and power, it is but to hasten their ruin. Let no man, therefore, fret himself because of evil-doers, nor be envious at the prosperity of the wicked; for the candle of the wicked shall be put into everlasting darkness: they shall soon be cut off, and wither as a green herb.

—Ludovicus de Carbonensis, 1579.

(4962.) When a soldier was to die for taking a bunch of grapes against the general's command, and going to execution he went eating his grapes, one of his fellows rebuked him, saying, "What! are you eating your grapes now?" The poor man answers, "I prithee, friend, do not envy me these grapes, for they do cost me dear;" so they did indeed, for they cost him his life. Thus, let no man envy the prosperity of the wicked, nor fret at the men or this world who live in pleasure and wallow in the sensual delights of this life; they know no better, they seek after no better things. There is little cause why any man should grudge what they have, for they must give a sad account of what they have received, and pay dear at the last—even without God's preventing mercy—the loss of their immortal souls to all eternity.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(4963.) "There is no peace to the wicked, saith my God." There are snares in all their mercies, and curses and crosses attend all their comforts, both at home and abroad. What is a fine suit of clothes with the plague in it? And what is a golden cup when there is poison at the bottom? The curse of God always attends sinners walking in a way of wickedness.

—Brooks, 1628-1680.

(4964.) O sirs, do wicked men purchase their present pleasures at so dear a rate as eternal torments! and do we envy their enjoyment of them so short a time? Would any envy a man going to execution, because he saw him in a prison, nobly feasted, and nobly attended, and bravely courted? or because he saw him go up the ladder with a gold chain about his neck, and a scarlet gown upon his back? or because he saw him walk to execution through pleasant fields, or delightful gardens? or because there went before him drums beating, colours flying, and trumpets sounding? &c. Surely no! O! no more should we envy the grandeur of the men of the day, for every step they take is but a step to an eternal execution.

—Brooks, 1628-1680.

(4965.) The world is a stage; every man an actor, and plays his part here, either in a comedy or tragedy. The good man is a comedian, when, however he begins, ends merrily; but the wicked man acts a tragedy, and, therefore, ever ends in horror. Thou seest a wicked man vaunt himself on his stage, stay till the last act, and look to his end, as David did, and see whether that be peace. Thou wouldst make strange tragedies if thou wouldst have but one act. Who sees an ox, grazing in a fat and rank pasture, and thinks not that he is near to the slaughter? whereas, the lean beast, that toils under the yoke, is far enough from the shambles. The best wicked man cannot be so envied in his first shows as he is pitiable in the conclusion.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4966.) Let us not envy the prosperity of the wicked. They are the wicked of the earth; here they flourish. As nettles will more easily grow than choicer plants, the soil brings them forth of its own accord, so do wicked men thrive here. But you need not envy them; not only our hopes are much better than their possessions, but our present condition is much better. (Pa. xvii. 14.)

"Fret not thyself because of the evil-doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity, for they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither like the green herb." Though they seem to be in a very prosperous condition for the present—as grass, while it is standing, is very green—yet they are soon cut down by the scythe of Providence, then presently fade, and are carried away from the place where they grew. You think Providence does not deal righteously because the unworthy are exalted, and the worthy depressed. Do but tarry awhile, and you will have no cause to complain, or to grow weary of godliness, or to cry up a confederacy with evil men; they are never nearer their own ruin than when they come to the height of their exaltation, as the sun declines presently when he comes to the highest point of the zenith. Who would envy those that climb up a ladder for execution ; or are carried to the top of a rock that they may be thrown down from thence to be broken in pieces ? " Surely Thou didst set them in slippery places, Thou didst cast them down into destruction."

—Manton, 1620-1667.

WORLD. THE.

1. ITS HONOURS AND PLEASURES.

1. We can call very few of them really our own.

(4967.) He that is the greatest possessor in the world enjoys its best and most noble parts, and those which are of most excellent perfection, but in common with inferior persons, and the most despicable of his kingdom. Can the greatest prince enclose the sun, and set one little star in his cabinet for his own use, or secure to himself the gentle and benign influences of one constellation ? Are not his subjects' fields bedewed with the same showers that water his pleasure garden ?

Nay, those things which he esteems his ornament, and the singularity of his possessions, are they not of more use to others than to himself ? For suppose his garments splendid and shining, like the robe of a cherub, or the clothing of the fields ; all that he that wears them enjoys is, that they keep him warm, and clean, and modest ; and all this is done by clean and less pompous vestments ; and the beauty of them, which distinguishes him from others, is made to please the eyes of the beholders ; and he is like a fair bird, or the meretricious painting of a wanton woman, made wholly to be looked on, that is, to be enjoyed by every one but himself : and the fairest face and the sparkling eye cannot perceive or enjoy their own beauties but by reflection. It is I that am pleased with beholding his gaiety ; and the gay man, in his greatest bravery, is only pleased because I am pleased with the sight ; so borrowing his little and imaginary complacency from the delight that I have, not from any inherency of his own possession.

The poorest artisan of Rome, walking in Cæsar's gardens, had the same pleasures which they ministered to his lord ; and although it may be, he was put to gather fruits to eat from another place, yet his other senses were delighted equally with Cæsar's ; the birds made him as sweet music, the flowers gave him as sweet smells ; he there sucked as good air and delighted in the beauty and order of the place, for the same reason and on the same perception as the prince himself ; save, only, that Cæsar paid for all that pleasure vast sums of money, the blood and treasure of a province, which the poor man had for nothing.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(4968.) Suppose a man lord of all the world : yet, since everything is received, not according to its own greatness and worth, but according to the capacity of the receiver, it signifies very little as to our content or to the riches of our possession. If any man should give to a lion a fair meadowful of hay, or a thousand quince trees ; or should give to goodly bull, the master and fairest of the whole herd, a thousand fair stags ; if a man should present to a child a ship laden with Persian carpets, and the ingredients of the rich scarlet ; all these being disproportionate either to the appetite or the understanding, could add nothing to the content, and might declare the freeness of the giver, but they upbraid the incapacity of the receiver. And so it does if God should give the whole world to any man ; he can use nothing but meat, and drink, and clothes ; and infinite riches, that can give him changes of raiment every day and a full table, do but give him a clean trencher every bit he eats ; it signifies no more but wantonness and variety, to the same, not to any new purposes. He to whom the world can be given to any purpose greater than a private estate can minister, must have new capacities created in him ; he needs the understanding of an angel, to take the accounts of his estate ; he had need have a stomach like fire or the grave, for else he can eat no more than one of his healthful subjects ; and unless he hath an eye like the sun, and a motion like that of a thought, and a bulk as big as one of the orbs of heaven, the pleasures of his eye can be no greater than to behold the beauty of a little prospect from a hill, or to look on the heap of gold packed up in a little room, or to dote on a cabinet of jewels, better than which there is no man that sees at all, but sees every day. For, not to name the beauties and sparkling diamonds of heaven, a man's, or a woman's, or a hawk's eye, is more beauteous and excellent than all the jewels of his crown.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

2. They are unsatisfying.

(4969.) Let us not foolishly imagine that our minds can be satisfied and filled with worldly vanities, nor greedily affect and seek after a greater measure, when we are not satisfied with a less, supposing that the access of quantity may bring contentment ; seeing the hunger which we feel in our hearts proceeds not from want of earthly abundance, but because it is unnatural nourishment for the mind of man, so that it can no more satisfy our souls' hunger, than it can satisfy our bodies to feed upon the wind. And therefore as his folly were ridiculous, who being an hungered should seek to satisfy his appetite by gaping after the wind, and finding that a lesser gale would not suffice, should run to the windmill to receive a greater : so no less foolish are those worldly men, who, finding their hearts empty and tormented with the hunger of greedy concupiscence, do think to stay their appetite by feeding upon this wind of worldly vanities ; and failing of their expectation in a lesser quantity, think to attain unto their hope, when they have heaped up to themselves a greater. For the defect is not in the matter, but in the nature and quality of the nourishment, there being no similitude or proportion between a spiritual soul and corporal substances.

They do indeed for the present seem to satisfy and assuage the hunger, but afterwards it is enraged with greater greediness ; even as cold drink doth give some present cooling and refreshing to him who is in a fit of burning fever, but soon after the heat returning with greater violence brings with it more intolerable thirst. And as the fire, at the first casting on of wood or oil, has for the instant the heat thereof somewhat abated, but presently after, having caught hold of the matter, it waxes much more hot than it was before : so worldly men pursuing these earthly vanities, after they have attained unto their hopes, have for the instant contentment; but within awhile the rage of their concupiscence revives and increases, tormenting their souls with more unquenchable thirstiness than that which they felt before they tasted them.

If, therefore, we would have such sufficiency of these worldly things as may bring contentment, we must attain unto it by moderating our affections, rather than by multiplying these vanities. If we would have this aguish thirst slaked and abated, it must not be by larger drinking of these unsatisfying drinks, which will but increase our appetite, but by purging away the fretting choler of worldly concupiscence, which is the true cause of our insatiableness; and if we would have this devouring fire of our greedy desires quenched, let us not foolishly heap upon it more of that matter whereby it is nourished, but rather cast on it the water of careless contempt, whereby this flaming heat will be soon extinguished.

—Downname, 1644.

(4970.) The world is like sharp sauce, which doth not fill, but provoke the stomach to call for more. The voice of those guests whom it makes most welcome is like the daughters of the horseleech, "Give, give;" but the infinite God, like solid food, doth satisfy the soul fully ("In my Father's house is bread enough"), and causeth it to cry out, "I have enough."

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4971.) The countryman in the fable would needs stay till the river was run away, and then go over dry-shod; but the river still ran on, and he was deceived in his expectation. Such are the worldling's inordinate desires. The deceitful heart promises to see them run over and gone, when they are attained to such a measure; and then they are stronger and wider, more potent and unruly than before. For a covetous heart grasps at no less than the whole world; would fain be master of all, and dwell alone, like a wen in the body, which draws all to itself; let it never have so much, it will reach after more, add house to house, and field to field, till there be no more place to compass; like a bladder, it swells wider and wider, the more of this empty world is put into it; so boundless, so endless, so inordinate are the corrupt desires of worldly-minded men.

—Spencer, 1658.

(4972.) Men that are in the valley think, if they were at the top of such a hill, they should touch the heavens. Men that are in the bottom of poverty, or disgrace, or pain, think, if they could get up to such a mountain, such a measure of riches, and honours, and delights, they could reach happiness. Now Solomon had got to the top of this hill, and seeing so many scrambling and labouring so hard, nay, riding on one another's necks, and pressing one another to death to get foremost, doth seem thus to bespeak them: "Sirs, ye are all deceived in your expectations; I see the pains ye take to get up to this place, thinking, that when you come hither, ye shall touch the heavens, and reach happiness: but I am before you at the top of the hill—I have treasures, and honours, and pleasures in variety and abundance (Eccles. ii. 11, 12), and I find the hill full of quagmires instead of delights, and so far from giving me satisfaction, that it causeth much vexation; therefore be advised to spare your pains, and spend your strength for that which will turn to more profit; for, believe it, you do but work at the labour in vain." "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," saith the Preacher.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4973.) Worldly comforts, though sweet, yet in time grow stale: a down-bed pleaseth awhile, but within awhile we are weary and would rise.

—Watson, 1696.

(4974.) The following extract from a letter of a late nobleman of loose principles, well known in the gay world (Lord Chesterfield), and published as authentic by a respectable prelate deceased, will show the dreadful vacancy and wretchedness of a mind left to itself in the decline of life, and unsupported by Christian principle:—"I have seen the silly round of business and pleasure, and have done with it all. I have enjoyed all the pleasures of the world, and consequently know their futility, and do not regret their loss. I appraise them at their real value, which in truth is very low; whereas those who have not experienced always overrate them. They only see their gay outside, and are dazzled with their glare; but I have been behind the scenes. I have seen all the coarse pulleys and dirty ropes which exhibit and move the gaudy machine; and I have seen and smelt the tallow candles which illuminate the whole decoration, to the astonishment and admiration of the ignorant audience. When I reflect on what I have seen, what I have heard, and what I have done, I cannot persuade myself that all that frivolous hurry of bustle and pleasure of the world had any reality; but I look on all that is past as one of those romantic dreams which opium commonly occasions, and I do by no means wish to repeat the nauseous dose for the sake of the fugitive dream. Shall I tell you that I bear this melancholy situation with that meritorious constancy and resignation that most men boast? No, sir, I really cannot help it. I bear it because I must bear it, whether I will or no. I think of nothing but killing time the best way I can, now that time is become my enemy. It is my resolution to sleep in the carriage during the remainder of the journey."

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

3. They are transitory.

(4975.) It was a custom in Rome, that when the emperor went by upon some grand day in all his imperial pomp, there was an officer appointed to burn flax before him, crying out: Sic transit gloria mundi! which was purposely done to put him in mind that all his honour and grandeur should soon vanish and pass away, like the nimble smoke raised from that burning flax. And it was a good meditation that one had, standing by a river side, says he: The water which I see now runs away, and I see it no more; and the comforts of this world are like this running water, still gliding and running away from us. Those bitter sweets that the world doth, or can present, are but like smoke, that soon vanisheth away; coming to us with sparrows' wings, slowly and with much difficulty; but flying away with eagles' wings, hardly discoverable which way, or how they took their flight on such a sudden. It must therefore be our care so to use this world as if we used it not, for the fashion of it passeth away; and seeing we cannot enjoy the comforts thereof any long time, let us use them well to God's glory that gave them, and not abuse them to our own prejudice.

—Wolfgangius Lasius.

(4976.) The great conqueror of the world (Alexander) caused to be painted on a table a sword in the compass of a wheel, showing thereby that what he had gotten by the sword was subject to be turned about by the wheel of Fortune. Such is the condition of all things here below, whether they be riches, honours, or preferments: there is no more hold to be had of them than Saul had of Samuel's lap; they do but, like the rainbow, show themselves in all their dainty colours, and then vanish away; and if by chance they stay with us as long as death, they do but, like St. Paul's friends, bring us to the grave, as they brought him to the ship, and there leave us. So uncertain, deceitful, unconstant, are the things of this world to the owners thereof.

—Shute, 1627.

(4977.) The beauty of all worldly things is but as a fair picture drawn upon the ice, that melts away with it. The fashion of this world passeth away.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(4978.) Our most fortified delights are like the child's castle, done down with a hillip; a shadow, nay, the very dream of a shadow; a rotten post, slightly painted; a paper tower, which the least puff overturns.

—Adams, 1654.

(4979.) Wealth is like a bird; it hops all day from man to man, as that doth from tree to tree; and none can say where it will roost or rest at night. It is like a vagrant fellow, which because he is big-boned, and able to work, a man takes in a-doors, and cherisheth; and perhaps for a while he takes pains; but when he spies opportunity, the fugitive servant is gone, and takes away more with him than all his service came to. The world may seem to stand thee in some stead for a season, but at last it irrevocably runs away, and carries with it thy joys; thy goods, as Rachel stole Laban's idols; thy peace and content of heart goes with it, and thou are left desperate.

You see how quickly riches cease to be "the same;" and can any other earthly thing boast more stability? Honour must put off its robes when the play is done; make it never so glorious a show on this world's stage, it hath but a short part to act. A great name of worldly glory is but like a peal rung on the bells; the common people are the clappers; the rope that moves them is popularity; if you once let go your hold and leave pulling, the clapper lies still, and farewell honour. Strength, though, like Jeroboam, it put forth the arm of oppression, shall soon fall down withered. Beauty is like an almanac: if it last a year it is well. Pleasure like lightning: oritur, moritur; sweet, but short; a flash and away.

—Adams, 1654.

(4980.) At the best, they are but glassy stuff; which, the finer it is, is so much more brittle: yea, what other, than those gay bubbles, which children are wont to raise from the mixed soap and spittle of their walnut-shell; which seem to represent pleasing colours, but in their flying up, instantly vanish! There is no remedy: either they must leave us, or we must leave them.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4981.) All worldly things are like the sea, ebbing and flowing; or like the moon, always increasing or decreasing; or like a wheel, always turning up and down.

—Ambrose, 1664.

(4982.) We do not hold worldly things during our life, nor as long as we shall behave ourselves well in our places; but only as long as God pleases. How often is the most shining glory burnt into a snuff, turned into ignominy, and honour into contempt, and our fulness into the want of all things! A cobweb that has been long a spinning is soon swept down.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(4983.) The visible felicity of man is of no continuance. We may frequently observe in the evening a cloud, by the reflection of the sun invested with so bright a lustre and adorned with such a pleasant variety of colours, that, in the judgment of our eyes, if an angel were to assume a body correspondent to his glory, it were a fit matter for it; but in walking a few steps, the sun is descended beneath the horizon, and the light withdrawn, and of all that splendid flaming appearance nothing remains but a dark vapour, that falls down in a shower. Thus vanishing is the show of felicity here.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(4984.) There is no constancy in outward comforts. As brooks in winter are carried with violence, and run with a mighty stream, flowing over with abundance of water on every side, when there is no want or need of waters; but in the heat of summer is dried up, when water is scanty and hard to be had; such is the friendship of the world: it will promise us many things, when we have need of nothing; but when the wind turns and afflictions overtake us, it is like a tree withered for want of sap, and as a ditch without any water to refresh us. When the sun of our prosperity is hid and covered with a cloud, these shadows vanish and disappear. As leaves fall off in autumn, so does the friendship of creatures fail men, when the sap of that maintenance which commanded their company is withdrawn from them.

Man in honour abideth not. As the rising sun, coming into our horizon like a giant ready to run a race, appearing to us with a full and glorious countenance, within an hour's space is obscured with mists or darkened with clouds; and however, if it meet with neither of these, when it arrives at its noon-day height, it declines, descends, sets, and is buried under us: so the ambitious person shows himself to the world as chief favourite at court, with much pomp and pride; by and by his honour is eclipsed, by the hate of the people, or frowns of the prince, or envy of his fellow courtiers; or if not, yet he dies, and "carries nothing away," and "his glory doth not descend after him."

The like is evident of earthly treasures: they are soon gone, though not soon gotten. As a gallant ship, well rigged, trimmed, tackled, manned, with her top and top-gallant, and her well-spread sails, puts out of harbour to the admiration of many spectators; but within a few days is split upon some dangerous rock, or swallowed up of some disastrous tempest, or taken by some ravenous pirate; so are this world's goods on a sudden taken from their owners, or their owners from them.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(4985.) Among qualities that commend or vilify things unto us, duration and certainty have a chief place; they often alone suffice to render things valuable or contemptible. Why is gold more precious than glass or crystal? Why prefer we a ruby before a rose or a gilliflower? It is not because those are more serviceable, more beautiful, more grateful to our senses than these (it is plainly otherwise); but because these are brittle and fading, those solid and permanent: these we cannot hope to retain the use or pleasure of long; those we may promise ourselves to enjoy as long as we please.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

(4986.) Earthly things, when we have them, we are not sure of them; like birds, they hop up and down, now on this hedge, and anon upon that: none can call them his own.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4987.) All sublunary comforts imitate the changeableness, as well as feel the influence, of the planet they are under. Time, like a river, carries them all away with a rapid course; they swim above the stream for a while, but are quickly swallowed up, and seen no more. The very monuments men raise to perpetuate their names consume and moulder away themselves, and proclaim their own mortality, as well as testify that of others.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4988.) I read when I was a boy of an ice-palace, built one winter at Petersburg. The walls, the roof, the floors, the furniture, were all of ice, but finished with taste; and everything that might be expected in a royal palace was to be found there; the ice, while in the state of water, had been previously coloured, so that to the eye all seemed formed of proper materials: but all was cold, useless, and transient. Had the frost continued till now, the palace might have been standing; but with the returning spring, it melted away, like the baseless fabric of a vision. Methinks there should have been one stone in the building, to have retained the inscription, Sic transit gloria mundi! for no contrivance could exhibit a fitter illustration of the vanity of human life. Men build and plan as if their works were to endure for ever; but the wind passes over them, and they are gone. In the midst of all their preparations, or, at farthest, when they think they have just completed their designs, their breath goeth forth, they return to their earth; in that very day their thoughts perish.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(4989.) Let their possessors, remember, however, that they must shortly be divested of the brilliant appendages and splendid ornaments of rank and station, and enter into a world where they are unknown; where they will carry nothing but the essential elements of their being, impressed with those indelible characters which must sustain the scrutiny of Omniscience. The artificial decorations, be it remembered, are not, properly speaking, their own; the elevation to which they belong is momentary; and as the merit of an actor is not estimated by the part which he performs, but solely by the truth and propriety of his representation, and the peasant is often applauded where the monarch is hissed; so when the drama of life is concluded, He who allots its scenes, and determines its period, will take an account of His servants, and assign to each his punishment or reward, in his proper character.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

4. How the Christian estimates them.

(4990.) [On the sight of boys playing.] Every age hath some peculiar contentment. Thus we did, when we were of these years. Methinks I still remember the old fervour of my young pastimes.

With what eagerness and passion do they pursue these childish sports! Now that there is a handful of cherry stones at the stake, how near is that boy's heart to his mouth, for fear of his playfellows next cast; and how exalted with desire and hope of his own speed! Those great unthrifths who hazard whole manors upon the dice, cannot expect their chance with more earnestness, or entertain it with more joy or grief.

We cannot but now smile to think of these poor and foolish pleasures of our childhood. There is no less disdain, that the regenerate man conceives of the dearest delights of his natural condition. He was once jolly and jocund, in the fruition of the world. Feasts, and revels, and games, and dalliance were his life; and no man could be happy without these: and scarce any man, but himself: but when once grace hath made him both good and wise, how scornfully doth he look back at these fond felicities of his carnal estate! Now he finds more manly, more divine contentments, and wonders he could be so transported with his former vanity. Pleasures are much according as they are esteemed: one man's delight is another man's pain. Only spiritual and heavenly things can settle and satiate the heart with a full and firm contentation.

O God, Thou art not capable either of bettering or of change: let me enjoy Thee; and I shall pity the miserable fickleness of those that want Thee; and shall be sure to be constantly happy.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(4991.) The Christian doth not value earthly enjoyments, or himself by them; and if Satan were to think to hurt a saint by touching his external advantages, this were as if one should try to hurt a man by beating his clothes, when once he has put them off.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(4992.) The eye of a godly man is not fixed on the false sparkling of the world's pomp, honour, and wealth. It is dead to them, being quite dazzled with a greater beauty. The grass looks fine in the morning, when it is set with those liquid pearls, the drops of dew that shine upon it; but if you can look but a little while on the body of the sun, and then look down again, the eye is as it were dead; it sees not that faint shining on the earth that it thought so gay before. And as the eye is blinded, and dies to it, so within a few hours that gaiety quite vanishes and dies itself.

—Leighton, 1611-1684.

(4993.) Not golden veins in mountains, not diamonds in the sands, nor precious stones, nor treasures which are heaped up in cities, nor the things which minister to the senses or to bodily ease or comfort, are best. They are second best. They are useful if they serve; they are evil if they rule. For the world is God's nursery. Here He brings up His children; and as in our houses all things are good—pictures, books, carpets, furniture, the table and the couch—if they aid us to rear well our children, and are good but for that; as our children themselves the chief treasures to us, and their characters the chief part of themselves, so it is in God's great household globe on which we dwell. We are to despise nothing as if the being transient or physical were a reason for contempt. We are to treasure all things—only we are to measure their value by their relation to our higher nature.

—Becher.

3. When they become hurtful to us.

(4994.) Thorns will not prick of themselves, but when they are grasped in a man's hand they prick deep. So this world and the things thereof are all good, and were all made of God for the benefit of His creatures, did not our immoderate affection make them hurtful, which, indeed, embitters every sweet unto us. This is the root of all evil.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(4995.) All the danger is when the world gets into the heart. The water is useful for the sailing of the ship; all the danger is when the water gets into the ship; so the fear is when the world gets into the heart. "Thou shalt not covet."

—Watson, 1696.

II. ITS DELUSIVENESS.

1. It is solid and valuable only in its outward appearance.

(4996.) All vanities are but butterflies, which wanton children greedily catch for; and sometimes they fly beside them, sometimes before them, sometimes behind them, sometimes close by them; yea, through their fingers, and yet they miss them; and when they have them, they are but butterflies; they have painted wings, but are crude and squalid worms. Such are the things of this world, vanities, butterflies. The world itself is not unlike an artichoke; nine parts of it are unprofitable leaves, scarce the tithe is good: about it there is a little picking meat, nothing so wholesome as dainty: in the midst of it there is a core, which is enough to choke them that devour it.

—Adams, 1654.

(4997.) In Chill, where the ground is subject to frequent shocks of earthquake, the houses are built of lowly height and of unenduring structure; it is of little use to dig deep foundations, and pile up high walls where the very earth is unstable; it would be foolish to build as for ages when the whole edifice may be in ruins in a week. Herein we read a lesson as to our worldly schemes and possessions: this poor fleeting world deserves not that we should build our hopes and joys upon it as though they could last us long. We must treat it as a treacherous soil, and build but lightly on it, and we shall be wise.

—Spurgeon.

2. It shows its best side to us at the beginning.

(4998.) The world, like a subtle merchant, offers to us a good sample of bad wares, and outwardly presents to our view the best end of the stuff, whereas the inmost and middle parts are coarse and slight; and places the purest and choicest commodities in the upper part of the vessel, whereas in the middle and the bottom it is mixed, counterleit, and purposely falsified.

—Lowmame, 1644.

(4999.) At the command of Jesus the waterpots were filled with water, and the water was by His divine power turned into wine (John ii.), where the different economy of God and the world is highly observable. "Every man sets forth good wine at first, and then the worse;" but God not only turns the water into wine, but into such wine that the last draught is most pleasant. The world presents us with fair language, promising hopes, convenient fortunes, pompous honours, and these are the outsides of the bowl; but when it is swallowed, these dissolve in the instant, and there remains bitterness and the maliginity of Coloquinteda. Every sin smiles in the first address, and carries light in the face and honey in the lip, but "when we have well drunk, then comes that which is worse"—a whip with six strings, fears and terrors of conscience, and shame and displeasure and a captive disposition, and diffidence in the day of death. But when, "after the manner of purifying of the Christians," we fill our waterpots with water, watering our couch with our tears, and moistening our cheeks with the perpetual distillations of repentance, then Christ turns our water into wine—first penitents and then communicants, first waters of sorrow and then the wine of the chalice, first the justifications of correction and then the sanctifications of the sacrament, and the effects of the Divine power, joy and peace and serenity, hopes full of confidence, and confidence without shame, and boldness without presumption; for Jesus keeps the "best wine" until the last, not only because of the direct reservations of the highest joys till the nearer approaches of glory, but also because our reli-shes are higher after a long fruition than at the first essays; such being the nature of grace, that it increases in relish as it does in fruition, every part of grace being new duty and new reward.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

3. It promises more than it can perform.

(5000.) The world promiseth as much, and performeth as little, as the tomb of Semiramis. When she had built a stately tomb, she caused this inscription to be engraven on it: "Whatsoever king shall succeed here, and want money, let him open this tomb, and he shall have enough to serve his turn;" which Darius afterwards, wanting money, opened, and, instead of riches, found this sharp reproof: "Unless thou hadst been extremely covetous and greedy of filthy lucre, thou wouldest not have opened the grave of the dead to seek for money." Thus many run to the world with high hopes, and return with nothing but blanks.

—Swinnock, 1673.

4. It lures us on with false hopes.

(5001.) The world is treacherous; it betrays both the hopes and the souls of men at once. How big is man with expectations of remote distant enjoyments! Like a man looking at a picture, or statue, at a distance, but coming near to it, and taking a close view, he sees it but a cheat, a dead, lifeless thing; so when a man comes to the enjoyment of the world, he falls infinitely short of his expectations. Like children that think the cloud is just touching such a hill, and if they were at it they would be just in the cloud; and when they go there they find the cloud removed away to another hill.

—Ralph Erskine, 1685-1752.

5. It will not bear exposure to the light.

(5002.) Those who work in perspective will so paint a room that the light entering only through some little hole, you shall perceive beautiful and perfect figures and shapes; but if you open the windows, and let in a full light, at most you shall see but some imperfect lines and shadows. So things of this world seem great and beautiful unto those who are in darkness, and have but little light of heaven; but those who enjoy the perfect light of truth and faith find nothing in them of substance.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

6. It deludes that it may degrade and destroy.

(5003.) The world deals with too many like a bad neighbour, that makes a man drunk purposely to defeat him of his purse or patrimony; when the liquor is evaporated the man awakes and finds himself a beggar.
—Bramiard.

7. How we are to treat it.

(5004.) Queen Elizabeth once said to a courtier, "They pass best over the world who trip over it quickly; for it is but a bog: if we stop, we sink."
—Spurgeon.

8. The folly of those who are ensnared by it.

(5005.) We pity the folly of the lark, which, while it playeth with the feather and stoopeth to the glass, is caught in the fowler's net: and yet cannot see ourselves alike made fools by Satan, who, deluding us by the vain feathers and glasses of the world, suddenly enwrappeth us in his snares. We see not the nets, indeed; it is too much that we shall feel them, and that they are not so easily escaped after as before avoided. O Lord, keep Thou mine eyes from beholding vanity. And, though mine eyes see it, let not my heart stoop to it, but loathe it afar off. And, if I stoop at any time, and be taken, set Thou my soul at liberty; that I may say, "My soul is escaped, even as a bird out of the snare of the fowler: the snare is broken, and I am delivered."
—Hall, 1574-1656.

III. ITS PURSUIT BY THE UNGODLY.

1. Their earnestness in its pursuit.

(5006.) Tell some of adding faith to faith, one degree of grace to another, and you shall find they have more mind to join house to house, and field to field. It is earth, earth; and they never think they have had enough of the soil, till death comes and stops their mouth with a shovelful digged out of their own grave.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5007.) Henry IV. of France, asking the Duke of Alva if he had observed the eclipses happening in that year, he answered that he had so much business on earth that he had no leisure to look up to heaven. A sad thing it is for men to be so bent, and their hearts so set on the things of this world, as not to cast up a look to the things that are in heaven; nay, not to regard, though God brings heaven down to them in His Word and sacraments. Yet so it is; most men are of this Spanish general's mind—witness the oxen, the farms, the pleasures, the profits, and preferments that men are so fast glued unto, that they have hardly leisure to entertain a thought of any goodness.
—Spencer, 1658.

2. Their folly in its pursuit.

(5008.) It is a great deal of care and pains that the spider takes in weaving her web; she runneth much, and often up and down; she fetcheth a compass this way and that way, and returneth often to the same point; she spendeth herself in multitudes of fine threads, to make herself a round cabinet; she exenterath herself, and worketh out her own bowels, to make an artificial and curious piece of work, which, when it is made, is apt to be blown away with every puff of wind. She hangeth it up aloft, she fasteneth it to the roof of the house, she strengtheneth it with many a thread, wheeling often round about, not sparing her own bowels, but spending them willingly upon her work. And when she hath done all this, spun her fine threads, weaved them one within another, wrought herself a fine canopy, hung it aloft, and thinks all is sure,—suddenly, in the twinkling of an eye, with a little sweep of a broom all falls to the ground, and so her labour perisheth. But here is not all, poor spider! she is killed either in her own web, or else she is taken in her own snare, haled to death, and trodden under foot. Thus the silly animal may be truly said either to weave her own winding-sheet, or to make a snare to hang herself. Just so do many men waste and consume themselves to get preferment, to enjoy pleasures, to heap up riches and increase them; and to that end they spend all their wit, and oftentimes the health of their bodies, running up and down, labouring and sweating, carking and caring; and when they have done all this, they have but weaved the spider's web to catch flies, yea, oftentimes are caught in their own nets, are made instruments of their own destruction, they take a great deal of pains with little success, to no end or purpose.

—Drexelius, 1581-1638.

(5009.) As the millstone which turns about all day, grinding corn for others and not for itself, at night stands in the same place where it was in the morning, and after that great plenty of grain has passed by it is emptied of all, having no good by the bargain but to wear itself out for the profit of others; so worldly men, in attaining unto earthly vanities, toil themselves the whole day of this life, and when the night of death approaches, they are in the same case that they were in when they began, and having now only their labour for their pains, they retain nothing of all which has passed through their hands, but are constrained to leave them to the world, from which they first had them.
—Downe, 1644.

(5010.) We affect the vanities of the world, not for any good we see in them, but rather in self-love, pride, envy, and emulation, because we would prevent others, and obtain that which they so much desire. Like unto boys, who with all eagerness run after a ball, not for the love of itself, but that they may catch it before another, whereas they would scarce look after it if they had no competitor to contend with them. And as the vulgar people running in flocks to see some vain sight, do move others, who scarcely know wherefore they make such haste, to go with them for company, and even to outstrip their fellows with nimble speed; so do they run with headlong haste in the pursuit of these worldly vanities, not because themselves know any worth or excellency in them, but because they see that many have gone before them, and that many are still going speedily in this course; they also go for company, labouring to prevent them with their haste, and to obtain that first, which being obtained they do not know as yet whether it be worth their having and enjoying.
—Downe, 1644.

(5011.) The rich worldling is but a hired porter, that carries a great load of wealth on his weary back all day, till he groan under it; at night, when the sun of his life sets, it is taken from him, and he is turned into a foul stable, a squalid grave, perchance with a galled shoulder, a raw and macerated conscience
—Adams, 1654.

(5012.) They who dive into the bottom of this sea of the world to the hazard of their lives, instead of the pearl of contentment and happiness which they take such pains for, bring up nothing but their hands full of the sand and gravel of vexation and anguish. All the ways of worldly delights are strewn with nettles and briars, so that its greatest darlings are but like bears robbing a bee hive, that with much labour get a little honey, but are soundly stung for their pains.
—Swinnock, 1673.

(5013.) What folly is it to dandle this vain world in our affections, whose joy, like the child's laughter on the mother's knee, is sure to end in a cry at last. Oh, remember Dives, stirring up his pillow and composing himself to rest; how he was called up by the tidings of death, before he was warm in his bed of ease.

Art thou trimming thy slimy carcass, while thy soul is dropping into hell? What is this but to be painting the door when the house is on fire?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5014.) It is a dreaming and distracted world, that spend their days and cares for nothing; and are as serious in following a feather, and in the pursuit of that which they confess is vanity, and dying in their hands, as if, indeed, they knew it to be true felicity. They are like children busy in hunting butterflies; or like boys at football—as eager in the pursuit, and in overturning one another, as if it were for their lives or for some great, desirable prize; or more like to a heap of ants that gad about as busily and make as much ado for sticks and dust as if they were about some magnificent work. Thus doth the vain, deceived world lay out their thoughts and time upon impertinencies, and talk and walk like so many noctambules in their sleep; they study, and care, and weep, and laugh, and labour and fight as men in a dream, and will hardly be persuaded but it is reality which they pursue till death come and awake them. Like a stage-play or a puppet-play, where all things seem to be what they are not, and all parties seem to do what they do not, and depart, and are all disrobed and unmasked; such is the life of the most of this world, who spend their days in a serious jesting, and in a busy doing of nothing.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(5015.) Gotthold one day looked on while a gardener watched a mole, caught it at its mischievous work, threw it with his spade out of the earth, and made it pay with its life for the damage it had done. This creature's whole employment, thought he within himself, is to plough up the well-dressed gardens and fields, to gnaw and destroy the roots of plants, and, by the many heaps it forms, to disfigure and spoil the parterres and meadows; all which it does for the sake of its food. Able to see and cater for itself in the dark, and even beneath the earth, it is blind when unexpectedly brought into light. And so it is with the man of the world. He burrows and fitches in secret, seeks his own advantage at the expense of others, who wither and perish through his devices, and raises on every hand the monuments of his envy and selfishness. Besides, wise and crafty though he be in temporal things, he knows absolutely nothing of those that are spiritual and divine. But death stands by, and only waits the nod of the Most High to terminate in a moment his projects and intrigues, and cast the miserable man out of the earth, into the earth again; I mean, from all his temporal possessions into the grave.

—Scriber, 1629-1693.

(5016.) You may see a field of corn, yet full of fine showy poppies; if you turn some children into it, you will see them rush to the poppies, and altogether overlook the corn, and take no notice of it. Now this is the conduct of the men of the world—like the children, they are all eagerly in quest of the poppies, the glittering baubles and trifles of this life, while they are overlooking the wheat, the solid grains of eternity;—the fruit, which, if gathered into the garner, would endure unto eternal life.

—Salter.

(5017.) The men of this world are children. Offer a child an apple and a bank-note, he will doubtless choose the apple.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(5018.) How infatuated and criminal is the worldling! How beguiled his mind, and how criminal his heart, if he will still act against all experience, and all the declarations which God hath made! When a ship has been wrecked, and no hope of escape remained, the sailors have sometimes been so infatuated that, despising every consideration most suited to their danger, they have staved the liquor casks; determining that when there was no hope on earth, they would at least die in the midst of sensual gratification! You are ready to exclaim—"Surely these are not rational creatures!" But I scruple not to say that, if you continue to live a careless and ungodly life, while the pageant of this world is passing, and die in that state, such a wretched sailor is, in comparison, more rational than you are. If one were to remonstrate with such a stupid creature, it is probable he would say—"There is no help. I may live half-an-hour; and I am determined to get rid of what sensibility I have in order not to perceive my death, and enjoy a present gratification. I have no hope—no prospect; I can do nothing!" But no man, who has the Gospel preached in his ears, can say, however the world passeth away, and the procession is advancing, and with many of us almost gone, yet, no man can say—"There is no help;" for he may yet "flee for refuge to the hope set before him;" he may yet place his foot on the rock; he may yet escape the shipwreck: deliverance is proclaimed whenever the Gospel is preached, and whenever the Holy Spirit brings any light to the heart of man.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

3. Their sinfulness in its pursuit.

(5019.) All sin is hateful to God, and none but the cleansed perfect soul shall stand before Him in the presence of His glory; nor any in whom iniquity hath dominion shall stand accepted in the presence of His grace; but yet no particular sin is so hateful to Him as idolatry is. For this is not only a trespassing against His laws, but a disclaiming or rejecting His very Sovereignty itself. To give a prince irreverent language, and to break his laws, is punishable; but to pull him out of his throne, and set up a scullion in it, and give him the honour and obedience of a king, this is another kind of matter, and much more intolerable. The first commandment is not like the rest, which require only obedience to particular laws in a particular action; but it establisheth the very relations of sovereign and subject, and requires a constant acknowledgment of these relations, and makes it high treason against the God of heaven in any that shall violate that command. Every crime is not treason : it is one thing to miscarry in a particular case, and another thing to have other gods before and besides the Lord, the only God. Now this is the sin of every worldling : he hath taken down God from the throne in his soul, and set up the flesh and the world in His stead ; these he valueth, and magnifieth, and delighteth in ; these have his very heart, while God that made it and redeemed him is set light by.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(5020.) Sirs, the thing that we are reproving is, that the world gets so much of your heart, and God so little. The creature should but have a small portion of your affections, if it be not the creature, but God that is your portion. But, alas ! many are like the great man, that, being asked if he ever saw an eclipse of the sun, said, "He had so much ado upon earth, he never had time to look up to heaven." Just so may it be said of multitudes in the world, they are so much taken up with the things of time, the vain and perishing things of the world, they never get time to look up into, and call upon God.

—Ralph Erskine, 1685-1752.

4. In the end it will profit them nothing.

(5021.) The world is not unfitly compared to a fishing-net, and the end of the world to the drawing up of the nets. While the nets are down there is nothing said to be caught, for the nets may break and the fish escape. But at the end of the world, when the nets are drawn up, it will then evidently appear what every man hath caught ; and then those that have fished for riches, or gain, sovereignty, and power over their brethren, for the honours and preferments of this world, may say, with Peter, "Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing." They dreamt of riches, and honours, and powers ; but, being now awake, they find nothing in their hands at all. But those that have here fished for godliness, for peace, and for the honour of God, may say, "Lord, at Thy word we have let down our net ; and have caught, yea, we have caught abundantly ; we have fished for godliness, and have gotten life eternal ; for grace, and we have gotten glory ; for goodness, and we have gotten God Himself, who is the fountain of all goodness and glory.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(5022.) Ah vain world ! thou art a poor reward for the loss of Christ and heaven. While Satan is pleasing thy fancy, sinner, with the rattles and baubles of the earth, his hand is in thy treasure, robbing thee of that which alone is necessary. It is more necessary to be saved than to be ; better not to be, than to be in hell.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

5. How it will seem to them in the hour of death.

(5023.) When the race is ended, and the play either won or lost, and ye are in the utmost circle and border of time, and shall put your foot within the march of eternity, all the good things of your short night-dream shall seem to you like ashes of a blaze of thorns or straw.

—Rutherford, 1661.

(5024.) What occasions the surprise and the despair of the sinner on the bed of death, is to see that the world in which he had ever placed all his confidence is nothing, is but a dream, which vanishes and is annihilated. But the faithful soul, in this last moment, ah ! he sees the world in the same light he had always viewed it ; as a shadow which flitteth away ; as a vapour which deceives at a distance, but, when approached, has neither reality nor substance.

—Massillon.

(5025.) I have seen death in a variety of forms, and have had frequent occasion of observing how insignificant many things, which are now capable of giving us pain or pleasure, will appear when the soul is brought near to the borders of eternity. All the concerns which relate solely to this life, will then be found as trivial as the traces of a dream from which we are awakened.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

IV. THE CHRISTIAN AND THE WORLD.

1. While in the world, he is not to be of it.

(5026.) A servant, whilst a stranger walks with his master, follows them both ; but when the stranger takes his leave and departs from his master, he leaves the stranger and follows his master. Thus whilst the world does any way concur with the Lord, and conduces to the salvation of the precious soul, so far we may accompany it ; but if it once depart from that, then let us give the world a farewell, follow God, and have a care of our souls.

—John Denison, 1621.

(5027.) Let us use worldly things as wise pilgrims do their staves and other necessaries convenient for their journey. So long as they help us forward in our way, let us make use of them, and accordingly esteem them. But if they become troublesome hindrances and cumbersome burdens, let us leave them behind us, or cast them away.

—Lowname, 1644.

(5028.) The cream of the creature floats at top ; and he that is not content to fleet it, but thinks by drinking a deeper draught to find yet more, goes further to speed worse.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5029.) Imitate little children, who, as they with one hand hold fast by their father, and with the other gather strawberries or blackberries along the hedges, so you gathering and handling the goods of this world with one hand, must with the other always hold fast the hand of your Heavenly Father, turning yourself towards Him from time to time, to see if your actions or occupations be pleasing to Him ; but above all things, take heed that you never let go His protecting hand.

—Salus.

(5030.) All the water is waste that runs beside the mill ; so all thy thoughts and words are waste which are not to the glory of God. A bee will not sit on a flower where no honey can be sucked ; neither should the Christian engage in anything but for his soul's good and God's honour.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5031.) A man and a beast may stand upon the same mountain, and even touch one another, yet they are in two different worlds : the beast perceives nothing but the grass ; but the man contemplates the prospect, and thinks of a thousand remote things. Thus a Christian may be solitary at a full

Exchange ; he can converse with the people there upon trade, politics, and the stocks ; but they cannot talk with him upon the peace of God, which passeth all understanding.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(5032.) Christianity allows us to use the world, provided we do not abuse it. It does not spread before us a delicious banquet, and then come with a "Touch not, taste not, handle not."

—Porteous, 1731-1808.

2. In what Christian nonconformity to the world consists.

(1.) Not in going out of the world.

(5033.) To forsake the world, is not to go out of the world. It is not to forsake personal society, though all vicious society must be forsaken. It is not to vow a voluntary poverty, with the Papists. It is not to be idle and improvident ; but, positively, never to forsake it in the four following respects :—1. In respect of the immoderate use of the enjoyment of the world (1 Cor. vii. 29-31). We are to use it as stewards, that are to give an account. 2. In respect of service. Be not servants or slaves to it, for you cannot both serve God and mammon. 3. In respect of confidence. Trust not to it. Although you have worldly advantages, make them not your staff, your stay, your choice jewels. 4. In respect of adherence. Be not glued to the world. Let not the world be like the skin on the hand, that will not easily come off ; but like the glove on your hand, or the hat on your head, that you can easily part with.

—Ralph Erskine, 1685-1752.

(2.) Not in cultivating singularities of dress or manners, but in making the will of Christ the rule of our life.

(5034.) While, as men, we have many things in common with other men, yet, as Christians, we are expected to possess something original and peculiar. Our opinions, practice, and conduct are to be determined by the will of Christ (1 John ii. 3, 6). The world may be governed by its own laws. If they coincide with Christ's in anything, or in everything, it is well, and Christians are not to affect singularity. If they differ, the Christian community has another rule by which it is governed. I have a family in a gay, wicked, thoughtless city. As the head of that family I give laws by which I expect it will be influenced. Around me may be one family governed by the laws of fashion ; another by the laws of honour ; a third, perhaps, by certain arbitrary rules which pickpockets and highwaymen have set up. I do not interfere with them ; nor do I say that in no respects shall my family coincide with them. If they have anything commendable I shall not denounce it, nor demand that my children shall affect singularity. What I expect is, that my children will obey my laws. If my neighbour presumes to legislate in the case, and demands that my family shall forsake my laws ; if he affirms that my statutes are stern and harsh, and should be modified—that is a question for me to consider, not for him to legislate on.

Just so it is with Christianity. Christ has established a set of laws, and demanded a certain course of life. If the members of any other community, or of fifty others, should in many things, or in all things, coincide with what religion would produce, the Christian is not to affect singularity in the case. The question is whether I am adhering to the laws of the peculiar kingdom by which I am governed, and not whether others are falling in with these laws also.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

(3.) In abstaining from unnecessary intercourse with the men of the world.

(5035.) A saint must be separated,—not locally, but in regard of amity, in regard of intimate friendship ; as we see it is in outward things in some of our houses. There is a court where all come, poor and rich ; and there is in the house where those of nearer acquaintance come ; and then there is the innermost room, the closet, where only ourselves and those which are nearest to us come. So it is in the passages of the soul. There are some remote courtesies that come from us, as men, to all, be they what they will ; there are other respects to those that are nearer, that we admit nearer, that are of better quality ; and there are other that are nearest of all, that we admit even into the closet of our hearts ; and those are they with whom we hope to have communion for ever in heaven, the blessed people of God.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(5036.) A Christian in the world is like a man transacting his affairs in the rain. He will not suddenly leave his client because it rains ; but the moment the business is done he is off : as it is said in the Acts, "Being let go, they went to their own company."

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(5037.) There is a certain degree of intercourse which must subsist between us and the world. But it is by no means desirable to extend it beyond that which the duties of our calling absolutely require. Our Lord declares that His faithful followers "are not of the world." The apostles also with one voice guard us against cultivating the friendship of the world ; and teach us to come out from among them, and to live as a distinct "peculiar people," "shining among them as lights in the dark place." We should go to them indeed when duty calls, as the physician enters the infected chambers of the sick ; but we should never forget that "evil communications corrupt good manners ;" and that an undue familiarity with them is far more likely to weaken the spirituality of our own minds than to generate a holy disposition in theirs. In us should be verified the prophecy of Balaam, "Israel shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations."

—Simeon, 1758-1836.

(4.) In setting before us as the ends of life the attainment of eternal blessedness, the promotion of the Divine glory, and the advancement of the welfare of our fellow-men : and in abstaining from those pursuits and pleasures that are inconsistent therewith.

(5038.) The Christian and the carnal man are most wonderful to each other. The one wonders to see the other walk so strictly, and deny himself to those carnal liberties that the most take, and take for so necessary, that they think they could not live without them. And the Christian thinks it strange that men should be so bewitched, and still remain children in the vanity of their turmoil, wearying and humouring themselves from morning to night, running after stories and fancies, ever busy doing nothing ; wonders that the delights of earth and sin can so long entertain and please men, and persuade them to give Jesus Christ so many refusals—to turn from their life and happiness, and choose to be miserable, yea, and take much pains to make themselves miserable. He knows the depravedness and blindness of nature in this—knows it by himself, that once he was so, and therefore wonders not so much at them as they do at him; yet the unreasonableness and frenzy of that course now appears to him in so strong a light that he cannot but wonder at those woful mistakes. But the ungodly wonder far more at him, not knowing the inward cause of his different choice and way. The believer, as we said, is upon the hill; he is going up, looks back on them in the valley, and sees their way tending to and in death, and calls them to retire from it as loud as he can; tells them the danger; but either they will not hear or understand this language, or will not believe him. Finding present ease and delight in their way, they will not consider and suspect the end of it; but they judge him the fool that will not share with them and take that way where such multitudes go and with such ease, and some of them with their train and horses and coaches and all their pomp; and he and a few straggling poor creatures like him climbing up a craggy, steep hill, and will by no means come off from that way and partake of theirs, not knowing or not believing that at the top of that hill he climbs is that happy, glorious city, the New Jerusalem, whereof he is a citizen, and whither he is tending; not believing that he knows the end both of their way and his own, and therefore would reclaim them if he could; but will by no means return to them, as the Lord commanded the prophet (Jer. xv. 19).

—Leighton, 1611-1684.

(5039.) Lycurgus framed a code of laws for Sparta. He had an object in each of his statutes, and he designed to rear a peculiar community. It was not the love of singularity, it was not a wish to differ from others for the mere sake of being different. It was with reference to his great object—to make the Spartans valiant, hardy, laborious, daring freemen. With this object he framed his laws; and this design was understood by every Lacedemonian. Suppose, now, he had left some such direction as the text, "Be not conformed to surrounding nations, or even to the other republics of Greece." The command would have been intelligible. It would not mean, "Do not in anything coincide with others, for they may be temperate, and laborious, and valiant, as well as you, and in this do not affect singularity. Their conduct in this respect is just what is required of you. Do not pursue it because they do, but because it will contribute to the great designs of the republic." The command would forbid conformity to other people, if that conformity should interfere with the purpose of the Spartan lawgiver. It might easily be seen that even the arts of Athens, the extensive attention to statuary and ornamental architecture, might not consist with the main design of the Lacedemonian. Innocent as they might be in themselves, or consistent as they might be in the members of the republic of Athens, yet should the Lacedemonians turn their attention to statuary or to the fine arts, as a people, they would abandon the peculiar design of the lawgiver in making them a hardy and valorous race of freemen. It would easily be seen that the delicacies and refinements of Corinth, its fashion and splendour, its luxuries and amusements, as well as its licentious habits, would be inconsistent with the design of the Spartan. Whether they were well for the Corinthian was another question; and a question which it did not pertain to the Spartan to settle. His inquiry was of a different kind. What was the will of the lawgiver? And are these things consistent with his plain and obvious directions? His design was to train up a peculiar community; was qualified to judge of that design. He contemplated that no other one—not even one of the confederated republics of Greece—should presume to come in and legislate for his people. If this peculiar design was consistent with their views and conduct, it was well. They would be conformed to, not because they were the views of Athens or Corinth, but because they contributed to the great purpose of the Lacedemonian lawgiver. In no case had they a right to originate laws for his people, or to demand that his laws should be conformed to their views.

Thus with the Christian. If the views and conduct of others coincide with his, it is well. If they do not, they are not at liberty to come in and demand that he shall be conformed to them. He has higher laws, and a higher object. He has a purpose which strikes on to eternity. His aim is to prepare for heaven. Theirs, to live for time. Nor can they claim jurisdiction over conduct that has been directed by the Son of God, and that He has judged best in ordering His peculiar community. The simple question is, whether a proposed course of conduct or opinion is consistent with the spirit and life demanded by the King of Zion.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

(5040.) This rule: "Be ye not conformed to this world," forbids all mingling with the world which is inconsistent with the great objects of the kingdom of Christ, or which will not on the whole tend to promote it. It is not needful to state what those objects are. They may be summed up in a desire to become personally assimilated to Jesus Christ, and to bring our fellow-men to the hope of the same heaven. Now with this desire to be precisely what will be approved by the mind of Christ, we may apply the rule before us. It will be a test of the propriety of a thousand things which might otherwise be the subject of much debate. It will constitute a nice tact by which we may approach a great variety of objects without danger of error. A child can much more easily decide whether a thing will be acceptable to the mind of his father, than he could settle its propriety by argument. The inhabitant of Sparta could see at once that many things were inconsistent with the design of his republic, which he could by no means settle in an abstract manner. Whether the aim of the Athenian was proper, or the mild and soft pleasures of the Corinthian, he might not be able to settle by argument, but this would not be the way in which to train up the Lacedemonian. So it might become a question of abstract casuistry about a thousand scenes of amusement. It would be easy to argue by the hour in favour of parties of pleasure, and theatres, and ball-rooms, and all the vanity of fashionable life, and the mind might "find no end of wandering mazes lost." But apply the rule before us, and all mist vanishes. Since the beginning of the world, no professing Christian ever dreamed that he was imitating the example of Jesus Christ, or honouring the Christian religion, in a theatre, a ball-room, or a splendid party of pleasure. And equally clear would be the decision in reference to multitudes of pleasures which it is needless to specify.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

(5.) In keeping the affections disengaged from the world.

(5041.) A right believer goes through the world as a man whose mind is in a deep study, or as one that has special haste of some weighty business goes through a street, that gazes on nothing, hears nothing, minds nothing that is in the way, but only that with which his mind is taken up withal. Our conversation is in heaven, our treasure is in heaven.

—Ward, 1577-1639.

(5042.) A Christian is like Jacob's ladder; while his body, that lower part, stands on the ground, the top, his higher and better part, is in heaven.

He that hath the living waters of Jesus flowing in his heart, is mad if he stoop to the puddles of vanity, or seek content in the world. Yea, such a one will scarce descend to lawful pleasures, but for God's allowance, and nature's necessity; and then but as the eagle, who lives aloft, and stoops not but for her prey.

—Adams, 1653.

(5043.) The flower called heliotropium turns its face towards the sun from morning to night, so does the true Christian towards the Sun of Righteousness. The command of God is, "Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long;" and the carriage of holy men is answerable hereunto; "The twelve tribes served God instantly day and night." As the angels, though they are employed up and down in the world for the service of the saints, yet they "always behold the face of their Father;" so the children of God, though they are occupied about civil and natural actions, are called hither and thither as their occasions are, yet they pass the whole time of their sojourning here in fear. That watch is naught that goes only at first winding up, and stands still all the day after; that man's religion is little worth that, like Ephraim's goodness, is as a morning cloud or dew, which vanishes away ere noon.

The rivers run ever toward the sea, notwithstanding that hills and rocks and mountains interpose and force them to their winding meanders; nay, their compass about is not without profit, for they water those grounds in their passage through which they seem to wander. The person that has the living water of grace in him is always tending toward the ocean of his happiness, notwithstanding his diversions by his worldly actions and particular vocations; nay, he is doing good and serving his God and his soul, as well as his family and body, in those interjections.

The wheel of a chariot, though it be in motion all the day, and turning about the ground, yet it is but a small part of it that touches the earth at one time; the greatest part is always above it. So the true Christian; though he be all the day busy about earthly affairs, yet it is but his body, his lesser part, that is employed about them; his soul, his affections, which are his greater part, are always above them.

—Swinnock, 1673.

8. Why he is not to set his affections on things below.

(1.) Because the wealth and honours of the world are not essential either to our dignity or happiness.

(5044.) If we excel in the use of reason and in the knowledge and practice of true religion, our goodness is not impaired when all worldly joys fail us. But if we be defective in them, and be either foolish men, or lame and bastardly Christians, these outward ornaments will be but like gay hangings on rotten and broken walls, which commend us to the sight of others, but do not better us in ourselves, by stopping our breaches and repairing our ruins. And as those who are sick of the dropsy, seem fat and in good liking to those who are far off, whereas it plainly appears to those who look upon them nearer hand, that their beauty proceeds not from the good habitude of their bodies, but from their fulness of humours, which is the true cause of their disease: so those who abound with these outward things may seem better and more happy than others, but those who consider them easily find that it is but a diseased body which commends them, and that they are not in truth bettered by all these things, but rather the diseases and spiritual sicknesses of their souls increased and made more desperate and incurable.

Let us not, therefore, account ourselves bettered by these outward things, for then our goods and goodness will both at once fail us; but by those things in which our excellency consists, and which, being in us and peculiar to ourselves, do make us justly to be preferred before all other creatures.

We know that a player is not better than his fellows, because he acts a king's part, seeing all his excellency is in his outward habit, and nothing in his person: and if another act his part better, he is preferred far before him, though he sustain the meanest and basest personage, because his work is measured, not by his gay clothes, but by his excellency in his own faculty and profession.

A surgeon is not commended because he goes in brave apparel, but for his great skill in curing wounds. And the scholar is not magnified for his fair house or full chests, but for his excellency in all manner of knowledge and learning. Neither is the pilot praised because he has a fair ship gilt with gold and well rigged, but for his skill in navigation, and care in using all his knowledge for the good of the passengers.

And thus also it is in other creatures. For the vine is not praised for its fair leaves, straight body, and good timber, but for its fruitfulness in bearing good and pleasant grapes. Neither is the horse bettered by his rich saddle and golden trappings, seeing his goodness consists not in these things which may at night be taken from him, but in his shape, strength, soundness, good pace, and sure travelling.

And so the excellency and goodness of a Christian consists not in these outward things, as honours, riches, pleasures, but in the fruits of godliness, which he oftentimes bears better and in greater abundance when he is pruned and these outward superfluities taken away; not in his gay habit and rich furniture, but in his swiftness and sureness in running the spiritual race, which he commonly best performs when he is lightened and unloaded of this worldly bravery.

—Downame, 1644.

(2.) Because their comparative unimportance is shown by the fact that they are bestowed on the good and on the bad indiscriminately.

(5045.) Outward things happen alike to good and bad. "There is one event to the clean and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not ; to him that sweareth, and to him that feareth an oath." They are both travellers in the thoroughfare of this world, both lodge in one inn, both have the same provision ; perhaps the wicked have the better cheer,—but in the morning their ways part !

—Adams, 1653.

(5046.) Although God cast common blessings promiscuously upon good and bad, yet He holds His best favours at a distance, as parents do cherries or apples from their children, to whet their appetites the more after them.

—John Hill, 1658.

(5047.) All the estate of a believer lies in hope—and it is a royal estate ! For outward things, the children of God have what He thinks fit to serve them : but those are not their portion, and therefore He gives often more of the world to those that shall have no more hereafter. But all their flourish and lustre is but a base advantage, as a lackey's gaudy clothes, that usually make more show than his that is heir of the estate.

—Leighton, 1611-1684.

(3.) Because they will not bear close and intelligent examination.

(5048.) The world and the best things of which it can boast are but mere vanities, and in comparison of God's spiritual graces, and our heavenly inheritance, of no worth or excellency. Neither is there anything in the earth great or excellent, but the Christian mind which contemns and despises these highly-esteemed vanities. They make a fair show, indeed, to those whose judgments are already forestalled with the false conceits of the corrupt flesh, and seem to be of some value and greatness to those who look upon them through the spectacles of affection. But if we pull off these false covers, and seriously and impartially behold them after their deceiving colours and painted vizards are laid aside, we shall find the world in its chief beauty and pomp to be but a glorious hypocrite, fair in show, and foul in truth, professing and promising much, and performing nothing ; or a beautiful sepulchre outwardly adorned with all cost and bravery, but within full of stench and rottenness ; or like unto our fair buildings in these times, which, making a sumptuous show to the passers-by, seem to invite poor men to receive relief, but within have no provision for hospitality, nor food to refresh those who stand in need. The like vanity also is in all those worldly things which are so affected and admired of those who have erected them in their hearts, as their idols whom they serve and adore ; herein truly resembling idols and images, which are outwardly adorned with gold and precious ornaments, and make representation of some excellent personage, whereas if you examin. them any further than the very superficies and outside, you shall find them no better than stocks or stones. So these worldly vanities seem to those whose weak sight can pierce no deeper than the outward show, beautiful and glorious ; whereas, in truth, if we could behold them inwardly with the eye of a sound judgment, we should easily discern them to be contemptibly base and of no value. In this respect, like those goodly and beautiful pageants which being outwardly adorned and set forth with gold and painted colours, move multitudes of people to run after them, and to behold them with joyful admiration and ravishing wonder ; whereas if you look into their inside, you shall find nothing but a few sticks, rags, and patches ; and in respect of their durability so slight and weak, that they are only fit for a vain show, and to serve for a day's sport.

—Downham, 1644.

(4.) Because they are perilous to the soul.

(5049.) What the astronomers say of the eclipses of the sun, that it is occasioned by the intervening of the moon between the sun and our sight, is true in this case : if the world get between Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, and our sight, it will darken our sight of Jesus Christ, and bring eclipses upon our comforts and graces. Again, those men that dig deep into the bowels of the earth, they are oft-times choked and stifled by damps that come from the earth. So it is with Christians, those that will be ever poring and digging about the things of this world, it is a thousand to one that if from worldly things a damp doth not arise to smother their comforts and quench their graces. Lastly, a candle, though it may shine to the view of all, yet put it under ground, and (though there be not the least puff of wind) the very damp will stifle the light of the flame ; and so it is that men may shine like candles in their comforts, yet bring them but under the earth, and a clod of that will stifle their candle, will damp their spiritual comforts, and bereave them of those joys that are in themselves unspeakable.

—John Magirus.

(5050.) As the excellent and noble hawk called a falcon, upon the fist of the fowler, seeing a prey flying on high, doth by and by spread her wings and offer to break the strings wherewith she is holden, and to be gone after the prey, but if she be hooded, she neither seeth the prey nor is any whit moved : even so man, whose nature far excelleth all other living creatures, thinking upon the things that are above in heaven with God, and with the eyes of his mind beholding eternal bliss and endless felicity, he is inflamed and pricked with a great and wonderful desire to attain unto the same ; but if he be hooded with ignorance, spiritual blindness, and a love of this world, he will never be touched with any heavenly motion, nor any whit moved with any right love of God, nor once turn so much as an eye of his mind towards heaven or God.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(5051.) Learn to despise the world ; or, which is a better compendium in the duty, learn but truly to understand it ; for it is a cozenage all the way ; the head of it is a rainbow, and the face of it is flattery ; its words are charms, and all its stories are false ; its body is a shadow, and its hands do knit spiders' webs ; it is an image and a noise, with a hyena's lip and a serpent's tail ; it was given to serve the needs of our nature, and instead of doing it, it creates strange appetites and nourishes thirsts and fevers ; it brings care, and debauches our nature, and brings shame and death as the reward of all our cares. Our nature is a disease, and the world doth nourish it ; but if you leave to feed on such unwholesome diet, your nature reverts to its first purities, and to the entertainments of the grace of God.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(5052.) Some are not made better by God's gifts ; yea, many are made worse. Give Saul a kingdom, and he will tyrannise ; give Nabal good cheer, and he will be drunk ; give Judas an apostleship, and he will sell his Master for money.

—Adams, 1653.

(5053.) The devil can desire no greater advantage against thee than to overlade thee with worldly care, that he may say, as Pharaoh of Israel, "He is entangled, he is entangled." If this thief of care robs thee of thy time, get out of his hands, lest he rob thee of thy soul. If a friend should tell you that you kept so many servants as would beggar you, would you not listen to his counsel, and rather turn them out of doors than keep them within ? Wilt thou, then, keep such a rout of worldly occasions, as will eat up all thoughts of God and heaven ?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5054.) Who gave thee leave, Christian, to overlade thyself with the encumbrances of life ? Is not God the Lord of thy time, as of everything else ? He does indeed allow thee a fair portion for the lower employments of the body, but did He ever intend to turn Himself out of all ? This is, as if the sailors, who are allowed by the merchant some small adventure for themselves, should fill the ship, and leave no stowage for his goods ; or as if a servant should excuse himself to his master, when reproved for neglecting his duty, by saying he could not do it, because he was drunk.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5055.) The world does by the Christian as the little child by its mother ; if it cannot keep her from going out, then it cries after her to go with her. So, if the world cannot keep us from going to religious duties, then it will cry to be taken along with us, and there is much ado to part it from the affections and thoughts. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5056.) A Christian too conversant with people of the world, resembles a bright piece of plate too much exposed to the air ; which, though in reality it continues plate still, yet grows tarnished, and loses its fine burnish, and needs a fresh cleansing and rubbing up.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(5057.) A thread can hide a star ; a sixpence can hide the view of everything around us ; and a man with but a little of this fleeting world may blind his mind, harden his heart, and he may lose himself, and be cast away at last.

(5058.) The world betrays the soul as well as the hopes ; it betrays a man's soul to ruin, like sweet poison, that goes down pleasantly, but kills presently. The silken cords of the world have taken many a prisoner, and they have proven their fetters, which they could never break again. As Judas said of our blessed Lord, "Whomsoever I kiss, take Him, hold Him fast." So the world, being the devil's agent, says, "Whomsoever I kiss and embrace, and embraceth me mutually, and setteth his heart upon me, take him, hold him fast."

—Ralph Erskine, 1685-1752.

(5059.) I do pity from the bottom of my soul the careful, busy world, and would fain do my little part to instruct and warn them ; or, if I cannot save them from certain destruction, to instruct and warn all against the strong current and whirling eddies of the gulf in which, alas, the multitude are sweeping downwards to destruction ! What think you, my dear friends ? is there not a voice without you that says, "I was not made to be the world's drudge, but to be the world's monarch ! Else why this capacious understanding of all secrets of nature ; this cunning hand that worketh it into infinite forms ; this eye, which, being armed with ingenious instruments, at once possesseth the amplest and the most minute of things ? And why this heart, which is blank in the midst of riches, and possessions, and honours, and power ? Surely this soul of mine is not made to be the companion, much less the bondsman, of those creatures ; for it is uncomfortable in the midst of them. They cannot quiet the remorse of crime ; they cannot heal the wounds of affection ; they cannot extract the power of ingratitude, or fill up the tedium of disappointment. They bring me no peace ; they do but increase my cares : one mountain climbed, another ariseth before me, and another, and there is no end of the labour. I do but get deeper into the bowels of this charmed land, and lose more and more my own liberty, my own innocence, my own being. I am hurried and hastened along with a multitude, who hurry and haste they know not whither. I could wish again for the ignorance and inexperience of my youth ; for certainly I grow daily more hardened, and more cold, and more shrewd, and more artful. I am made familiar with deception, and trained to endure it, to conform to it. And what do I reap as the fruit of these earnest and laborious sowings ? I reap a great increase of care, a heap of worldly ambitions, an intoxication of worldly pleasure. But where is conscience gone ? Where are those ingenious thoughts with which my life commenced, the blushings of shame, the ardours of enthusiasm, the artless simplicity, the free and delicate honour, the tender and romantic affections, the chivalrous purposes, the gay and glorious morning of my life ? Where is the poetry and the romance, and the beauty, with which my early soul did invest all things. Ah ! and have I reaped the loss of all these fascinations ? have I resigned this attendant angel, whom I wooed in youth, for the worldly beldam who now sits heavy upon my aged breast, and drinks the life-blood of my heart ?" There is hardly a wider difference between an angel and a demon, than there often is between a young man entering the world in all the rich exuberance of youthful spirit, fulness of a joyful heart, and pasture of a simple and innocent imagination ; and the same being after he hath been well drugged in mammon's workshop ; worn and wearied out with the chances of life's lottery, if not fretted and maddened at the great gaming table of ambition. Which difference all know better than I can describe it ; for mine has been as the inland lake, compared with that boisterous sea on which many have had to steer their course. And yet I am not ignorant (as who can, who hath fairly grappled and wrestled with the world ?) of the fearful havoc it maketh upon the fair person of a man. Which may well be likened to a brave and martial troop of soldiers riding into the field of battle, in all the freshness of morning strength, with military glee and brave banners, burnished steel and warlike minstrelsy ; and the same troop returning, tattered and torn, wounded and slain, weary and sorrowful, covered with their own blood and the dust of the ground ; and as such a troop, which hath been defeated and disgraced, routed and put to flight, so is every company of men whom you may fix upon, after having contended in this world's contest, to what they were when they entered into that conflict, more direful to the spirits of men than ever was any battle by sea or land to their bodies.

—Irving, 1792-1834.

(5.) Because they can be serviceable to us only for a very little while.

(5060.) Temporal good things are not the Christian's freight, but his ballast, and therefore are to be desired to poise, not load the vessel; they are not his portion, but his spending-money in his journey; and no wise traveller desires to carry more money about him than will defray his actual expenses.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(6.) Because if we do so, we shall risk their continuance, and shall certainly destroy our spiritual peace.

(5061.) It is a good observation that is made upon that place of Job xxxviii. 22, where God thus challengeth Job: "Hast thou entered into the treasures of snow, or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail?" where the commentator noteth out that all the comforts of this world are but like the treasures of snow. Do but take a handful of snow, and crush it in your hands, it will melt away presently; but if you let it lie upon the ground it will continue for some time. And so it is with the things of this world: if you take the comforts of this life in your hands, and lay them too near your hearts in affection and love to them, they will quickly melt and vanish away from you; but if you leave them in the proper place, and do not set an inordinate affection upon them, they will continue the longer with you: as if you should line a garment with linen, it would do very well; but if you line it with pitch or glue, that will stick fast to the body, and in all likelihood spoil both the garment and the man who wears it. So, when the world is glued to your hearts, it spoils the comforts of all the mercies that you enjoy; and so it may be said, that the otherwise lawful use of them is abused when they are either used too affectionately in making gods of them, or being too eagerly bent in the guining of them.

—Spencer, 1658.

(7.) Because God has already bestowed on us a nobler portion.

(5062.) The Gospel mentions not riches, honours, beauty, pleasures; it passes these over in silence, which yet the Old Testament everywhere makes promise of. They were then children, and God pleased them with the promise of these toys and rattles, as taking with them. But in the Gospel He has shown us He has provided some better things for us; things spiritual and heavenly.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(8.) Because we have assured hope of a better inheritance.

(5063.) Ye who look for so much in another world, may well be content with little in this. Nothing is more contrary to a heavenly hope than an earthly heart. If you saw a rich man among the poor gleaners in harvest-time, as busy to pick up the stray ears as the most miserable beggar in the company, oh, how you would cry, Shame! at such a sordid wretch. Well, Christian, I tell thee, that thou art more shameful still, if thou art as earnest after the world's trash as the poor carnal creature that hath no portion beyond the field of this life.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5064.) I am not seeking to depreciate the art and mystery of a true and large success. Win it bravely; wear it nobly. I only pray you not to exaggerate its worth. Remember the limit of all that this world can give you, and its doom. Win your prizes; wear them. But sometimes, I charge you, lift the veil of your eternal future; dwarf these perishing vanities by the sublime forms of the eternal verities; dim their glitter or their glare by the awful sunlight of that higher world. There will be moments when your proudest successes will seem mean and poor as the playwright's tinsel, or as the gaudy lustre of a ball-room, when one passes out under the clear heaven, where the solemn flush of dawn is stealing up into the sky. When those moments come, entertain them. Let them give their messages. Sit thou still awhile, and hear the word of the Lord which they bring. It may be that a higher kingdom than any of which thou dreamest may then be within reach of thy hand. There is no need to fear lest this earth should be eclipsed by the vision. Its claim is too pressing, its hold is too strong. But the day will come when it will all vanish as a dream when one awaketh, when all your great things, to win which you are tempted to sacrifice a life, will seem slight in your esteem as a child's baubles in the dawning manhood of your immortality. I only pray you sometimes to remember this. I would not cripple you in the keen race which you are running. God forbid! If it is your commission, if the native tendency of your faculty is to get on, lay to your work with a will. Run boldly, run swiftly; the very effort is a culture. But do not despise the beaten; do not forget how heaven may honour them; and do not magnify the prize. It is not much, even if you have all you aim at. It is not much. It does not seem great to any but to the bedazzled seekers. We may say all of it, as Queen Elizabeth said of the crown in her last speech to her last Parliament, "It seems grander to those who look at it than to those who wear it." And it will not always seem grand even to you. Let the sunlight of heaven stream on it betimes; it will spare you pain and shame when life's brief fever fit is over; when you wake up to grasp the substance of which this world's brightest is but the shadow, and to take the crown which a man must lose the world for Christ to win.

—J. Baldwin Brown.

(9.) Because we thus dishonour God Himself.

(5065.) We may use earthly blessings when God bestows them, yet we are to be careful that we do not take our chief joy and comfort in them, but rather in the Lord who gave them, in the fruition of His spiritual graces, and in the assurance of our heavenly kingdom. For God did not give us these worldly cottages that we should joy in them, and neglect our stately palace; He did not bestow on us these toys and trifles that we should rest in them, and condemn our heavenly patrimony; but only He gives us these coarser meats to stay our stomachs for a time, till we come to the great supper of the Lamb; and casts unto us, as unto little children, these pleasing vanities, to keep us from crying and complaining, till we come to age and are capable of His heavenly excellences, and of those glorious gifts of incomparable value. And, therefore, as we are not always to be children in knowledge, so neither let us be children in affection, doting upon these earthly trifles which were only given us for a time to use, and neglecting in respect of them God's spiritual graces, and that heavenly happiness which is provided for us to enjoy. —Downam, 1644.

WORSHIP. PUBLIC

1. Characteristics of acceptable worship.

(1.) It must be offered by men who love and serve God.

(5066.) You think you serve God by coming to church; but if you refuse to let the Word convert you, how should God be pleased with such a service as this? It is as if you should tell your servant what you have for him to do, and because he hath given you the hearing, he thinks he should have his wages, though he do nothing of that which you set him to do. Were not this an unreasonable servant? Or would you give him according to his expectation? It is a strange thing that men should think that God will save them for dissembling with Him, and save them for abusing His name and ordinances. Every time you hear, or pray, or praise God, or receive the sacrament, while you deny God in your heart and remain unconverted, you do but despise Him, and show more of your rebellion than your obedience. Would you take him for a good tenant that at every rent-day would duly wait on you, and put off his hat to you, but bring you never a penny of rent? Or would you take him for a good debtor that brings you nothing but an empty purse, and expects you should take that for payment? God biddeth you come to church and hear the Word; and so you do, and so far you do well; but withal, He chargeth you to suffer the Word to work upon your hearts, and to take it home and consider of it, and obey it, and cast away your former courses, and give your hearts and lives to Him; and this you will not do. And you think that He will accept of your services! —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(5067.) If a person were to attend the levee of an earthly prince every court-day, and pay his obeisance punctually and respectfully, but at other times speak and act in opposition to his sovereign, the king would justly deem such a one an hypocrite and an enemy. Nor will a solemn and stated attendance on the means of grace in the house of God prove us to be God's children and friends,—if we confine our religion to the church walls, and do not devote our lips and lives to the glory of that Saviour we profess to love. —Salter, 1840.

(2.) It must be intelligent.

(5068.) Worship is an act of the understanding, applying itself to the knowledge of the excellency of God and actual thoughts of His majesty; recognising Him as the supreme Lord and Governor of the world, which is natural knowledge; beholding the glory of His attributes in the Redeemer, which is evangelical knowledge. This is the sole act of the spirit of man. The same reason is for all our worship as for our thanksgiving. This must be done with understanding: "Sing ye praise with understanding" (Ps. xlvii. 7); with a knowledge and sense of His greatness, goodness, and wisdom. It is also an act of the will, whereby the soul adores and reverences His majesty, is ravished with His amiableness, embraceth His goodness, enters itself into an intimate communion with this most lovely object, and pitcheth all his affections upon Him; we must worship God understandingly; it is not else a reasonable service. —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(3.) It must be sincere and spiritual.

(5069.) We may be truly said to worship God, though we want perfection; but we cannot be said to worship Him if we want sincerity; a statue upon a tomb, with eyes and hands lifted up, offers as good and true a service; it wants only a voice, the gestures and postures are the same; nay, the service is better; it is not a mockery; it represents all that it can be framed to; but to worship without our spirits, is a presenting God with a picture, an echo, voice, and nothing else; a compliment; a mere lie; a "compassing Him about with lies." —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(5070.) God doth not institute worship-ordinances for bodily motion only; He speaketh to man, as to a man, and requireth human actions from him, even the work of the soul, and not the words of a parrot, or the motion of a puppet.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(4.) It must be conducted with reverence.

(5071.) If He be "our Lord," let us do Him reverence. It hath ever been the manner and posture of God's servants, when either they offer anything to Him (Matt. ii. 11), or pray to receive anything from Him (Ps. xciv. 6), to do it on their knees. When the king gives us a pardon for our life, forfeited to the law, we receive it on our knees. When he bestows favour or honour, be it but a knighthood, men kneel for it. In that holy place, where men receive the forgiveness of sins, the honour of saints, so gracious a pardon, so glorious a blessing, there be some that refuse so humble a gesture to the Lord Himself. Never tell me of a humble heart, where I see a stubborn knee. Indeed, this bodily reverence is not all; the tongue and heart must not be left out. But when our body is in such a position, and our mind in such disposition, we are then fittest to speak of Him, and to speak to Him. The tongue must also confess His glory. Those little engines are nimble enough in our own occasions; they run like the plummets of a clock when the catch is broken. But in our public devotions, Amen is scarce heard among us. The Amen of the primitive church was like a clap of thunder; and their Hallelujah as the roaring of the sea. How do they convince our silence! —Adams, 1653.

(5072.) God is Lord of my body also: and therefore challengeth as well reverent gesture as inward devotion. I will ever, in my prayers, either stand, as a servant, before my Master; or kneel, as a subject, to my Prince. —Hall, 1576-1656.

(5073.) God is a Spirit, yet will have the reverence of our body as well as spirit, for both are His; and especially in the public. A prince would not like rude behaviour from his servant in his bed-chamber, where none besides himself is witness to it; but much less will he bear it in his presence-chamber, as he sits on his throne before many of his subjects. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5074.) I have sometimes had the misfortune to sit in concerts where persons would chatter and giggle and laugh during the performance of the profoundest passages of the symphonies of the great artists ; and I never fail to think, at such times, "I ask to know neither you, nor your father and mother, nor your name : I know what you are, by the way you conduct yourself here—by the want of sympathy and appreciation which you evince respecting what is passing around you." We could hardly help striking a man who should stand looking upon Niagara Falls without exhibiting emotions of awe and admiration. If we were to see a man walk through galleries of genius, totally unimpressed by what he saw, we should say to ourselves, "Let us be rid of such an unsusceptible creature as that."

Now I ask you to pass upon yourselves the same judgment. What do you suppose angels, that have trembled and quivered with ecstatic joy in the presence of God, think, when they see how indifferent you are to the Divine love and goodness in which you are perpetually bathed, and by which you are blessed and sustained every moment of your lives? How can they do otherwise than accuse you of monstrous ingratitude and moral insensibility, which betoken guilt as well as danger? —Becher.

2. Reasons for maintaining and observing it.

(1.) It is peculiarly acceptable to God.

(5075.) No doubt the prayers which the faithful put up to heaven from under their private roofs were very acceptable unto Him ; but if a saint's single voice in prayer be so sweet to God's ear, much more the church choir, His saints' prayers in consort together. A father is glad to see any one of his children, and makes him welcome when he visits him, but much more when they come together ; the greatest feast is when they all meet at his house. The public praises of the church are the emblem of heaven itself, where all the angels and saints make but one consort. There is a wonderful prevalence in the joint prayers of His people. When Peter was in prison, the church meets and prays him out of his enemies' hands. A prince will grant a petition subscribed by the hands of a whole city, which, may be, he would not at the request of a private subject, and yet love him well too. There is an especial promise to public prayer : "Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(2.) It is one of the chief channels of communication between our souls and God.

(5076.) He that has a cause to be heard will not go to Smithfield, nor he that has cattle to buy or sell, to Westminster. He that has bargains to make or news to tell should not come to do that at church ; nor he that has prayers to make, walk in the fields for his devotions. If I have a great friend, though in cases of necessity, as sickness or other restraints, he will vouchsafe to visit me, yet I must make my suits to him at home, at his own house. In cases of necessity, Christ in the sacrament vouchsafes to come home to me, and the court is where the King is. His blessings are with His ordinances wheresoever ; but the place to which He has invited me is His house. He that made the great supper in the Gospel called in new guests ; but he sent out no meat to them who had been invited, and might have come, and came not. Chamber prayers, single or with your family, chamber sermons, sermons read over there, and chamber sacraments administered in necessity there, are blessed assistants and supplements ; they are as the alms at the gate, but the feast is within ; they are as a cock of water without, but the cistern is within ; he that has a handful of devotion at home, shall have his devotion multiplied to a gomer here, for when he is become a part of the congregation he is joint tenant with them, and the devotion of all the congregation, and the blessings upon all the congregation, are his blessings and his devotions.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

(5077.) Though the most remarkable progress of the believer may be upon his knees in secret intercourse betwixt God and him, yet public ordinances are the means of these private intercourses ; though the secret may be more comfortable and refreshing, yet the public ordinances lay the foundation of that secret comfort and refreshment. It is in this as it is with the public well of a city, from whence people go and fetch water to their private houses ; for ordinary, there is not so much use made of the water at the public well itself, till once they bring it home in their vessel to the private house or family, and there it is more freely made use of. Public ordinances are the wells ; but, for ordinary, the children of God are not so much refreshed with the water thereof till once they get home to some secret corner with it, and there they get a more hearty refreshing drink of the water of life than they got at the public well ; but still it was from thence it was fetched ; and so the foundation of these private and refreshing meals is ordinarily laid in the public ordinances. It is true, some that go to fetch home water from the well may, according to their need, get a hearty drink of water even at the side of the well, before they bring any water home ; and so the Lord's people may, and sometimes do, get a very heartsome and refreshing draught of living water, even at the well-side of public ordinances, while they are hearing the Word, or receiving the Sacrament of the Supper.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(3.) It quickens the devotional feelings.

(5078.) Though men might have worshipped God in secret, yet the appointment of a certain day, to be entirely devoted to His service, had a tendency to spiritualise their minds, and to make every one in some respects useful in furthering the welfare of the whole community. Sympathy is a powerful principle in the human breast ; and the sight of others devoutly occupied in holy exercises is calculated to quicken the drowsy soul. The very circumstances of multitudes meeting together with raised expectations and heavenly affections, must operate like an assemblage of burning coals, all of which are instrumental to the kindling of others, while they receive in themselves fresh ardour from the contact.

—Simson, 1758-1836.

(4.) It develops and ennobles the intellectual and moral powers.

(5079.) The mind is essentially the same in the peasant and in the prince ; the forces of it naturally in the untaught man and in the philosopher ; only the one of these is busied in the meaner affairs and within narrower bounds, the other exercises himself in things of weight and moment ; and this it is that puts the wide difference between them. Noble objects are to the mind what the sunbeams are to a bud or flower ; they open and unfold, as it were, the leaves of it, and put it upon exerting and spreading itself every way, and call forth all those powers that lie hid and locked up in it. The praise and admiration of God, therefore, brings this advantage along with it, that it sets our faculties upon their full stretch, and improves them to all the degrees of perfection of which they are capable.

—Allerbury, 1663-1732.

(5.) It affords opportunity for intercessory prayer.

(5080.) It is not merely the natural influence of public worship on those who offer it of which we ought to think. We believe that in the mystery of the relations which God has established between Himself and us, He has given us the power to widen and deepen the channels of His own bounty, and that this power is greatest when we pray together. When we ask Him to remember and comfort the sick who are not with us, we mean what we say, and we believe that in many a darkened and silent chamber, bright and peaceful thoughts make pain and weakness and the monotony of weary days and months of suffering more tolerable in answer to our prayers. Do you say, God is merciful and kind enough to console the sorrowful without being asked to do it, that He will not make their relief dependent on our sympathy and prayers? I reply that it is very plain that deep and strong as is the love of God for mankind, He has made the relief of human suffering dependent on human sympathy. He could, no doubt, send an angel to the sick ; but if you neglect to go, no angel is sent. The feverish lips of the poor woman you visit would not be moistened by grateful fruit if you did not take the grapes ; and some of you could tell how little children would have gone hungry to bed, notwithstanding God's love for them, if you had not bought them a supper. If God has made men so dependent on the acts to which our sympathy prompts us, I do not see that we ought to be surprised that He has made them dependent on our prayers too.

Far beyond the limits of these walls travel the results of the prayers you habitually offer here. Men who do not pray themselves are blessed, and men that pray are blessed more richly in answer to your intercessions.

—R. W. Dale.

(6.) It lays the foundation for heavenly friendships.

(5081.) Our union with each other is only less important than our union with God. We may not perfectly understand why this is so, but it must be so. By the structure of our nature, by the constitution of the world, it is perfectly plain that God wants men to be one. In public worship this design of God is recognised and honoured ; and Sunday by Sunday strong and imperishable links are being created which will bind us together through eternity.

You may say that you come and go without forming any friendships ; that the people in the next pew remain strangers to you ; that you pass each other in the street without mutual recognition ; that you know nothing of their life, and they know nothing of yours ; and that the idea of communion between those who worship together is a theory and nothing more. I may frankly acknowledge that the idea is not so fully realised, here and now, as it should be ; but I am not at all disposed to acknowledge that it is therefore only a theory. Your life is being interwoven with their life, and theirs with yours, more closely than you think. You will know it some day if you do not know it now.

Take two schoolfellows, that sat on the same form, were flogged with the same cane, and went through, in the same class, the drudgery of mastering the rule of three, and getting by heart the Greek irregular verbs ; they were not great friends as boys, perhaps,—but after years of separation they meet in New Zealand, or far away on the banks of the Mississippi ; do they not find that their school-days had brought them nearer together than they had ever supposed? If there is any kind of moral sympathy between them, any capacity for friendship, do they not become fast friends, and feel that they are infinitely more to each other than if they met for the first time? There are ties binding them together which they never thought of at the time those ties were being formed ; the mere accident of having been at the same school makes their friendship incalculably heartier and more pleasant.

When the external temporary distinctions which now separate from each other those who worship together have for ever vanished, it will be found that they, too, have been brought nearer to each other than they had imagined. They had not dined together, or lent each other money, or talked to each other about the weather,—which things seem to form, in some people's judgment, the very essence of Christian communion.—Let together they had confessed sin ; together they had received the Divine pardon ; together they had been baptised with the Holy Ghost ; in singing the same hymns, at the same time, they had known something on earth of the blessedness of heavenly worship ; the same words, from the same preacher, had originated or strengthened their devout and strenuous endeavours to do the will of God ; their whole moral and religious life had been shaped and coloured by the same influences ; and they will discover that a more intimate fellowship and a closer sympathy are possible to them before the very throne of God, as the result of the thanksgivings and adoration which they used to offer on earth where "prayer was wont to be made."

—R. W. Dale.

3. How often ought we to attend public worship?

(5082.) In these Christian days God has prescribed no rule as to the frequency with which we should worship Him, or the exact forms in which the worship of the Spirit should be expressed. He has left everything to our conscience, our judgment, and our love. In every place, at all times, alone and with others, at home and in the church of Christ, we may bow before His Majesty and be sure that He will listen to us. We are driven to Him by "the windy storm and tempest : " we cry to Him in the anguish of our penitence, or of our trouble, or of our fear ; with vehement entreaty we beseech Him to avert the calamities which threaten us ; and when our hearts are "smitten and withered like grass," we lie at His feet and implore Him to pity and to comfort us. But surely this is not enough. Are we not covered with shame that we should so easily forget to adore Him when we might come to Him without tears, and rejoice in His presence as His angels do, and speak to Him with exulting delight about His infinite goodness and bounty; and that only by sorrow and chastisement are we drawn into most intimate communion with Him? Is our Father's house so unwelcome and dreary a place that there can be any cause for keeping outside as long as the winds are gentle and the skies bright, and only going in when the rain comes and the clouds of night hang heavily in the heavens? Thank God, He does not refuse to let us in when we come to Him as our refuge in time of trouble, but it would surely be a better thing that He should be our "dwelling-place," the home of our hearts when our joy is perfect, and not merely the asylum of our wretchedness.

—R. W. Dale.

4. Preparation should be made for it.

(5083.) The Christian is like some heavy birds, as the bustard and others, that cannot get upon the wing without a run of a furlong or two, or a great bell that takes some time to the raising of it. Now, meditation is the great instrument thou art to use in this preparatory work, allow thyself some considerable portion of time before the day of extraordinary prayer for thy retirement, wherein thou mayest converse most privately with thy own heart. This cannot be done in a crowd, neither must it be left to the time of engaging in the extraordinary duty; we cannot do both duties together; the husbandman cannot whet his scythe and cut the grass at once. Betake thyself, therefore, to thy closet, and, in the first place, call thy thoughts off the world, and, as much as is possible, clear thy soul of all that is foreign to the work thou art about; this is as the wiping of the table book before we can write anything well on it. Now the more effectually to gather in thy heart to a holy seriousness, and compact thy thoughts together, it were expedient for thee at first to lay before thee the grand importance of the approaching service. Thou art going to stand before the great God, and that very near in an extraordinary duty, wherein thou wilt either satisfy or profane His reverend name in a high degree, and accordingly art to expect His love or wrath in some choice blessing or dreadful curse, to be the issue and result of thy undertaking; gird the loins of thy mind with some such awful apprehensions as these. As natural fear makes the spirits retire from the outward parts of the body to the heart, so this holy fear of miscarrying in so solemn a duty would be a means to call thy thoughts from all exterior carnal objects, and fix them upon the duty in hand. "In Thy fear will I worship." Such will the print on the wax be, as the sculpture is on the seal; if the fear of God be deeply engraven on thy heart, there is no doubt but it will make a suitable impression on the duty thou performest.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5084.) Our worship is spiritual when the door of the heart is shut against all intruders, as our Saviour commands in closet-duties. It was not His meaning to command the shutting the closet-door, and leave the heart-door open for every thought that would be apt to haunt us. Worldly affections are to be laid aside if we would have our worship spiritual; this was meant by the Jewish custom of wiping or washing off the dust of their feet before their entrance into the Temple, and of not bringing money in their girdles. To be spiritual in worship, is to have our souls gathered and bound up wholly in themselves, and offered to God.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(5085.) Sequester yourselves from all earthly employments, and set apart some time for solemn preparation to meet God in duty. You cannot come hot, reeking out of the world into God's presence, but you will find the influence of it in your duties. It is with the heart a few minutes since plunged in the world, now at the feet of God, just as with the sea after a storm, which still continues working muddy and disquiet; though the wind be laid and storm over, thy heart must have some time to settle. There are few musicians that can take down a lute or viol, and play presently upon it, without some time to tune it. When thou goest to God in any duty, take thy heart aside, and say, "O my soul, I am now addressing myself to the greatest work that ever a creature was employed about. I am going into the awful presence of God, about business of everlasting moment."

—Salter.

5. While we are engaged in it, our thoughts must be kept under control.

(5086.) A remembrance of God's omnipresence will quell distractions in worship. The actual thoughts of this would establish our thoughts, pull them back when they begin to rove, and blow off all the froth that lies on the top of our spirits. An eye taken up with the presence of one object is not at leisure to be filled with another; he that looks intently upon the sun shall have nothing for a while but the sun in his eye. Oppose to every intruding thought the idea of the Divine omnipresence, and put it to silence by the awe of His majesty. When the master is present scholars mind their books, keep their places, and run not over the forms to play with one another; and the master's eye keeps an idle servant to his work, that otherwise would be gazing at every straw, and prating to every passer. How soon would the remembrance of this dash all extravagant fancies out of countenance, just as the news of the approach of a prince would make the courtiers bustle up themselves, huddle up their vain sports, and prepare themselves for a reverent behaviour in his sight. We should not dare to give God a piece of our heart, when we apprehend Him present with the whole; we should not dare to mock one that we knew was more inwards with us than we are with ourselves, and that beheld every motion of our mind as well as action of our body.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(5087.) Seeing it is much in the capacity and frame of thy heart, how much thou shalt enjoy of God in this contemplation, be sure that all the room thou hast be empty; and, if ever, seek Him here with all thy soul: thrust not Christ into the stable and the manger, as if thou hadst better guests for the chiefest rooms. Say to all thy worldly business and thoughts, as Christ to His disciples, "Sit you here, while I go and pray yonder" (Matt. xxvi. 36). Or as Abraham, when he went to sacrifice Isaac, left his servant and ass below the mount, saying, "Stay you here, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you;" so say thou to all thy worldly thoughts, "Abide you below, while I go up to Christ, and then I will return to you again." Yes, as God did terrify the people with His threats of death, if any one should dare to come to the mount, when Moses was to receive the law from God; so do thou terrify thy own heart, and use violence against thy intruding thoughts, if they offer to accompany thee to the mount of contemplation. Even as the priests thrust Uzziah the king out of the Temple, where he presumed to burn incense, when they saw the leprosy to arise upon him; so do thou thrust these thoughts from the temple of thy heart, which have the badge of God's prohibition upon them. As you will beat back your dogs, yea, and leave your servants behind you, when you yourselves are admitted into the prince's presence, so also do by these. Yourselves may be welcome, but such followers may not.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

6. Common sins in public worship.

(5088.) In public worship all should join. The little strings go to make up a concert, as well as the great.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(5089.) That man coolly insults God who needlessly composes himself to slumber, when professing to be a suppliant for mercy at His feet.

Similar is the presumption of neglecting to participate in divine worship when present in God's house. Negative sins are sometimes most intensely sinful. Heedless sins are sometimes most fearfully fatal.

If you were one of a delegation to the Court of St. James's for the presentation of a petition, and were admitted to audience with the Queen, should you think it becoming to the dignity of the royal presence to neglect the business in hand, and to wander about the apartment curiously, while your chairman was presenting the petition in your name? Yet that which would be only a breach of etiquette there, is a much graver offence in the house of God. A listless and wandering mind—roving like fool's eyes—in the temple of worship, is a most insolent indignity to the King of kings.

—Phelps.

(5090.) There are practices tolerated in religious congregations which Christians who are jealous for the honour of their Master's house should utterly condemn. Decorum is the handmaid of devotional feeling, and for this reason the house of God should never be disturbed by the slightest approach to irreverence.

"It is a part of my religion," said a pious old lady, when asked why she went early to church; "it is a part of my religion not to interrupt the religion of others." And we believe if many a country congregation made it a part of their religion not to twist their necks almost out of joint to witness the entrance of every person who passes up the aisle during service, it would be better both for their necks and their religion.

A gross abuse of religious decorum sometimes needs harsh medicine as a remedy. We give that adopted by Henry Clay Dean, who was at one time Chaplain of Congress. The anecdote is from the "Pacific Methodist":—

"Being worried one afternoon by this turning practice in his congregation, Mr. Dean stopped in his sermon and said:

"Now, you listen to me, and I'll tell you who the people are as each one of them comes in."

"He then went on with his discourse, until a gentleman entered, when he bawled out, like an usher, 'Deacon A—, who keeps the shop over the way,' and then went on with his sermon. Presently another man passed up the aisle, and his name, residence, and occupation were given; so he continued for some time. At length some one entered the door who was unknown to Mr. Dean, when he cried out, 'A little old man, with drab coat and an old white hat; don't know him—look for yourselves.' That congregation was cured."

(5091.) When the time for commencing public worship has been fixed by the united action or general assent of a Christian congregation, every member of that congregation is obligated to conform to that arrangement; and whoever, through indolence or indifference, is behind time, sins against God, his fellow-worshippers, and his own good. A tardy courtier offends his prince—how much more a tardy worshipper his God. To be behind time at a business appointment, is to infringe upon the time and rights of others, and never more so than when that business is worshipping God.

7. By what rule the material accompaniments of worship are to be judged.

(5092.) Excess of material circumstance in spiritual worship, whether of architectural adornment, ritual ceremony, musical elaboration, or even intellectual fastidiousness, is as injurious to it as is over-cumbersome machinery in manufacture, excess of ceremonial in social life, superfluous raiment to personal activity, or gaudy ornamentation to personal grace. It is both injurious to life and offensive to taste. But equally so, on the other hand, is penuriousness and nakedness. If we may not overlay spiritual life, neither may we denude it. The true law of life is that its energies be developed in all the force and with all the beauty of which they are capable, and that it worship with such cultured adornment as in the highest degree may appeal to and express its own spiritual emotions. This is the simple law and the sufficient test of all artistic appliances. Is any particular cultus conducive to the worshipping heart of the congregation? If not, and still more if it be injurious to it, then no matter how beautiful in itself it may be—how conducive to the profit and joy of other congregations—however sanctioned by history and contemporary use—let it be rejected, and, if needful, let it be dealt with as the serpent of brass, which Haze-kiah destroyed and pronounced to be "Nehushtan."

—Allen.

8. Necessity of a suitable building.

(5093.) The church ought to be of a comely structure, proportionably magnificent to the number of the people that are to have recourse to it in the common exercise of their devotions. For though men of equal condition may make bold with themselves and meet in what place they please, yet it would be thought a piece of gross unmannerliness to expect a prince to give an inferior peasant the meeting in a barn or cow stable. Would it not, then, look like a piece of irreligious rudeness, which is truly a kind of profaneness, to expect that Almighty God, and His Son, Jesus Christ, should give us the meeting in squalid or sordid places, even then when we pretend most to show our reverence and devotion to Him? For though we may make bold one with another to meet where we please; yet we making our approaches to God in those places, and He therefore making His special approaches to us (for in a philosophical sense He is everywhere alike), questionless it cannot but be an expression of our reverence unto Him to have the structure of the place proportionably capacious, well and fairly built, and as properly significant of our religion and devotional homages we owe to our crucified Saviour, as can be without suspicion of idolatry or any scandalous superstition. For it is true from the very light of nature, which the knowledge of Christ does not extinguish, but direct and perfect, that houses of public worship ought to have some stateliness and splendour in them expressive of the reverence we bear to the Godhead we adore.

—Henry More, 1614-1687.

(5094.) But must there not be an "order" of architecture appropriate to Christian churches? Should not the very structure of our buildings for worship indicate their sacred purpose; I reply, that, of course, every building should correspond to the object for which it is erected. If I build a cotton-mill there must be an engine-house, and long rooms for the machinery. If I build a retail shop there must be a window to display the goods, and there must be convenience for storing them, and there must be easy access for the customers, and arrangements to prevent those that come in to buy from interfering with those employed to sell. In a court of justice, there must be a bench for the judge, and a bar for the criminals, and a box for the witnesses, and accommodation for the barristers, and a place for the general public.

If I build a church, it is right that I should build it with a due regard to the use to which it is devoted. I may be led to the choice of a certain order of architecture, because in this country that order indicates that it is a building for religious worship; but in all the arrangements of the interior I ought to be guided by the fact, that it is meant to be a place of assembly in which a Christian congregation shall receive instruction and unite in worship. Whatever promotes these purposes, ministers to the object for which it is built, and nothing must be permitted to interfere with that object.

—R. W. Dale.

INDEX OF ARRANGEMENT.

INTRODUCTORY READINGS.

- I. ON THE IMPORTANCE OF ILLUSTRATION IN TEACHING, 1-4.
- II. OUR LORD'S METHOD OF TEACHING, 5.
- III. THE FIGURES OF THE BIBLE, 6.
- IV. THE DELIGHT OF THE HUMAN MIND IN METAPHOR, 7.
- V. HOMELY ILLUSTRATIONS ARE NOT TO BE SHRUNK FROM NOR DESPISED, 8-20.
- VI. WHENCE THEY ARE TO BE OBTAINED, 11.
- VII. MISTAKES AGAINST WHICH WE NEED TO BE ON OUR GUARD, 12-15.

THE GREATER TOPICS IN THEOLOGY AND MORALS.

ADVERSITY.

1. Should be expected by all men, 16, 17, 236.
2. Is not necessarily an evil, 18.
3. It is a means of self-knowledge, 19.
4. It shows other men what we are, 20.
5. It is essential to the development and perfecting of nobility of character, 21, 22.
6. It enables us to discover our real friends, 23, 24.
7. Moreover, it is a test of our religious experiences, 25.
8. On all these accounts, and on others, it is spiritually less perilous than prosperity, 26, 27.
9. Things to be avoided in adversity:—
(a) Selfishness, 28.
(b) Despair, 29.
10. Our supreme duty in adversity: trust in God, 30.

AFFECTIONS. THE

1. They are irrepressible in their activity, 31, 2706-2708.
2. Religion calls us, not to destroy, but to control them, 32.
3. There is constant need for watchfulness in regard to them, 33, 2699.
4. A comprehensive rule for their exercise, 34.
5. The folly and the baseness of setting them on earthly things, 35-38, 5041-5065.
6. They find rest only in God, 39, 2378-2387.
7. It should be the chief endeavour of preachers to win the affections for God, 40.
8. How they are to be won, 41.
9. How they are to be controlled, 43-45.
10. Their free exercise is necessary to give beauty to the religious life, 46.

AFFLICTION.

- I. OUR PRESENT PORTION, 47-51, 3661, 3674.
- II. ITS GRIEVOUSNESS, 52-55.

III. ITS DESIGN:—

1. To produce repentance and lead to amendment of life, 56-59.
 2. To prevent us from going astray, 60-65.
 3. To recall us to duty and true happiness, 66-70.
 4. To restore us to spiritual health, 71-74.
 5. To test our character and Christian profession, 75-82, 4452.
 6. To measure the progress we have made in the Divine Life, 83, 84.
 7. To purify the people of God, 85-90, 2842.
 8. To develop and display the graces of God's people, 91-98.
 9. To prepare our hearts for the reception of Divine truth, 99, 100.
 10. To prepare us for greater usefulness and fruitfulness, 101-108, 2464, 2465.
 11. To wean us from the world, 110, 111.
 12. To prepare us for eternal glory, 112-115.
- ### IV. WHY IT IS "GOOD" FOR THE LORD'S PEOPLE TO BE AFFLICTED:—
1. Because it cleanses them from sin, 116.
 2. Because in it God reveals Himself most fully to them, 117-121.
 3. It strengthens their faith in God, 122-124.
 4. Because it makes them fruitful, 125, 126.
 5. Because it brings out their graces and excellences into view, to the glory of God, 127.
 6. Because it establishes them in grace, 128.
 7. Because it makes them grow in grace, 129, 130.
 8. Because it keeps them humble, 131, 132.
 9. Because it teaches them true wisdom, 133, 134.
 10. Because it teaches them to sympathise with the suffering, 135, 136.
 11. Because it endears the promises to them, 137, 138.

12. Because it teaches them to prize their mercies, 139.
13. Because it makes them long for heaven, 140, 141.
14. Because it will sweeten heaven to them, 142.

V. DUTIES OF THE AFFLICTED.—

1. Recognition of the hand of God, 143.
2. Self-examination, 144.
3. Penitence and Humility, 145-147.
4. Patience, 148-154, 1698-1710, 3670-3706, 3709, 3713.
5. Faith in the Divine goodness, 155, 156, 3685-3691, 4051, 4055, 4056, 4764, 4765.
6. Resignation and self-committal to God, 157, 158.
7. Courage, 159-161.
8. Gratitude, 162-165, 3692-3695.
9. It is the duty of the afflicted to look at life as a whole, 166-168.
10. To seek deliverance by the use of all appointed means, 169, 170.
11. But they are not to seek comfort in worldly things, 171.
12. Nor unduly to depend on human aid, 172.
13. Nor to seek relief by sinful methods, 173-175.
14. But to look up to God, 176.
15. And to seek relief and strength in prayer, 177, 178.

VI. CONSOLATIONS FOR THE AFFLICTED :—

1. Affliction is apportioned and limited by God, 179-188, 3674-3695.
2. Afflictions do not necessarily prove that God is angry with us, 189.
3. On the contrary, they may be an evidence of our acceptance with God, 190-196, 3692-3695.
4. Afflictions assure us that we are in the heavenward way, 197.
5. God is present with His people in their afflictions, 198, 3677.
6. God sympathises with His people in all their sorrows, 199, 2311, 2322.
7. God succours and sustains His people according to their need, 200-203.
8. Afflictions minister to our true wellbeing, 204-212, 3678-3684, 3696-3704.
9. Afflictions do not debar us from usefulness, 213.
10. Afflictions prepare us for greater happiness and honour, 214, 2464, 2465, 3692-3695.
11. Afflictions are among the means which God uses to make us "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light," 215, 3906, 3702.
12. Our afflictions are transitory, 216.
13. They are light as well as transitory, 217, 218, 3705, 3706.
14. Our present sorrows are not to be compared with the glory which is to be revealed in us, 219.
15. Our present sorrows will give seat to our future joys, 220.
16. Afflictions bring us even now into closer communion with God, 221.

VII. OUR AFFLICTIONS ARE INTERMITTENT, 222.

VIII. IT IS NOT IN ITSELF SANCTIFYING, 223-228.

IX. ITS DIVERSE EFFECTS, 229-232.

X. SHOULD BE ANTICIPATED AND PREPARED FOR, 234-236.

AMBITION.

1. Is in itself a beneficial impulse, 237.
2. Yet the craving for prominence is often the mark of a poor nature, 238.
3. It is usually unwise, 239, 240, 3264, 4364.
4. It blinds the understanding, 241.
5. It is insatiable, 242.
6. It causes men to set aside all moral restraints, 243.
7. It exposes us to bitter disappointment, 244, 245, 2386.
8. The penalties of successful ambition more than outweigh its pleasures, 246-248.
9. Its triumphs are soon ended, 249.
10. It must be checked in its commencement, 250.
11. There is a Christian ambition by which we should all be inspired, 251.

ANGELS. THE

1. Reasonableness of belief in their existence, 252.
2. How little we know of them, 253.
3. Their appearance to the shepherds, 254.
4. Inseparable from our conceptions of Christ, 255.
5. How they set us an example, 256.
6. Their interest in man, 257.
7. Their care for God's children, 258.
8. Their joy in the conversion of sinners, 259, 260.

ANGER.

1. Defined, 261.
2. Differs from hatred, 262-264.
3. A compound of pride and folly, 265, 143.
4. Different kinds of anger, 266.
5. Impulses to anger must be carefully repressed, 267-271.
6. Must be moderately expressed, 272.
7. Is not to be too long retained, 273, 274, 2696.
8. Its unrighteousness, 275.
9. Its folly, 276, 277, 4326.
10. The folly of meeting anger with anger, 278, 279.
11. Silence is the best reply to offensive sayings, 280.
12. It often works irreparable mischief, 281, 282.
13. Irritableness is a characteristic of weak and base natures, 283-285.
14. How the tendency to it is to be overcome, 286.

APOSTLES. THE

1. Were trained for their task, 287.
2. Their natural unfitness for the task assigned them, 288.
3. The wonderfulness of their success, 289, 290.
4. Their success is a proof that they wrought miracles, 291.
5. Their boldness, 292.
6. Their influence compared with that of the ancient philosophers, 293.

ARGUMENTS.

1. Their value, 294.
2. How they are to be estimated, 295.
3. Are not to be accumulated on one side of a question only, 296.
4. Should not be used too profusely, 297.
5. Value of probable arguments, 298.
6. Lawfulness of argument ad hominem, 299.
7. Should be conducted calmly, 300.

8. Folly of abuse in argument, 301, 302.
9. The best mode of refuting sophistical arguments, 303.

ASSURANCE.

- I. DESIRABLE, 304, 305.
- II. ESSENTIAL :—
 1. To the comfort and joy of the believer, 306, 307.
 2. To his spiritual vigour, 308.
- III. IS ATTAINABLE, 309, 310.
- IV. YET EVEN BY GENUINE BELIEVERS IS NOT ALWAYS ATTAINED, 311-314.
- V. EFFORTS SHOULD BE MADE TO ATTAIN IT, 315, 316.
- VI. COUNSELS TO THOSE WHO ARE SEEKING TO ATTAIN IT :—
 1. Avoid everything that would tend to cause you to return an untrue verdict, 317-319.
 2. Remember that it is reasonable only in the regenerate, 320.
 3. Remember that it is attained gradually, 321.
 4. Remember that it is frequently not attained till late in life, 322.
 5. Remember that some men, eminent for holiness and usefulness, have had painful doubts as to their acceptance with God, 323, 1649, 1651, 1653.
- VII. HOW IT IS TO BE ATTAINED :—
 1. By the exercise of faith in God's promises to pardon the penitent, 324, 1795, 1798-1802, 2926.
 2. By keeping grace in action, 325, 4460, 4461.
 3. By conference with experienced Christians, 326, 1650. [See also SELF-EXAMINATION, 4423-4475.]
- VIII. REASONS FOR CHERISHING IT :—
 1. Holiness in the life, 327, 328.
 2. A sense of the bludensomeness of sin, 329.
 3. Every evidence of spiritual life, however small, 330-334, 1798-1802, 1989, 2456, 2470, 2471, 2947.
- IX. HINDRANCES TO ITS ATTAINMENT :—
 1. The weakness of our spiritual graces, 335.
 2. Worldly lusts, 336.
 3. Distracting thoughts, 337.
 4. Forgetfulness of the true object of faith, 338.
 5. A melancholy temperament, 339, 1654.
- X. EVEN WHEN IT IS ATTAINED, IT IS INTERMITTENT, AND NOT ALWAYS CLEAR AND JOYFUL, 340-346, 2906, 2907.
- XI. WHEN ONCE VOUCHSAFED, IT IS NOT TO BE LIGHTLY SURRENDERED, 347, 348.
- XII. HOW IT MAY BE STRENGTHENED, 349, 350.
- XIII. IT IS NOT TO BE ABUSED, 351.
- XIV. FOR WHAT END IT IS BESTOWED, 352.

ATHEISM.

- I. ITS ABSURDITY EVINCED :—
 1. By the existence of the universe, 353-359.
 2. By the constitution of the human body, 360.
 3. By the character of God's works, 361, 1491-1494.
 4. By the preservation and government of the universe, 362-365, 3173-3176, 3178-3182.
- II. THE FOLLY OF ITS APPEAL TO THE SENSES, 366.
- III. THE VASTNESS OF ITS ASSUMPTIONS, 367.
- IV. ITS POWERLESSNESS, 368.

- V. IS USUALLY IMMORAL IN ITS ORIGIN, 369.
- VI. DEGRADES MAN, 370.
- VII. IS MORALLY AND SOCIALLY DANGEROUS, 371.
- VIII. IS A TRANSIENT EXPERIENCE IN AN HONEST MIND, 372.
- IX. IS RENOUNCED BY ATHEISTS OF ALL KINDS IN THE TIME OF AFFLICTION, 373.

ATONEMENT.

- I. DEFINED, 374.
 - II. NECESSITY OF A MEDIATOR, 375, 376, 4225-4228.
 - III. ITS SUFFICIENCY, 377-381.
 - IV. FROM WHAT IT HAS REDEEMED US, 382.
 - V. A CAUTION CONCERNING A FAMILIAR COMPARISON, 383.
 - VI. WAS MADE FOR ALL MEN, 384-386.
 - VII. THE SPIRIT IN WHICH THE DECLARATIONS OF SCRIPTURE CONCERNING IT ARE TO BE STUDIED, 387-389.
 - VIII. NOT THE CAUSE, BUT THE MANIFESTATION, OF GOD'S LOVE FOR SINNERS, 390.
 - IX. ITS RELATION TO THE UNIVERSE, 391.
 - X. REASONABLENESS OF CHRIST'S SUFFERINGS FOR HIS PEOPLE, 392.
 - XI. VICARIOUS SUFFERING THE LAW OF THE UNIVERSE, 393-395.
 - XII. OBJECTIONS ANSWERED :—
 1. Salvation by the suffering of another is not inconsistent with the Divine justice, 396.
 2. The Redemption of the human race is not a task unworthy of the Divine greatness, 397.
 3. This world is not too small a sphere for such a wonderful display of the Divine love, 398.
 - XIII. NO DIFFICULTIES IN OUR UNDERSTANDING THE METHOD OF THE ATONEMENT SHOULD HINDER US FROM GRATEFULLY ACCEPTING IT, 399.
- AVARICE. [See PROSPERITY, RICHES, THE WORLD.]
1. Defined, 400.
 2. Is a result of atheism, 401.
 3. Its insidiousness, 402.
 4. Degrades the character, 403.
 5. Leads to dishonesty and falsehood, 404.
 6. The imagination of the covetous, 405.
 7. Is insatiable, 406-412, 4971.
 8. Is especially the sin of old age, 413, 4593.
 9. Sometimes overreaches itself, 414.
 10. Its folly, 415, 416, 4397, 4400, 4958, 5008-5011.
 11. Its misery, 417, 418.
 12. Its odiousness, 419, 420.
 13. Inconsistent with the hope of salvation, 421.
 14. Excludes from heaven, 422.

BACKSLIDERS.

1. Should be regarded with compassion, 423.
2. God's compassion for them, 424.
3. Their duty, 425.
4. What reclaimed backsliders are to do with their "old hope," 426.

BACKSLIDING.

1. Its perilousness, 427.
2. Is gradual in its progress, 428, 4515, 4735.
3. Is most frequently due to indulgence in little sins, 429, 4515-4525, 4742-4745.

BEAUTY.

I. NATURAL BEAUTY :—

1. A revelation of God, 430, 431.
2. The love of beauty, 432.
3. Its moral uses, 433.

II. PERSONAL BEAUTY :—

1. Overrated, 434.
2. Not in itself a matter for pride, 435.
3. Mere physical beauty is morally worthless, 436.
4. Transitory, 437.

BELIEF.

1. On what ground is it to rest, 438.
2. By what it is determined, 439.
3. We are responsible for our belief, 440.
4. Importance of a correct belief, 441, 442.
5. As a matter of fact, our destiny depends on the correctness of our belief, 443.

BENEFICENCE.

1. Our duty, 444, 445.
2. God's rules for its exercise, 446.
3. Its distastefulness to the insincere, 447, 448.
4. Its wisdom, 449, 450.
5. Its rewards, 451-453, 1736-1746.
6. Beneficence toward man is true gratitude to God, 454, 455.
7. It should be wisely directed, 456, 457.
8. Should be prompt, 458.
9. Should not be ashamed or afraid to stoop, 459.
10. Should be unostentatious, 460, 461.
11. True beneficence is unconscious of its rarity and worth, 462.
12. Is not to be restrained by ingratitude, 463.
13. The shame and guilt of abusing it, 464.

BENEVOLENCE.

1. Is a characteristic of every true Christian, 465.
2. Must show itself in actions, 466.
3. Posthumous benevolence, 467.

BEREAVEMENT.

- I. IS A COMMON EXPERIENCE, 468.
- II. REVEALS THE POVERTY OF OUR FAITH, 469.
- III. ITS DESIGN, 470, 471, 2739.
- IV. HOW IT SHOULD BE BORNE :—

 1. We should not sorrow as those who have no hope, 472.
 2. With thankfulness for the friends who have been taken before us, 473.
 3. With thankfulness for the friends who are spared to us, 474.

- V. CONSOLATIONS FOR THE BEREAVED, 475-477.

BIBLE. THE

- I. THE NECESSITY OF A REVELATION IS OBVIOUS :—

 1. From the ignorance of man concerning himself, 478.
 2. From the failure of all the philosophers to construct a complete and coherent religion, 479.

- II. IN THE BIBLE WE HAVE A REVELATION FROM GOD.

 1. Nature of the evidence by which its inspiration is proved, 480.

2. The nature of its inspiration, 481, 482.
3. Proofs that it is Divinely inspired :—

 - (1.) The marks it bears of a Divine origin, 483-486.
 - (2.) The confidence of believers that it is from God, 487.
 - (3.) Its distinctiveness from all other books, 488-492, 3062.
 - (4.) Its adaptation to human need, 493, 494, 2425-2427.
 - (5.) The exhaustlessness of its interest, 495-499.
 - (6.) The permanence of its value, 500, 501.
 - (7.) Its unity, 502-504.
 - (8.) Its scientific incorrectness, 505.
 - (9.) Its influence on character and conduct, 506-509.

4. The doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible is not invalidated by the state of the sacred text, 510, 511.
5. The doctrine of the Divine inspiration of the Scriptures is not essential to the authority of Christianity, 512.
6. Yet its inspiration gives authority to its utterances, 513.
7. Although the Bible is Divinely inspired, its revelation is necessarily imperfect, 514.
8. An objection answered, 515.

III. ITS GENUINENESS, 516, 517.

IV. ITS AUTHENTICITY, 518-521.

V. AUTHORSHIP OF ITS BOOKS, 522, 523.

VI. VALUELESSNESS OF THE "HIGH CRITICISM" BY WHICH THE GENUINENESS AND AUTHENTICITY OF VARIOUS BOOKS OF SCRIPTURE ARE SOUGHT TO BE DISPROVED, 524.

VII. TRANSLATIONS :—

1. The Bible admits of translation, 525.
2. Their value and use, 526, 527.
3. Are valuable in spite of their inaccuracies and variations, 528.
4. Excellence of our English version, 529-532.

VIII. THE BIBLE AND OTHER AUTHORITIES :—

1. The Church, 533, 534, 1188.
2. Conscience, 535, 536.
3. Reason, 537.
4. Modern Science, 538, 539.

IX. ITS FUNCTION AND PURPOSE, 540-542.

X. A PERFECT AND PLAIN RULE OF LIFE, 543.

XI. ITS INTERPRETATION, 544-550.

XII. TO BE READ BY ALL :—

1. Because it is addressed to all, 551.
2. Because its saving truths are comprehensible by all, 552.
3. And notwithstanding that some wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction, 553, 554.

XIII. HOW IT SHOULD BE READ :—

1. Frequently, 555, 556, 3197.
2. Not merely as a duty, but as a necessity, 557.
3. Not for controversial purposes, but for personal profit, 558-560, 4860-4863.
4. As a letter from our Heavenly Father, 561.
5. With a consciousness and constant remembrance of our great need of it, 562, 4860-4863.
6. With reverent docility, 563-567.
7. Comprehensively and continuously, 568, 569, 3197.

8. With prayerful meditation, 570, 571, 3477, 3479, 3481-3484, 3491.
9. With appropriating faith, 570, 4860-4863.
- XIV. IN WHAT SPIRIT IT IS TO BE CONSULTED, 573, 574, 387-389.
- XV. HOW IT IS TO BE TREATED BY US :—
 1. It must be loved for its purity, 575.
 2. It must be diligently studied, 576-580, 4853.
 3. Must be used by us, as well as diffused, 581, 4860-4863.
- XVI. ITS MYSTERIES, OBSCURITIES, AND DIFFICULTIES :—
 1. Are not to be denied, 582.
 2. Do not extend to anything essential for us to know, 583.
 3. To what they are due :—
 - (1.) To our ignorance, 584, 585, 2715, 2716, 4036, 4813, 4814.
 - (2.) To our prejudices, 586, 4813.
 - (3.) To our presumption, 587, 4814.
 - (4.) To our indolence, 588.
 4. Why they are permitted, 589.
 5. How to deal with them, 590, 591, 1797.
 6. Are not to deter us from its study, 592.
 7. Are not to hinder us from exercising faith in Christ, 593-596.
 8. To whom they are unveiled, 597-600.
 9. Disappear under a comprehensive criticism, 601.
- XVII. ITS PROHIBITIONS AND THREATENINGS, 602-606, 3062, 3418.
- XVIII. IS NEITHER INTERESTING TO NOR COMPREHENSIBLE BY ALL MEN, 607-609, 3860.
- XIX. IS PRECIOUS TO THE BELIEVER, 610-616.
- XX. ITS HELP ALWAYS NEEDFUL AND AVAILABLE, 617, 618.
- XXI. FULL OF CHRIST, 619.
- XXII. PROFUNDITY OF ITS MEANING, 620, 621.
- XXIII. OUR NEED OF THE SPIRIT'S HELP IN ITS STUDY, 622, 623, 2868-2870, 2877-2882.
- XXIV. IN WHAT KNOWLEDGE OF IT CONSISTS, 624.
- XXV. HOW FAITH IN IT IS PROVED, 625, 626.
- XXVI. SYMBOLICAL DESCRIPTIONS OF THE BIBLE :—
 1. It is the sword of the Spirit, 627, 628, 2870, 2885.
 2. It is a light to the feet, 629, 630.
 3. It is a garden, 631.
- XXVII. THE ROOT OF CHRISTIAN LITERATURE, 632.
- XXVIII. MUST BE ACCEPTED OR REJECTED AS A WHOLE, 633-635.
- XXIX. ITS PRACTICAL VALUE NOT AFFECTED BY CONTROVERSIES CONCERNING IT, 636.
- XXX. HOW ITS TRUTH IS TO BE TESTED, 637.
- XXXI. FOLLY AND GUILT OF THOSE WHO REJECT IT, 638-641.
- XXXII. SHALL ENDURE FOR EVER, 642-645.
- XXXIII. AND YET ITS MISSION IS TRANSITORY, 646.

BODY. THE

1. Has its rights, 647.
2. The folly of making its adornment our supreme concern, 648, 4641-4645.
3. The amount of care due to it, 649, 650.

BODY AND SOUL. THE

1. Partners in life, 651, 4639, 4641-4648.
2. Their mutual sympathy, 652, 865.
3. The influence of the body on the soul, 653, 4638, 4639.
4. How the body is to be made helpful to the soul, 654, 4640.

BOOKS.

1. The most wonderful of human works, 655.
2. Are living powers, 656.
3. The permanence of their influence, 657.
4. Sure storehouses of truth, 658.
5. Not an unmixed good, 659.
6. Love of, 660-662.
7. Companionship of, 663-666.
8. Choice of, 667-670.
9. The test of a good book, 671, 672.
10. Great books, 673.
11. The most useful, 674.
12. Voluminous, 675.
13. Small, 676.
14. The best, 677.
15. Few are really valuable, 678.
16. Poor and bad: are to be shunned, 679-681.
17. Modern, 682.
18. Are meant to be read, 683, 684.
19. How to read them, 685, 686.

CARELESS. THE

1. Their inattention to the plainest warnings, 687-691.
2. Their folly, 692-696, 1559, 4926, 4927, 4934, 4942.
3. The pitifulness of their condition, 697-699.
4. The perilousness of their position, 700-703.

CHARACTER.

- I. DISPOSITION :—
 1. Difference of character, 704.
 2. To what extent we are responsible for it, 705-708.
 3. How it is formed, 709-711, 1836-1841.
 4. How it is to be judged, 712-718, 1520.
 5. The most powerful of all moral influences, 719, 1734, 1735.
 6. Its transcendent importance, 720.
- II. REPUTATION, 721, 722.

CHARACTER, CHRISTIAN

1. Its preciousness, 723, 724.
2. How it is formed, 725, 726, 2849-2855.
3. Must be positive, 727-730.
4. Should be conspicuous for truth and honour, 731.
5. Should be complete, 732-736, 2545, 2546, 4079.
6. How it is to be judged, 737-742, 317-319, 34800, 1832-1834, 2149, 3566, 3729, 3734, 4318-4320, 4447, 4453, 4454.
7. The final test in this world, 743.
8. The standard of judgment in the world to come, 744.
9. In its first stages is sometimes unlovely, 745-747, 2466, 2479-2482.
10. How it is to be sustained, 748.

CHEERFULNESS.

1. Is not levity, 749.
2. Is better than mirth, 750.
3. Is not a sign of weakness of character, 751.

4. Its helpfulness, 752-754.
5. Promotes health, 755.
6. Is a Christian duty, 756-762, 1083, 3038, 3039.

CHILDHOOD.

1. Its beauty, 763.
2. Its sacredness, 764.
3. Christ's sympathy for childhood, 765.

CHILDREN.

1. Why they are sent to us, 766.
2. Necessary to complete the home, 767.
3. Their preciousness, 768.
4. Are causes of anxiety as well as of joy, 769.
5. Little men and women, 770.
6. Preciousness of their love, 771.
7. Their happiness, 772.
8. Their hopefulness, 773.
9. Their selfishness, 774.
10. Their susceptibility to impressions of every kind, 775, 776.
11. The importance and power of parental example, 777-779.
12. Their claims upon us, 780.
13. Importance of early training, 781-788, 3394.
14. Must first of all be taught to exercise self-restraint, 789.
15. Must be taught line upon line, 790.
16. Their curiosity is not to be repressed, but instructed, 791.
17. Books for them must be carefully chosen, 792.
18. Must be instructed in the Scriptures, 793.
19. Should be trained to attend public worship, 794.
20. Are not incapable of faith, 795, 796, 1919.
21. Their repentance real, 797.
22. Should be taught to look to Jesus, 798, 799.
23. True godliness in children is childlike, 800.
24. A child's faith in prayer, 801.
25. How religion is to be commended to them, 802.
26. Their religious training devolves especially upon their parents, 803-806.
27. Their precocious developments are to be checked, 807.
28. Should be trained to industry, 808, 809.
29. Learn little from the experience of their parents, 810.
30. Their discipline, 811-815.
31. Their correction, 816-821.
32. Should be trusted, 822.
33. Should be encouraged in virtuous actions, 823.
34. Suffer for their parents' sins, 824.
35. A reason for parental solicitude on their behalf, 825.
36. Are not to be apprenticed to ungodly masters, 826.
37. Their influence for good, 827, 828.
38. Their death, 829-833, 468-470, 475.
39. Death of an infidel's child, 834.

CHRIST.

- I. HIS DEITY :—
 1. The doctrine of His Deity pervades the New Testament, 835.
 2. The doctrine of His Deity is essential to our respect for Him, 836.
 3. Proofs of His Deity :—
 - (1.) His unchangeableness, 837.
 - (2.) The statements of the Gospels concerning Him, 838.
 - (3.) His influence on human affairs, 839.
 - (4.) His demands upon the soul, 840, 836.

(5.) His influence upon the soul, 841-843, 3353.

4. Rendered it impossible that He should be holden of death, 844.
5. Entitles Him to our worship, 845.
- II. HIS INCARNATION :—
 1. Its necessity, 846-848.
 2. Its nature, 849.
 3. Veiled, but did not conceal His Divine glory, 850.
 4. Incomprehensible, but not incredible, 851, 852.
 5. The greatest of all marvels, 853.
 6. The most conspicuous display of the Divine goodness, 854.
- III. THE MANIFESTATION OF GOD, 855-857, 3527.
- IV. HIS CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH, 858-863.
- V. HIS BAPTISM, 864.
- VI. HIS FORTY DAYS' FAST, 865.
- VII. HIS TEMPTATION, 866-871, 4726.
- VIII. MADE PERFECT BY SUFFERING, 872, 873.
- IX. HIS LIFE CANNOT BE WRITTEN, 874.
- X. HIS CHARACTERS AND TITLES :—
 1. The Word of God, 875.
 2. The Consolation of Israel, 876.
 3. The Light of the World, 877.
 4. The Sun of Righteousness, 878.
 5. The Door, 879-881.
 6. The Vine, 882.
 7. The Saviour, 883.
 8. The Giver of Peace, 884.
 9. Our Life, 885.
- XI. VARIOUS EMBLEMS OF CHRIST, 886.
- XII. TYPICAL REFERENCES TO CHRIST :—
 1. Jacob's Ladder, 887.
- XIII. HIS OFFICES :—
 1. Our representative, 888.
 2. Our mediator, 889-891, 375, 376.
 3. Our intercessor, 892, 893.
 4. Our example, 894-902, 1062, 1871, 1872, 2499, 2502, 2849-2851, 3289, 4461.
- XIV. HOW HIS CHARACTER IS TO BE STUDIED, 903, 904.
- XV. HOW HIS CLAIMS ARE TO BE TESTED, 905, 906.
- XVI. HIS RELATION TO THE LAW, 907, 908, 3215, 3216.
- XVII. HIS METHOD OF TEACHING, 909-911.
- XVIII. HIS SUFFERINGS AND DEATH. [See ATONEMENT, 374-399.]
 1. Were necessary for our salvation, 912.
 2. His death was a voluntary sacrifice for us, 913.
 3. The benefits of His death are inexhaustible, 914.
 4. The intensity of His sufferings, 915.
 5. His sufferings were foreseen by Him, 916.
 6. How they were endured, 917.
 7. In what sense the Father willed the death of the Son, 918.
 8. In what sense He is said to have been exalted on account of His having undergone death, 919.
 9. Why He died for us, 920.
 10. With what feelings they should inspire us, 921.
- XIX. HIS RESURRECTION, 922-925, 4354.
- XX. HIS ASCENSION, 926.

- XXI. THE SAVIOUR OF ALL MEN, 927.
- XXII. HIS READINESS TO RECEIVE SINNERS, 928, 929.
- XXIII. A WAY OF ACCESS TO HIM THAT IS ALWAYS OPEN, 930.
- XXIV. HIS GRACE :—
1. Our need of it, 931-933.
 2. Its fulness and sufficiency, 934-941.
 3. Its freeness, 942, 943.
 4. Is inexhaustible, 944.
 5. Is always to be trusted in, 945.
- XXV. HIS LOVE :—
1. Why He loves us, 946, 947, 920.
 2. Its wonderful manifestations, 948, 949.
 3. Its emblems, 950.
- XXVI. HIS TENDER MERCY, 951.
- XXVII. HIS SYMPATHY WITH HIS PEOPLE, 952-957.
- XXVIII. HIS COMPASSION FOR THE TEMPTED, 958, 4789-4794.
- XXIX. HIS CARE FOR THE WEAK, 959-961.
- XXX. HIS DISINTERESTEDNESS, 962.
- XXXI. PRECIOUS TO THEM THAT BELIEVE, 963.
- XXXII. THE EVER-FAITHFUL FRIEND, 964.
- XXXIII. HOW WE CAN SERVE HIM, 965.
- XXXIV. HIS EYE OUR STIMULUS, 966.
- XXXV. THE POWER OF HIS REPROOF, 967.
- XXXVI. CHRIST AND THE SOUL :—
1. He is the rest and stay of the soul, 968-971.
 2. How He is appropriated by the soul, 972.
 3. How He dwells in the soul, 973, 2840, 2900, 2902.
 4. How He manifests Himself to the soul, 974, 975.
- XXXVII. THE COMPLETENESS OF HIS LIFE, 976.
- XXXVIII. HIS SUPERIORITY TO ALL OTHER TEACHERS, 977, 978.
- XXXIX. THE ULTIMATE TRIUMPHS OF HIS KINGDOM, 979, 1166-1168, 2541, 4829, 4831.
- XL. HIS SECOND COMING, 980-982, 2936, 3061, 3062.
- XLI. HIS GLORY :—
1. It is now inconceivable by us, 983.
 2. The disclosures of it that await us, 984.
- XLII. HIS DELIVERANCE OF THE KINGDOM TO THE FATHER, 985.
- CHRISTIAN. THE
- I. CAN A MAN KNOW THAT HE IS A CHRISTIAN? 986-989, 310.
 - II. HIS CALLING.
All Christians are called :—
 1. To be saints, 990.
 2. To serve God, 991.
 3. To adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour, 992.
 4. To be fruitful in all good works, 993-995, 2392-2397, 2483.
 5. To make constant progress in holiness, 996, 997.
 6. To be like Christ, 998. - III. THE CHRISTIAN AND CHRIST :—
 1. His union with Christ, 999, 1000, 882.
 2. His life is hid with Christ in God, 1001, 1002.
 3. His love for Christ, 1003, 1004.
 4. His dependence on Christ :—

- (1.) Its comprehensiveness, 1005, 748.
 - (2.) Its continuity, 1006-1009.
 - (3.) Is the ground and source of his safety, 1010-1012.
 - (4.) Takes away all reason for pride, 1013, 1014.
 - (5.) Its absoluteness does not destroy his moral agency, 1015.
 - (6.) Evinces the hopeless condition of the mere moralist, 1016.
 5. In what spirit he approaches Christ, 1017.
- IV. SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF THE CHRISTIAN :—
1. He has his supreme delight in God, 1018.
 2. The glory of God is his constant aim, 1019-1023.
 3. He is fruitful and useful, 1024, 1025, 2392-2397, 2483.
 4. He resembles Christ, 1026-1028.
 5. He has his "conversation in heaven," 1029, 1030.
- V. SOME OF HIS DUTIES :—
1. He should be single in his aim, 1031.
 2. He should be blameless in his life, 1032, 1033.
 3. He should make the Word of God the rule of his life, 1034.
 4. He must be crucified to, and separate from, the world, 1035-1041.
 5. He must make an open profession of religion, 1042, 3907-3976.
 6. He must not fear to be singular, 1043, 1044.
 7. He must not be afraid of ridicule, 1045.
 8. He must not be daunted by the difficulties of the Christian life, 1046.
 9. He should be interested in the diffusion of the Gospel, 1047.
 10. He must reflect the Divine character, 1048.
 11. He must seek to diffuse happiness around him, 1049, 1050.
 12. He must live in a state of continual preparedness for death, 1051, 1052.
- VI. HIS DISCOURAGEMENTS, 1053.
- VII. HIS IMPERFECTIONS, 1054-1056, 2313.
- VIII. HIS CORRUPTIONS, 1057, 1058.
- IX. HIS CONFLICTS, 1059-1062, 2457, 2459, 3398, 3949-3951.
- X. HIS CONSOLATIONS :—
1. He is sure of all needful things, 1063, 1064.
 2. It doth not yet appear what he shall be, 1065.
 3. Where sin abounds, there shall grace much more abound, 1066-1068.
 4. Ultimately he shall be entirely like Christ, 1069-1071.
- XI. HIS RENEWAL IN THE DIVINE IMAGE, 1072.
- XII. HIS DIGNITY AND WEALTH, 1073-1076, 2902.
- XIII. IS THE NOBLEST WORK OF GOD, 1077.
- XIV. IS LORD OF THE WORLD, 1078.
- XV. HIS REAL WORTH IS UNAFFECTED BY ADVERSE CIRCUMSTANCES, 1079.
- XVI. IS OF ALL MEN THE HAPPIEST, 1080-1084, 4161-4163.
- XVII. THE COMFORT OF SINCERITY, 1085, 1086.
- XVIII. HIS KNOWLEDGE OF DIVINE THINGS, 1087.
- XIX. IS CERTAIN TO COMMAND RESPECT, 1088.

- XX. HIS INFLUENCE FOR GOOD, 1089-1095.
- XXI. HIS RELATION TO THE LAW, 1096, 1097, 3160.
- XXII. HIS SAFETY, 1098, 1099, 4056, 4058, 4061.
- XXIII. AN EXILE, 1100, 1101.
- XXIV. A PILGRIM, 1102.
- XXV. HIS ASPIRATIONS, 1103, 1104.
- XXVI. THE PRIZE THAT IS SET BEFORE HIM, 1105.
- XXVII. THE TRIUMPH THAT AWAITS HIM, 1106.
- XXVIII. THE WISDOM OF HIS CHOICE, 1107, 1108.
- XXIX. HIS DEATH, 1109-1111, 1076.
- XXX. HIS FUTURE PERFECTNESS AND GLORY, 1112-1119, 3373, 3416, 3417, 3667, 4335, 4346.

CHRISTIANITY.

- 1. The last and most glorious of the Divine revelations, 1120, 1121.
- 2. Indisputable facts concerning it :—
 - (1.) It is a system of wonders, 1122.
 - (2.) As a system of morality it is unsurpassed, 1123.
 - (3.) No other religion does more to promote virtue and the national welfare, 1124-1128.
 - (4.) Its effects upon society have been highly beneficial, 1129, 1130.
 - (5.) It blesses and ennobles the poor, 1131, 1084, 4160.
 - (6.) The effect of universal obedience to it would be an unexampled state of national happiness, 1132.
 - (7.) It delivers those who accept it from the fear of death, 1133.
- 3. How difficult it is for us to appreciate its blessings, 1134.
- 4. The extent of its benefits is not yet discernible, 1135.
- 5. Is a religion of principles, 1136.
- 6. Its distinctive doctrine, 1137.
- 7. Challenges inquiry, 1138.
- 8. Will bear investigation, 1139.
- 9. Many of its doctrines are necessarily mysterious, 1140.
- 10. Can be judged rightly only from within, 1141.
- 11. How assurance of its truth is to be attained, 1142, 1143.
- 12. The experience of Christians is the best evidence that Christianity is from God, 1144-1148.
- 13. Importance of a study of its evidences, 1149.
- 14. What is meant by a "candid" consideration of its evidences, 1150.
- 15. Its universal adaptation, 1151, 2420-2424, 2427.
- 16. Two arguments for its truth, 1152.
- 17. Its prohibition of pleasure, 1153.
- 18. Why it is hated, 1154.
- 19. The reasonableness of its requirements, 1155, 1156.
- 20. Can only be learned by practice, 1157.
- 21. Should govern our whole life, 1158.
- 22. Its motive power, 1159.
- 23. Is independent of human help, 1160.
- 24. Its progress, 1161, 1162.
- 25. The great obstacle to its progress, 1163, 1164.
- 26. Is indestructible, 1165.
- 27. Its ultimate triumph, 1166-1168, 979, 2541, 4829, 4831.
- 28. How its triumph is to be secured, 1169.

CHURCH. THE

- I. IS BELOVED OF GOD, 1170.
- II. EMBRACES ALL BELIEVERS, AND BELIEVERS ONLY, 1171-1177.
- III. ALL ITS MEMBERS ARE IMPERFECT, 1178.
- IV. THOUGH IT CONTAINS MANY UNHOLY PERSONS, YET EVEN THE VISIBLE CHURCH IS HOLY, 1179-1183.
- V. HER MISSION, 1184-1186.
- VI. THE CHURCH IN THE MIDDLE AGES, 1187.
- VII. THE CHURCH AND THE BIBLE, 1188.
- VIII. HER AUTHORITY TO ORDAIN CEREMONIES, 1189.
- IX. HER UNITY :—
 - 1. In what it consists, 1190-1193.
 - 2. Uniformity is not essential to unity, 1194-1196.
 - 3. Its advantages, 1197, 1198.
 - 4. How it is to be attained, 1199-1202.
 - 5. Love to Christ the sole and sufficient bond of unity, 1203.
 - 6. Falsely claimed by the Church of Rome, 1204.
 - 7. A call to union, 1205.
- X. UNIFORMITY :—
 - 1. Is not supremely important, 1206.
 - 2. Does not ensure unity, 1207.
 - 3. Is not essential, 1208.
 - 4. Is impossible and undesirable, 1209, 1210, 2193-2211.
 - 5. The absurdity and mischievousness of insisting on it, 1211-1214.
- XI. IMPORTANCE OF MAINTAINING DUE ORDER, 1215-1217.
- XII. DISSENSIONS IN THE CHURCH :—
 - 1. Are often due to trivial causes, 1218.
 - 2. Are always unreasonable, 1219-1224.
 - 3. Are a hindrance to the progress of the Gospel, 1225, 2450.
 - 4. Enfeeble and imperil the Church, 1226-1228.
 - 5. Are a cause of rejoicing to the enemies of the truth, 1229.
 - 6. Are offensive to God, 1230.
- XIII. ITS DISCIPLINE :—
 - 1. Must be impartial, 1231.
 - 2. Importance of strictly maintaining it, 1232, 3314.
- XIV. DUTIES OF ITS MEMBERS TOWARDS EACH OTHER, 1233-1236.
- XV. THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH :—
 - 1. The contrast between it and the pagan world, 1237.
 - 2. Contrasts between the primitive Church and our own, 1238-1240.
- XVI. HER DEPENDENCE ON DIVINE AID, 1241-1243.
- XVII. HER TROUBLES DIVINELY SENT FOR GOOD, 1244-1245.
- XVIII. HER SAFETY, 1246-1251, 2449.

COMFORT.

- 1. Its sources, 1252, 1253.
- 2. How God administers it, 1254-1256.
- 3. Exceeds our distresses, 1257.
- 4. Its source to be tested, 1258, 1259.
- 5. Why it is sometimes withheld, 1260, 1262.
- 6. Is not the measure of grace, 1262-1265.
- 7. Not to be supremely desired, 1266.
- 8. Not to be too earnestly craved, 1267, 352.

9. Not always attained at the outset of the Christian life, 1268, 1269.
20. How it is to be attained, 1270-1275, 3499-3501, 4474.
21. Various consolations for feeble and fearful believers, 1276-1285, 961, 1995, 1997-2003, 2513-2516, 2527, 2633, 3366, 4475.

CONSCIENCE.

- I. DEFINED, 1286-1289.
- II. IS MORE THAN OPINION, 1290.
- III. ITS FUNCTIONS :—
 1. It is designed to be our guide and monitor through life, 1291-1294.
 2. It records our actions now, 1295-1297.
 3. It will witness against us at the last, 1298.
- IV. HOW FAR ITS DECISIONS ARE AUTHORITATIVE, 1299.
- V. NOT AN INFALLIBLE GUIDE, 1300-1307, 535, 536, 1522.
- VI. NEVERTHELESS MUST BE STRICTLY HEEDED, 1308-1312.
- VII. THE DANGER OF NEGLECTING IT, 1313-1315.
- VIII. SHOULD BE CAREFULLY PROTECTED, 1316.
- IX. WORKS DIFFERENTLY, BUT WITH THE SAME RESULT, IN DIFFERENT MEN, 1317, 1318.
- X. ITS POWER, 1319, 1320, 4941.
- XI. TRUE PEACE OF CONSCIENCE :—
 1. Its only source, 1321-1324, 3350, 3645, 3646.
 2. A life-long blessing, 1325.
 3. A reason for thanksgiving, 1326.
- XII. FALSE PEACE OF CONSCIENCE :—
 1. From what it arises, 1327, 2673.
 2. Its folly, 1328.
 3. Deceptive and dangerous, 1329, 1330.
 4. Imperfect and insecure, 1331, 1332.
 5. Satan's care not to disturb it, 1333.
- XIII. THE EFFECTS OF AN AWAKENED CONSCIENCE, 1334-1341.
- XIV. THE DIFFICULTY OF SATISFYING IT, 1342.
- XV. IS CAPABLE OF IMMENSE IMPROVEMENT, 1343-1345.
- XVI. TENDERNESS OF CONSCIENCE, 1346, 1347.

CONTENTMENT.

1. Is a characteristic of the Christian, 1348.
2. The example of St. Paul, 1349.
3. Is peculiar to the children of God, 1350.
4. From what it arises, 1351.
5. How it is to be attained, 1352-1354, 1711-1716, 1719, 4969.
6. Reasons for contentment, 1355-1357.
7. Its wisdom, 1358-1362, 1687.
8. Its blessedness, 1363-1366.

CONTROVERSY.

1. Is often foolish and unprofitable, 1367-1371, 1785-1792, 3095.
2. Is sometimes necessary, 1372, 1373.
3. Is better than ignorant indifference, 1374.
4. Its advantages, 1375, 1376.
5. Should not be engaged in rashly, 1377.
6. In what spirit it is to be conducted, 1378-1380.
7. Heat inseparable from it, 1381.
8. Whose judgments are to be regarded as authoritative, 1382, 1383.
9. The ignorant are the most confident, 1384.
20. Is not confined to Christians, 1385-1387.

11. Absurdity of the interference of the ungodly in religious controversies, 1388.
12. Received truths not to be subjected to controversy, 1389.
13. Its causes, 1390.
14. What would end it, 1391.

CONVERSION. [See also REGENERATION, 4063-4128, and REPENTANCE, 4206-4273.]

- I. IN WHAT IT CONSISTS, 1392-1395.
- II. IS POSSIBLE, 1396.
- III. HOW IT IS EFFECTED. [See also 4229-4231.]
 1. Not by eloquence, 1397.
 2. Not by argument, 1398.
 3. Not by intellectual power, 1399.
 4. But by the Spirit of God, 1400-1405.
 5. Who works without impairing the freedom of the human will, 1406, 1407.
- IV. HINDRANCES TO CONVERSION, 1408, 1409, 4549.
- V. THE EXPERIENCE OF THE CONVERTED IS VARIED :—
 1. In accordance with their constitutional tendencies and previous life, 1410, 1411.
 2. As to the time of their conversion, 1412, 1413.
 3. As to the means employed to effect their conversion, 1414, 1415.
 4. As to the emotions they experience, 1416-1418.
 5. As to the definiteness with which they can trace the history and fix the period of their conversion, 1419-1429.
- VI. PROOFS OF ITS REALITY. [See also 3938-3976, 4259-4273.]
 1. A radical and thorough change of heart, 1430, 1431, 413.
 2. Thankful acknowledgment of God's grace and mercy, 1432.
 3. Hatred of sin, 1433.
 4. Holiness of life, 1434, 800, 1074.
 5. Growth in grace, 1435-1437, 2473-2488, 2519, 2527.
- VII. NOT TO BE DELAYED. [See also 4232-4258.]
 1. Because instant conversion is our duty, 1438, 1439.
 2. Because our position is so perilous, 1440-1443.
 3. Because life is so uncertain, 1444.
 4. Because the work will never be less difficult, 1445.
 5. Because delay multiplies its difficulties, 1446-1455.
 6. Because delay is so foolish, 1456.
 7. Because late conversions are so rare, 1457, 1458.
 8. Because the reality of late conversions is always doubtful, 1459-1461.
- VIII. IN WHAT SENSE IT IS INSTANTANEOUS, 1462.
- IX. MUST BE THOROUGH, 1463-1465.
- X. IS ONLY THE BEGINNING OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE, 1466-1468, 2479, 2482.
- XI. ITS RESULTS, 1469, 3046.
- XII. WHY CONVERSIONS ARE SO RARE, 1470.
- XIII. HISTORY OF A CONVERSION, 1471.

CONVICTION.

1. Its nature, 1472.
2. The commencement of the Divine life in the soul, 1473, 1474.
3. Its design, 1475, 1476, 1849.

4. How it is effected, 1477, 1478.
5. Should instantly lead to action, 1479-1482, 4636.
6. Should lead us to Christ, 1483, 1484.
7. Saving conviction is thorough, 1485-1487.
8. Abortive convictions, 1488.
9. The duty of those who are under conviction, 1489.
10. Is deepened by every attempt to obey the law of God, 1490.

CREATION. THE

1. Is at once a proof of the being, and a revelation of the character, of God, 1491-1494.
2. Its revelation of God is necessarily imperfect, 1495-1497.
3. It is all very good, 1498-1501.
4. Its inequalities are not imperfections, 1502, 1503.
5. In what spirit it is to be studied, 1504-1506.
6. "Lo, these are parts of His ways; but how little a portion is heard of Him!" 1507.

CURIOSITY.

1. Its folly, 1508-1511.
2. Its perilousness, 1512, 1513.
3. Its injuriousness, 1514-1516.
4. Its sinfulness, 1517, 1518.

CUSTOM.

1. Defined, 1519.
2. Reveals character, 1520.
3. Not the standard of right, 1521, 1522, 4925.
4. No excuse for sin, 1523, 1526.
5. Hardens men in sin, 1527, 4534-4539, 4545.
6. Its blinding influence, 1528, 1529.
7. Its power grows continually, 1530.
8. Wrong customs should therefore be broken abruptly, 1531.
9. Secret of the power of social customs, 1532.
10. Innocent customs should be complied with, 1533.

DEATH.

I. IN RELATION TO ALL MANKIND:-

1. Its nature, 1534, 1535.
2. It is our common doom, 1536, 1537.
3. It is inevitable, 1538.
4. It is a theme of universal interest, 1539.
5. Its nearness, 1540-1542, 4239.
6. Its period is uncertain, 1543, 3274, 3568.
7. It steals upon us without warning, 1544-1546.
8. We die daily, 1547.
9. Its terrors, 1548, 1549.
10. Its influence, 1550.
11. Its disclosures of character, 1551, 1552, 1557, 1626.
12. Men die as they live, 1553.
13. How easily the fear of it is overmastered, 1554, 1556.
14. Is seldom realised, 1557.
15. Is usually disregarded, 1558, 1559, 2768, 3060, 3063, 4002.
16. We should remember that we are to die, 1560.
17. Reminders of death, 1561.
18. Should be prepared for, 1562-1566.

II. IN RELATION TO THE IMPENITENT:-

1. To them it is unwelcome, 1567, 1568.
2. To them it is ruin, 1569.

III. IN RELATION TO THE PEOPLE OF GOD:-

1. Even the good recoil from it, 1570.
2. Yet by them it is to be desired rather than feared, 1571-1578.
3. Notwithstanding that even to them the hour of death is frequently a season of sore temptation, 1579, 1580.
4. Unwillingness to die is an evidence of defective faith and love, 1581-1583, 469.
5. How the fear of it is to be overcome, 1584-1589.
6. The secret of peace in death, 1590-1593.
7. Grandeur of the Christian's death, 1594.
8. In death the saints are perfected, 1595-1600.
9. How the early Christians regarded it, 1601.
10. Is still longed for by holy men, 1602, 1603, 2558, 2559.
11. Is not to be impatiently desired, 1604-1606.
12. Sudden death, 1607-1609.
13. Its revelations, 1610, 1551-1553, 1557, 1626, 3291-3293, 5023-5025.

IV. ENCOURAGEMENTS FOR THE FEARFUL:-

1. Christ has abolished death, 1611-1613.
2. Death is God's angel, 1614.
3. It touches the body only, 1615-1619.
4. Even the body shall rise again, 1620-1622.
5. Death is our deliverance from bondage, 1623-1628.
6. Death is the end of all our cares and sorrows, 1629, 216.
7. Death transforms the future, 1630.
8. Death conducts us to true joy, 1631, 1632, 1076, 1109-1111, 1133.
9. Death is the day of our espousals, 1633.
10. Death brings us into the presence of Christ, and into the best society, 1634, 1635.
11. To die is to sleep in Jesus, 1636.
12. To die is to go home, 1637-1639.
13. The way home is not an untried one, 1640.
14. Christ will be with us all the way, 1641.
15. He who has given us grace to live will give us grace to die, 1642, 1643.

DESERTION.

1. Its cause, 1644.
2. Its design, 1645-1648.
3. Not to be hastily assumed, 1649-1654, 200.
4. Terribleness of the calamity, 1655.
5. Encouragements for the desponding, 1656, 1657.
6. The only consolation, 1658, 1659.

DEVIL. THE [See also TEMPTATION, 4668-4808.]

1. His existence not incredible, 1660, 1661.
2. The prince of the power of the air, 1662.
3. In what sense he is "the god of this world," 1663.
4. Is neither omnipresent nor omniscient, 1664.
5. His discernment of our thoughts, 1665.
6. Our adversary, 1666.
7. Our accuser, 1667.
8. His craft, 1668-1672.
9. His diligence, 1673, 1674.
10. How he exercises his sway, 1675.
11. Why his suggestions are undetected, 1676.
12. Is a hard master, 1677.
13. Is not to be overcome by mere words, 1678.
14. Has no power to force us to sin, 1679.

DISCONTENT.

- I. ITS FREQUENCY, 1680.
- II. ITS CAUSES :—
 1. The perversion of our nature, 1681, 1682.
 2. Our lack of grace, 1683.
 3. Spiritual sloth, 1684.
 4. Heedlessness of the blessings of our lot, 1685, 1686.
 5. Forgetfulness of the greater trials that befall others, 1687.
- III. ITS UNREASONABLENESS :—
 1. This life is a journey, 1688.
 2. This life is a voyage, 1689.
 3. This life is a warfare, 1690.
 4. Our trials bear no proportion to our comforts, 1691, 1692.
 5. Former prosperity is a reason, not for murmuring, but for thankful remembrance, 1693.
 6. We profess to be heirs of God, 1694, 1695.
- IV. ITS FOLLY :—
 1. It does nothing to remove our troubles, 1696, 1697.
 2. It does much to aggravate them, 1698-1701.
- V. ITS HURTFULNESS, 1702, 1703.
- VI. ITS MISERY, 1704.
- VII. ITS SHAMEFULNESS, 1705, 1706.
- VIII. ITS SINFULNESS, 1707-1710.
- IX. ITS CURE :—
 1. It is not to be wrought by changes in our circumstances, 1711.
 2. Nor by additions to our possessions, 1712-1714.
 3. But by the grace of God in the heart, cleansing it from inordinate desires, 1715-1717.
 4. By the increase of self-knowledge, 1718.
 5. By meditation upon what is consonant with our condition in this life, 1719.
 6. By a discovery of the interdependency of Divine providences, 1720.

DOING GOOD.

- I. THE DUTY OF EVERY CHRISTIAN, 1721, 1722, 2205-2207.
- II. POSSIBLE TO EVERY ONE, 1723-1727, 4324.
- III. THE POWER FOR GOOD THAT LIES LATENT IN EVERY CHURCH, 1728.
- IV. DEMANDS SELF-DENIAL, 1729.
- V. DIFFICULTIES ARE NOT TO DETER US, 1730.
- VI. OPPORTUNITIES FOR DOING GOOD SHOULD BE EAGERLY SEIZED, 1731.
- VII. MODES OF DOING GOOD, 1732.
- VIII. THE HIGHEST FORM OF DOING GOOD, 1733.
- IX. THE SUPREME QUALIFICATION FOR DOING GOOD, 1734, 1735.
- X. ITS REWARDS :—
 1. Personal invigoration and comfort, 1736, 1737.
 2. True and unexpected happiness, 1738-1743.
 3. True glory, 1744, 1745.
 4. The approval of Christ, 1746.

EDUCATION.

1. Its nature, 1747-1749.
2. Its object, 1750-1752.
3. Its necessity, 1753-1759.
4. Should begin early, 1760, 1761.
5. Cannot be imposed on any one, 1762, 1763.
6. Some minds are incapable of it, 1764.
7. Mistakes in education, 1765-1767.

8. Uniformity is impossible, 1768, 1769.
9. Public schools, 1770.
10. Its results, 1771-1775.

ELECTION.

1. Its cause and method, 1776-1778.
2. Its design, 1779.
3. Furnishes no argument for continuance in sin, 1780, 1781.
4. No reason for rejecting God's offers of mercy, 1782-1784.
5. Does not discharge us from the obligation use the appointed means, 1785-1792.
6. Speculations concerning it are unwise and foolish, 1793-1797.
7. How assurance of personal election is to be attained, 1797-1802.

ERROR.

1. Its source, 1803.
2. Is worse than ignorance, 1804, 1805.
3. When it is most dangerous, 1806, 1807.
4. How it gains a footing in the world, 1808.
5. How it is diffused, 1809-1813.
6. The sinfulness of diffusing it, 1814.
7. Our liability to it, 1815, 1816.
8. Who are perverted by it, 1817, 1818.
9. The evil of persistence in it, 1819.
10. How it is to be overthrown, 1820, 1821.
11. Error, schism, and heresy, 1822, 1823.
12. How it is to be distinguished from truth, 1824.
13. Is not to be tolerated, 1825.
14. The duty of public teachers in regard to it, 1826, 1827.
15. Ultimately advances the truth, 1828.

EVIL THOUGHTS.

1. Their sinfulness, 1829-1831.
2. Usually indicate character, 1832.
3. But often are interjected by Satan, 1833, 1834.
4. Are not as guilty as evil actions, 1835.
5. Yet they are powerful and disastrous in their influence, 1836-1842.
6. How they are to be dealt with, 1843-1847.
7. Their cure, 1848, 1849.

EXAMPLE.

1. Is better than precept, 1850-1853.
2. Its power for good, 1854-1861.
3. Its power for evil, 1862-1865.
4. Is no rule of life or excuse for sin, 1866.
5. Which to follow, 1867-1870.
6. Importance and value of the human examples set before us in Scripture, 1871, 1872.

FAITH.

- I. ITS NATURE :—
 1. It is confidence in truth, 1873.
 2. It is confidence in the ability of persons, 1874.
 3. It is confidence in the character of persons, 1875, 1876, 2174.
 4. It is trust in the testimony of others, 1877-1879, 2173-2175.
 5. It is trust in God, 1880, 1881.
- II. ITS NECESSITY :—
 1. To the existence of society, and to all forms of human activity and excellence, 1882-1887.
 2. To our happiness here and now, 1888.

3. To enable us to please God, 1889, 3565, 3569.
- III. ITS PRECIOUSNESS:—
 1. By it we are justified, 1890.
 2. By it we are grafted into Christ, 1891.
 3. By it our final salvation is ensured, 1892.
 4. It brings peace, 1893, 1894.
 5. Of all other graces, it is the germ and animating power, 1895-1900.
 6. Without it no other grace is acceptable to God, 1901.
 7. It is the faculty whereby we realise unseen things, 1902-1904.
 8. By it we are enabled to triumph over doubts, 1905-1907.
 9. It enables us to exercise a wise foresight, 1908.
 10. It enables us to walk safely, 1909.
 11. It opens to us the promises, 1910.
 12. It gives calmness in trial and danger, 1911-1919.
 13. It is our safeguard in temptation, 1920-1922.
 14. It saves us from despair, 1923-1926.
 15. It gives prevalence to prayer, 1927, 3827-3830.
 16. It stimulates to endeavour, 1928.
 17. It brings deliverance, 1929.
 18. It is the secret of all heroic enterprises, 1930, 1931.
 19. It ennobles the whole life, 1932, 1933.
 20. It gives calmness in death, 1934, 1253.
- IV. SAVING FAITH:—
 1. Its nature, 1935-1943.
 2. Its object, 1944-1951.
 3. Is necessarily personal, 1952-1956.
 4. How it is exercised, 1957-1968.
 5. How it justifies and saves, 1969-1975.
 6. In what sense it is the gift of God, 1976, 1977.
- V. PROOFS OF ITS REALITY:—
 1. Holiness of heart and life, 1978-1986.
 2. Humility, 1987-1989.
- VI. WEAK FAITH:—
 1. May be true faith, 1990-1996, 1283.
 2. Is sufficient to save, 1997-2003.
 3. Though weak, is of all things most precious, 2004.
 4. There may be faith where there is no assurance, 2005.
 5. How its strength may be measured, 2006.
- VII. MUST BE STRENGTHENED:—
 1. That we may not be overcome by temptation, 2007-2009.
 2. That all our other graces may be caused to flourish, 2011-2013.
 3. That our comforts may be increased and our peace perfected, 2014-2017.
 4. How it is to be strengthened, 2018, 2019.
- VIII. ITS RELATIONS TO OTHER FACULTIES, EMOTIONS, AND GRACES:—
 1. Sight, 2020, 2021.
 2. Reason, 2022-2024.
 3. Fear:—
 - (1.) There may be fear where there is no faith, 2025-2027.
 - (2.) But faith is usually preceded by fear, 2028, 2029.
 4. Repentance, 2030-2034.
 5. Holiness, 2035.

6. Faith and love, 2036-2039, 3328.
7. Faith, hope, and love, 2040, 2041, 2910.
- IX. IN WHAT SENSE IT IS TO CEASE, 2042.

FEAR.

- I. ITS USES:—
 1. The fear of God delivers us from the fear of man, 2043, 2044.
 2. It restrains us from sin, 2045.
 3. It leads to self-examination, 2046.
 4. It keeps us humble, 2047-2049.
- II. ITS ABUSES:—
 1. Morbid fear enfeebles the soul, 2050-2052.
 2. It paralyses effort, 2053-2054, 2368.
 3. Leads to superstition, 2055, 2056.
 4. Ensures failure, 2057, 2058.
- III. IS MERELY REPRESSIVE IN ITS INFLUENCE, 2059, 2060, 4019, 4086, 4087.
- IV. DISTINCTION BETWEEN LEGAL AND EVANGELICAL FEAR, 2061.
- V. SLAVISH AND FILIAL FEAR, 2062, 2063.

FEELING.

1. Is necessarily variable, 2064-2067, 975, 3049, 3050, 4188-4190.
2. The connection between faith and feeling, 2068.
3. Undue importance is not to be attached to it, 2069-2071, 953, 4259-4263, 4266, 4272.
4. Not the measure of God's love for us, 2072.
5. It is neither possible nor desirable that it should be always intense, 2073, 2074.
6. Should not be separated from action, 2075, 2076.

FORMS AND CEREMONIES.

1. Their necessity and value, 2077-2079.
2. How their value is to be estimated, 2080-2083.
3. Ancient forms are not to be needlessly revived, 2084.
4. Ancient forms are not necessarily serviceable now, 2085.
5. Are powerless to revive a declining faith, 2086.
6. A multiplication of forms is hostile to religion, 2087-2089.
7. Scripture authority is not to be demanded for every minute detail of ecclesiastical arrangement, 2090.
8. The folly of an indiscriminating zeal concerning them, 2091.
9. Are not to be enforced by penalties, 2092.

FRIENDSHIP.

1. Defined, 2093.
2. Its pleasures and advantages, 2094-2105.
3. True friendship is rare, 2106-2112.
4. True and false friendship, 2113, 2114.
5. Should neither be formed hastily nor carried to excess, 2115-2122.
6. Should be formed only with the good, 2123-2130, 4984.
7. Profitlessness of friendship with the ungodly, 2131-2137.
8. Perilousness of friendship with the ungodly, 2138-2148.
9. By the choice of our friends, we reveal our own character, 2149.
10. Youthful friendships, 2150.
11. Is rarely formed late in life, 2151.

12. Is tested by adversity, 2152-2159, 23, 241, 2172, 2390.
13. Its surest proof is its severest test, 2160-2162.
14. Is easily destroyed, 2163.
15. The difficulty of repairing its breaches, 2164.
16. How it is to be maintained, 2165-2169.
17. The best Friend, 2170, 964.
18. Is not limited to this life, 2171, 2172, 2746-2749, 5081.

FUTURE REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS.

[See also HEAVEN, 2713-2793; HELL, 2794-2812.]

- I. REASONABLENESS OF BELIEF IN THEIR REALITY, 2173-2175, 2795.
- II. ARE NECESSARY TO RESTRAIN MEN FROM CRIME, 2176.
- III. ARE NECESSARY TO VINDICATE THE JUSTICE OF GOD, 2177.
- IV. WHY THEY ARE HIDDEN FROM US, 2178, 2179.
- V. THE PUNISHMENT OF THE IMPENITENT IS ETERNAL :—
 1. This declaration is not inconsistent with what we know of God, 2180-2184, 2796, 2797.
 2. Guilt is not to be measured by the time occupied in transgression, 2185, 2186.
 3. Those who are consigned to it have already proved themselves incorrigible, 2187, 2807, 2808, 2809.
 4. They are punished for ever, because they would sin for ever, 2188, 2189, 2798.
 5. A universal amnesty is morally inadmissible, 2190.
 6. A second probation is inconceivable, 2191.
 7. The fact is not affected by our belief or disbelief, 2192, 2810.

GIFTS.

1. Their variety, 2193-2198.
2. We are neither to envy nor to despise those whose endowments are different from our own, 2199, 2200.
3. Every man should devote himself to the task for which he is peculiarly qualified, 2201.
4. Entail responsibility, 2202.
5. To whom they are a blessing, 2203.
6. For what purpose they are to be used, 2204-2207.
7. How they are to be valued, 2208.
8. Are not to be gloried in, 2209, 2210.
9. Are not the highest good, 2211.
10. Are not an unmixed good, 2212.
11. Are not identical with grace, 2213-2215.
12. Apart from grace, will but secure our condemnation, 2216.
13. Are less influential than grace, 2217.
14. The greatest gifts do not render us indispensable to the Church or the world, 2218, 2219.

GOD. [See CHRIST, 835-985; HOLY SPIRIT, THE, 2867-2908; TRINITY, THE, 4809-4821.]

- I. REASONS FOR BELIEF IN HIS EXISTENCE, 2220, 2221, 353-366.
- II. THERE IS ONE GOD, 2222.
- III. GOD IS A SPIRIT, 2223.
- IV. THE GREAT FIRST CAUSE, 2224.
- V. HIS GREATNESS AND GLORY, 2225-2228.
- VI. INCOMPREHENSIBLE, YET NOT UNKNOWN, 2229-2240.

VII. REVELATIONS OF GOD, 2241-2243, 364,

847, 855-857, 1495-1497, 3527.

VIII. HOW HE IS TO BE KNOWN, 2244.

IX. OUR FATHER, 2245-2249.

X. HIS ATTRIBUTES, 2250-2252.

XI. ETERNAL, 2253.

XII. UNCHANGEABLE, 2254-2256, 2324, 2341, 3750, 3753.

XIII. HIS OMNIPRESENCE, 2257-2262, 4015, 5086.

XIV. HIS OMNISCIENCE, 2263-2267, 956, 1282, 1504, 1791, 2359.

XV. HIS WISDOM, 2268.

XVI. HIS POWER, 2269-2274.

XVII. HIS HOLINESS, 2275, 2814-2819.

XVIII. HIS RELATION TO SIN :—

1. He is not the author of sin, 2276, 2277.
2. He tempts no man to sin, 2278.
3. In what sense He hardens the heart, 2279.
4. His permission of sin, 2280.
5. His hatred of sin, 2281, 2282, 4478-4481.
6. He willeth not the death of the sinner, 2283, 2284.
7. His compassion for sinners, 2285, 2286.

XIX. HIS WILL MUST BE THE RULE OF OUR LIFE, 2287.

XX. HIS ANGER :—

1. Is a Divine perfection, 2288-2290.
2. Its terribleness, 2291.
3. Its manifestations, 2292-2294.

XXI. HIS LONGSUFFERING :—

1. Its cause, 2295.
2. Its terrors, 2296-2299.
3. The danger of abusing it, 2300, 2301.

XXII. HIS GOODNESS :—

1. It is spontaneous, 2302, 2303.
2. His tender mercies are over all His works, 2304-2306.
3. The multitude of His mercies, 2307-2309.
4. His care for the poor, 2310, 2311, 4015-4017, 4049.
5. His condescension to the lowly, 2312, 4018.
6. His pity for them that fear Him, 2313-2315, 199, 201.
7. Is not inconsistent with severity, 2316, 2317, 2180-2183.

XXIII. HIS LOVE :—

1. It preceded ours, 2318.
2. It was manifested in the gift of Christ, 2319-2321, 390.
3. Its tenderness, 2322.
4. It embraces all His children, 2323.
5. It is unchangeable, 2324.
6. It should lead us always to trust Him, 2325-2337.

XXIV. HIS MERCY :—

1. He delights in mercy, 2328.
2. Is needed by all, 2329, 2330.
3. Is offered to all, 2331.
4. Exceeds our sin, 2332-2337.
5. Is accorded instantly, 2338, 2339.
6. How wonderfully we are urged to seek it, 2340.
7. It is inexhaustible, 2341-2345.
8. Must be personally sought, 2346, 2347.
9. Is limited to this life, 2348.
10. Is not to be abused, 2349, 2350.

XXV. HIS GRACE :—

1. Is ever needful, 2351-2358, 1255, 1256, 2871, 2891.
2. Is ever available, 2359, 2360.
3. Is unmerited, 2361, 2362, 4086.
4. Is all-sufficient, 2363-2374, 2791.
5. Is the source of all our spiritual excellences, 2375.
6. Its transforming power, 2376.
7. Is inexhaustible, 2377.

XXVI. THE REST AND PORTION OF THE SOUL,
2378-2387, 1658, 1659, 4627-4630, 4970.

XXVII. HIS INDWELLING IN THE SOUL, 2388,
2389, 2840, 2900, 2902.

XXVIII. THE EVER-FAITHFUL FRIEND, 2390.

GOOD WORKS.

1. Can be performed by none but good men, 2391, 3568, 3572, 3574, 3582, 3585.
2. In what sense any man's works can be said to be good, 2392.
3. Are required of all who profess to be Christ's, 2393-2397.
4. Their relation to faith, 2398-2404, 1978-1986.
5. Their relation to salvation, 2405-2408, 1950, 1951, 3588, 3589.
6. Are the life of devotion, 2410.
7. Are not to be boasted of, 2411, 2412, 2375.
8. Are scrutinised by God, 2413.
9. Evangelical preachers are not enemies of good works, 2414.

GOSPEL THE

1. A great mystery, 2415.
2. The gladdest tidings, 2416.
3. Is addressed to all mankind, 2417.
4. Universally and permanently needful, 2418-2420.
5. Its universal adaptation, 2421-2424.
6. Its universal adaptation to our need a proof of its Divine origin, 2425-2427.
7. Its power, 2428-2430.
8. How it is to be treated by us, 2431-2434.
9. The danger of neglecting it, 2435.
10. Not to be rejected on account of the imperfections of its preachers, 2435.
11. Not to be rejected on account of the scepticism of able men, 2436.
12. In what sense men are damned for rejecting it, 2437.
13. Its diverse effects, 2439-2441.
14. To what its success is to be attributed, 2443.
15. The permanence of its influence, 2444.
16. Symbols of the Gospel, 2445, 2446.
17. Nothing else will satisfy believers, 2447.
18. It is our duty to spread it, 2448.
19. Fear for it is not inconsistent with faith in it, 2449.
20. The great hindrance to its progress, 2450.
21. Its ultimate triumph, 2451.

GRACE.

I. CONSIDERED AS A DIVINE ENERGY WORKING IN THE SOUL :—

1. The mode of its operation, 2452.
2. The transformations it effects, 2453, 2454, 1071, 2376, 4346.
3. It cannot be hid, 2455.
4. Its fruits are unmistakable, 2456.
5. Its conflicts, 2457-2459.

II. CONSIDERED AS CHRISTIAN CHARACTER :—

1. Its source, 2460-2462.
2. Adorns the soul, 2463.
3. How it is wrought in the soul, 2464-2466, 210, 2972.
4. How it is maintained in the soul, 2467, 2468.
5. Its development may be hindered, 2469.
6. Weak grace is real grace, 2470, 2471.
7. Its relation to glory, 2472.

GROWTH IN GRACE.

I. IN WHAT IT CONSISTS, 2473-2478.

II. IS NECESSARY :—

1. Because we are born into the Divine life imperfect, 2479-2482.
2. To prove the sincerity of our profession and the reality of our grace, 2483-2488, 3965.
3. To preserve us from apostacy, 2489-2492, 4808.
4. To qualify us to receive more grace, 2493.
5. To secure God's commendation, 2494, 2495.
6. To our comfort and joy, 2496, 2497.
7. To bring us to heaven, 2498.

III. WHAT IT IS THAT IS REQUIRED OF US, 2499.

IV. SHOULD BE EARNESTLY DESIRED, 2500, 2501

V. HOW IT IS TO BE SECURED :—

1. By constant contemplation of the character of Christ, 2502.
2. By a wise use of the means of grace, 2503.
3. By earnest effort, 2504-2507.

VI. ITS METHOD :—

1. It is gradual, 2508-2516, 1072.
2. And therefore is frequently imperceptible :—
(1.) In its commencement, 2517-2521, 2862.
(2.) In its progress, 2522-2526.
3. It is intermittent, 2527-2530.
4. It is sectional, 2531, 2532.
5. Yet it is continuous, 2533-2538.
6. It is cumulative in its rate, 2539-2544.

VII. SHOULD BE SYMMETRICAL, 2545, 2546.

VIII. HINDRANCES TO IT, 2547-2550.

IX. PROOFS OF ITS REALITY :—

1. Increasing spiritual discernment, 2551, 2552.
2. More successful resistance to temptation, 2553.
3. Greater patience under affliction, 2554.
4. A more exact performance of duty, 2555.
5. Increased delight in duty, 2556, 2557.
6. Diminishing aversion from death, 2558, 2559.

X. ITS REWARDS, 2560-2562, 4808.

XI. SHOULD INSPIRE US WITH THANKFULNESS, 2563.

XII. CANNOT BE TOO GREAT, 2564-2568.

XIII. IT SHALL GO ON FOR EVER, 2569.

HEARERS.

I. Various kinds of hearers :—

- (1.) Drowsy hearers, 2570-2572.
- (2.) Inattentive hearers, 2573-2575.
- (3.) Careless hearers, 2576.
- (4.) Curious hearers, 2577.
- (5.) Discontented, querulous hearers, 2578-2582.
- (6.) Forgetful hearers, 2583.
- (7.) Impudicious hearers, 2584.
- (8.) Hardened hearers, 2585.
2. Need spiritual ears to appreciate the Gospel, 2586, 2587.

3. Should seek to be profited rather than pleased, 2588, 2589.
4. Are not to be weary of familiar truths, 2590.
5. Their craving for novelty is unhealthy and absurd, 2591-2594.
6. Should regard the message, not the messenger, 2595-2600.
7. Necessity of effort on their part, 2601.
8. Should apply to themselves what they hear, 2602-2605, 4860-4863.
9. The folly of resenting faithful preaching, 2606-2609, 4325, 4333.
10. Folly of their craving for "comforting" preaching, 2610-2613.
11. Are not to regard as useless what is profitless to themselves personally, 2614.
12. Should discriminate between truth and error, 2615, 2616.
13. Must test what they are taught by the Word of God, 2617.
14. "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only," 2618-2621.
15. Should exemplify the Gospel, 2622, 2623.
16. Should endeavour to retain what they hear, 2624-2627.
17. Consolations for discouraged hearers :—
 - (1.) In hearing the Word, however imperfectly, we at least obey God's command, 2628.
 - (2.) Our imperfect hearing prepares us for a more perfect service of God, 2629.
 - (3.) In hearing, our sinfulness is not created, but revealed, 2630.
 - (4.) Our sense of imperfection should make us more constant in hearing, 2631, 2632.
 - (5.) Our very weakness may render our service more acceptable to God, 2633.
18. Where all seems lost, much really may be gained, 2634-2637.

HEARING.

1. Is a natural instinct of the new life, 2638.
2. Its importance, 2639-2643.
3. Should be practised constantly, 2644-2648.
4. Should be preceded by appropriate preparation, 2649-2653.
5. Should have for its end personal profit, 2654-2658.
6. Wandering thoughts, 2659.
7. Profitless hearing is injurious, 2660.
8. Should be followed by meditation, 2661-2665, 3474, 3480, 3505.
9. How the impressions produced by it are to be retained, 2666-2668.

HEART. THE

1. Is naturally corrupt, 2669-2676, 805.
2. The carnal mind is enmity against God, 2677-2679.
3. The difficulty of knowing it, 2680, 4434, 4454, 4714.
4. It is known to God, 2681-2683.
5. It is tested by temptation, 2684-2687.
6. Its suitors, 2688.
7. The determining power of the life, 2689-2693.
8. Its strength for evil, 2694.
9. Must be kept with all diligence, 2695-2705, 1841, 1842.
10. Importance of keeping it well employed, 2706-2708.

11. When pure is a dwelling-place for God, 2709-2711.
12. A picture of what the heart should be, 2712.

HEAVEN.

1. Is a place as well as a state of being, 2713.
2. Imperfectness of our knowledge concerning it, 2714-2717.
3. How curious questions concerning it are to be answered, 2718.
4. The references of Scripture to it, 2719.
5. Its supreme glory the presence of Christ, 2720.
6. Its delights are inexhaustible and its joys eternal, 2721-2727.
7. The rest that remaineth for the people of God, 2728, 2729.
8. Is strictly reserved for God's people, 2730, 1493, 2829-2832, 2865, 2866.
9. Necessity of preparation for it, 2731-2738, 3568, 3746, 4096, 4098-4102, 4140.
10. Familiarised to us by the death of our beloved ones, 2739.
11. The realm where character is perfect, 2740, 2741.
12. Varieties of character in heaven, 2742, 2743.
13. The vastness of its population, 2744, 2745.
14. Recognition of friends in heaven, 2746-2749, 2171, 2172, 5081.
15. The memories of heaven, 2750.
16. Degrees of glory, 2751-2753, 2562.
17. Is despised by the ungodly, 2754.
18. Is forfeited voluntarily, 2755.
19. The difficulty with which God brings us to it, 2756.
20. It is not enough merely to desire to reach it, 2757, 2758, 1787, 4140.
21. It should be the supreme object of our life to secure it, 2759-2762.
22. This is not inconsistent with strict attention to the ordinary duties of life, 2763, 2764.
23. Shut out at last! 2765.
24. To be made a topic of frequent meditation, 2766-2770.
25. The influence of the hope of heaven, 2771-2779.
26. The ardour with which the Christian longs for it, 2780-2785.
27. Longings for it strengthen with the spiritual life, 2786, 2787.
28. Foretastes of its joys are granted here and now, 2788, 2789, 3052, 3053.
29. The journey thither :—
 - (1.) The difficulties of the way, 2790, 197, 4213.
 - (2.) The difficulties of the way are not to turn us from it, 2791.
 - (3.) At the end of the way there is a sufficient recompense for all that can befall us in it, 2792, 2793.

HELL. [See also FUTURE REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS, 2173-2192.]

1. Its locality unknown, 2794.
2. Reasonableness of belief in its existence, 2795.
3. The dungeon of the universe, 2796, 2797.
4. The wickedness of its inhabitants, 2798.
5. The misery of its inhabitants :—
 - (1.) Its utterness, 2799, 2800.
 - (2.) From what it arises, 2801.
6. Its unquenchable fire, 2802-2804.

7. Its torments eternal, 2805, 2806.
8. Voluntarily chosen by the wicked, 2807, 4930.
9. In what sense it is the doom of rejectors of Christ, 2808, 2809.
10. Men should be warned against it, 2810, 2811.
11. Inefficacy of unbelief in its existence, 2812.

HOLINESS.

1. Defined, 2813.
2. As displayed in God and man, 2814-2817.
3. Is well-pleasing to God, 2818, 2819.
4. Is absolutely necessary :—
 - (1.) To our salvation, 2820, 2821.
 - (2.) To our acceptance with God, 2822-2824.
 - (3.) To our union with Christ, 2825.
 - (4.) To our safety in temptation, 2826, 2035.
 - (5.) To our usefulness here or hereafter, 2827, 2217.
 - (6.) To our happiness, 2828.
 - (7.) To qualify us for heaven, 2829-2832, 2730, 2738.
5. Is true happiness, 2833-2835.
6. How its blessedness is to be attained, 2836-2839.
7. Its source, 2840, 2841.
8. Its production God's aim in all His providences, 2842, 2843.
9. Its production the end and object of all religious observances, 2844.
10. Should be continually striven after :—
 - (1.) Notwithstanding that it may expose us to hatred and suffering, 2845, 2846.
 - (2.) In spite of misrepresentation, 2847.
 - (3.) Notwithstanding that perfection is unattainable in this life, 2848.
11. How it is to be attained, 2849-2855.
12. Must pervade the whole life, and cause us to hate all sin, 2856-2860.
13. Is not at once confirmed in the soul, 2861.
14. Its progress is not always perceptible, 2862.
15. How it is to be maintained, 2863.
16. Is not to be trusted in, 2864.
17. Does not entitle us to heaven, 2865, 2866.

HOLY SPIRIT. THE

- I. THE THIRD PERSON IN THE BLESSED TRINITY, 2867.
- II. HIS ASSISTANCE :—
 1. Its nature, 2868-2870.
 2. Our need of it :—
 - (1.) To deliver us from sin, 2871.
 - (2.) To guide and uphold us from day to day, 2872-2875.
 - (3.) To support us in affliction, 2876.
 - (4.) In the study of God's Word, 2877-2882.
 - (5.) In prayer, 2883, 2884, 3847-3849.
 - (6.) In preaching, 2885-2888.
 - (7.) In the use of ordinances, 2889-2891.
- III. HIS INFLUENCE :—
 1. On whom it is exerted, 2892.
 2. How it is exerted :—
 - (1.) Freely, 2893.
 - (2.) Gently, 2894.
 - (3.) Silently, 2895, 2896.
 - (4.) Yet its effects are perceptible, 2897, 2898.
 3. Should not be resisted, 2899.
- IV. HIS INDWELLING IN THE SOUL :—
 1. Its manner, 2900, 2840.

2. The safety of the soul, 2901.
3. Is a pledge and foretaste of heaven, 2902, 2903.
4. Is a matter of consciousness, 2904.
5. Its evidences, 2905.
- V. THE WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT :—
 1. Variable, yet real, 2906, 2907.
 2. An evidence of the Divine Mission of Christ, 2908.

HOPE.

- I. DEPICTED, 2909.
- II. ITS INFLUENCE :—
 1. It is the spring and soul of enterprise, 2910-2912.
 2. It relieves, sustains, and comforts in affliction, 2913-2921.
 3. It sustains in the conflicts and temptations of life, 2922, 2923, 3705.
 4. It enables a man to be helpful to his fellow-men, 2924.
 5. We should therefore pray that it may be increased in us, 2925.
- III. HOW AND WHY A CHRISTIAN HOPE IS TO BE ATTAINED, 2926.
- IV. CAUTIONS CONCERNING ITS EXERCISE :—
 1. We should remember that many of the hopes we cherish are baseless and illusory, 2927.
 2. We should not set our hopes on too distant objects, 2928.
 3. We should not permit our hopes to become extravagant or idle, 2929, 2930.
 4. We should test its reality, 2931, 2932.
- V. ITS DISAPPOINTMENTS, 2933-2935.
- VI. A HOPE THAT WILL NOT BE DISAPPOINTED, 2936.

HUMILITY.

- I. IN WHAT IT CONSISTS :—
 1. Not in under-rating ourselves, 2937, 2938.
 2. But in not over-valuing ourselves, 2939-2941.
- II. ITS CHARACTERISTICS :—
 1. It is not self-conscious, 2942, 2943.
 2. It delights in privacy, 2944, 2945.
- III. IS CONSTANTLY EXEMPLIFIED IN THE WISE AND GOOD, 2946-2949, 1075, 1987-1989, 3090, 3142.
- IV. ITS IMPORTANCE :—
 1. It is the foundation of Christian character, 2950-2953.
 2. It is absolutely necessary to our acceptance with God, 2954.
 3. It qualifies us for the reception of grace, 2955.
 4. It ennobles our nature, 2956, 2957.
 5. It is the life of prayer, 2958.
 6. It is the safeguard of all the virtues, 2959, 2960.
- V. ITS INFLUENCE :—
 1. It promotes growth in grace, 2961, 2962.
 2. It makes men contented, 2963, 2964.
 3. It makes men thankful, 2965.
 4. It makes men useful, 2966, 2967.
- VI. HOW IT IS TO BE ATTAINED, 2968-2972, 2977.
- VII. DEEPENS AS GRACE INCREASES, 2972, 2974.
- VIII. ITS COUNTERFEITS, 2975, 2976.
- IX. ITS WISDOM, 2977-2979, 4759.

2. ITS REWARDS :—

1. The inheritance of the earth, 2980.
2. Pardon, 2981.
3. Grace, 2982, 2983.
4. Power with God, 2984.
5. Eternal glory, 2985.

HYPOCRITES.

1. Their self-seeking, 2986-2989.
2. Their zeal for forms and ceremonies, 2990-2992.
3. Their love of publicity, 2993, 2994.
4. Often show fairer than real Christians, 2995, 2996.
5. The contrast between what they seem and are, 2997-3005.
6. Their knowledge is comfortless, 3006.
7. Their religion is only a screen, 3007.
8. Their inconsistency in prayer, 3008.
9. Their folly and misery, 3009-3015.
10. Their craft, 3016.
11. The certainty of their ultimate exposure, 3017-3023.
12. The vanity of their hope, 3024, 3025.
13. Their wickedness, 3026-3028.
14. Their punishment, 3029-3032.
15. Do not disprove the existence of true piety, 3033, 3034.

JOY.

1. Is more than mirthfulness, 3035.
2. The transiency of worldly joys, 3036.
3. Is a duty of the Christian life, 3037-3039, 1642, 3947.
4. Its beauty, 3040.
5. Its transforming power, 3041.
6. Should be continuous, 3042.
7. Its hindrances, 3043-3045.
8. Mistakes concerning it :—
 - (1.) It is not necessarily an immediate effect of conversion, 3046.
 - (2.) It will not be experienced or continued unless the conditions of joy are fulfilled, 3047, 3048.
 - (3.) Like all other feelings, it is not unintermittent, 3049, 3050.
 - (4.) Perfect joy is not to be expected on earth, 3051.
9. Christian joy is heaven begun, 3052, 3053.

JUDGMENT. THE DAY OF

1. Its terrors, 3054.
2. Its disclosures, 3055.
3. Our motives will determine our destiny, 3056.
4. The law by which we shall be judged, 3057.
5. Its present moral influence, 3058, 3059.
6. Why men are indifferent with regard to it, 3060.
7. Not the less certain because unexpected, 3061.
8. Importance of preparation for it, 3062-3066.

KNOWLEDGE.

1. SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS :—

1. Is founded in faith, 3067.
2. The desire of knowledge :—
 - (1.) Is natural, 3068.
 - (2.) Is insatiable, 3069, 3070.
3. How it may be best acquired, 3071-3073, 1747.
4. If too easily gained, is soon lost, 3074.
5. How it is to be valued, 3075-3078.

6. Should be the object of life-long pursuit, 3079, 3080.
7. Is continually enlarging, 3081.
8. Yet at the best is very limited, 3082, 1508-1513.
9. "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing," 3083-3085.

10. Why it should be sought, 3086, 3087.
11. An important caution for those engaged in its pursuit, 3089.
12. It makes men humble, 3090.

II. RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE :—

1. In what it consists, 3091, 3092.
2. Is not naturally desired by men, 3093.
3. How it is to be acquired :—
 - (1.) By diligent study, 3094.
 - (2.) By systematic and orderly study, 3095.
 - (3.) By giving our closest and most constant attention to the most important truths, 3096.
4. Should be ever increasing, 3097-3102.
5. Should be reduced to practice, 3103-3111.
6. Divorced from experience and practice is worthless, 3112-3124.
7. Its present imperfection, 3125, 3126.
8. Its future perfectness, 3127, 3128.
9. The sources of knowledge will never be exhausted, 3129.

III. THE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD :—

1. Its importance, 3130-3136.
2. Its insufficiency, 3137.
3. Its delightfulness, 3138, 3139.
4. Should be progressive, 3140.
5. Is impossible to the inconstant, 3141.
6. Its humbling effects, 3142.

IV. SAVING KNOWLEDGE :—

1. Its nature, 3143-3147.
2. Can be imparted to us only by the Spirit of God, 3148.
3. Its blessedness, 3149-3152.
4. By whom it is possessed, 3153, 3154.
5. How its possession is to be proved, 3155.

LAW.

I. THE EXTENT AND BLESSEDNESS OF HER SWAY, 3156, 3157.

II. HUMAN LAWS :—

1. Their foundations, 3158.
2. Are needful for the weak and wicked, 3159-3161, 3216.
3. Are not the standard of righteousness, 3162.
4. How they are to be estimated, 3163, 3164.
5. Should not be too minute and restrictive, 3165, 3166.
6. Should be carried into effect, 3167.
7. "Going to law," 3168, 3169.

III. THE LAWS OF NATURE. [See MIRACLES, 3526-3562.]

1. Some of their characteristics :—

- (1.) They are enduring, 3170.
- (2.) They are inexorable and indiscriminating, 3171.
- (3.) They are irresistible, 3172.
2. They are merely modes of Divine operation, 3173-3176.
3. Their regularity is a reason for thanks giving, 3177.
4. Their relation to Providence, 3178.
5. Their relation to prayer, 3179-3182, 3751, 3752, 3757.
6. Their relation to human activity, 3183.

IV. THE MORAL LAW :—

1. Is the only standard of righteousness, 3184.
 2. The loftiness of its standard, 3185.
 3. Why so high a standard is set before us, 3186.
 4. Its sacredness, 3187.
 5. Is inexorable, 3188.
 6. Is binding even on fallen man, 3189, 3190.
 7. In what sense it is "the occasion of sin," 3191, 2630.
 8. Its ministration of condemnation, 3192-3195.
 9. Is terrible only to transgressors, 3196, 3197.
 10. In what sense it is a restraint, 3198.
 11. Has its source in love, 3200, 3201.
 12. Is not burdensome to those who love God, 3202.
 13. Insufficiency of its work :—
 - (1.) It reveals true bliss, but does not enable us to attain it, 3203.
 - (2.) It reveals sin, but does not save the sinner, 3204, 3205.
 - (3.) It terrifies and deters, but does not renew, 3206-3209.
 - (4.) The reason of its inability to sanctify us, 3210.
- V. THE MOSAIC LAW :—
1. Its benevolence, 3211-3213.
 2. Its suitableness for its season, 3214.
 3. A preparation for Christianity, 3215.
 4. Compared with Christianity, 3216.

LIFE. HUMAN

1. Its emblems :—
 - (1.) A voyage, 3217, 1689, 3264, 3272.
 - (2.) A pilgrimage, 3218, 3219, 1688.
 - (3.) A drama, 3220, 3271.
 - (4.) A rainbow, 3221.
2. Its limitations, 3222.
3. Is divinely ordered, 3223-3226.
4. Importance of starting well, 3227.
5. Should not be dissipated in the pursuit of trifles, 3228-3231, 4928.
6. Should be devoted to great purposes according to a settled plan, 3232-3239.
7. The importance of having and maintaining an ideal standard of excellence, 3240-3243.
8. How nobility of life is to be attained, 3244-3251, 4160.
9. "Seeing life," 3252-3255.
10. The love of life, 3256.
11. Long life :—
 - (1.) The blessing of the godly, 3257.
 - (2.) Is to the ungodly merely a reprieve, 3258.
12. How its length is to be estimated, 3259-3262.
13. Its brevity, 3263-3268.
14. Its vanity, 3269, 3270.
15. Its uncertainty and transitoriness, 3271-3274, 2928.
16. Its close, 3275-3277.
17. Its relation to eternity, 3278-3287, 219.
18. Reviewed, 3288-3290.
19. The after-revelation of its results, 3291-3293.

LORD'S SUPPER. THE

1. Various estimated by Christian men, 3294.
2. Its design, 3295-3297.
3. Its symbolism, 3298-3303.

4. In what sense the elements are sacred, 3304.
5. The benefits of a believing reception of it, 3305-3308.
6. Not to be neglected, 3309-3311, 3462.
7. Who are to partake of it, 3312-3315.
8. We should prepare ourselves to receive it, 3316, 3317.
9. The sin of not discerning the Lord's body, 3318.
10. Why so many derive so little profit from its observance, 3319-3322.

LOVE.

- I. ITS SOURCE, 3323.
- II. ITS EXCELLENCE :—
 1. It is the life of the soul and of the moral universe, 3324, 3325.
 2. It is the bond that unites all holy intelligences, 3326, 1199-1202.
 3. It is the supreme grace, 3327, 3328.
 4. Its production is the end of Christ's mission and of all religious ordinances and exercises, 3329, 3330.
 5. It renders all our services acceptable, 3331, 3332, 3818.
 6. Its excellence is manifest in its influence on the heart and life :—
 - (1.) It casts out fear, 3333.
 - (2.) It expels whatever is inconsistent with itself, 3334.
 - (3.) It kindles aspirations after holiness, 3335.
 - (4.) It makes obedience easy, 3336-3341, 3517.
 - (5.) It inspires self-sacrifice, 3342.
 - (6.) It makes the soul beautiful, 3343-3346.

III. CHARACTERISTICS OF TRUE LOVE :—

1. It is practical, 3347.
2. It embraces God and man, 3348, 3349.

IV. THE LOVE OF GOD, 3350, 2318-2327.

V. THE LOVE OF CHRIST. [See also 946-950.]

1. Transcends ours, 3351.
2. Is the most powerful of motives, 3352, 1159, 3642.
3. Its conquering power, 3353-3356.

VI. LOVE TO GOD :—

1. God must be loved for His own sake, 3357.
2. How it is to be kindled in the soul, 3358-3362, 4113.
3. It is capable of being cultivated, 3363.
4. Leads to trust in God, 3364.
5. A test of its reality, 3365, 4188-4190.
6. Comfort for those who lament that it is feeble in them, 3366.

VII. LOVE TO CHRIST, 3367-3369, 965, 1003, 1004, 3909, 3920.

VIII. LOVE TO THE BRETHREN :—

1. Is the badge of Christ's disciples, 3370.
2. Our love must be like Christ's, 3371.
3. We must love what is Christ-like in them, 3372.
4. We must love them on account of what they are to be, 3373.

MAN.

1. The Darwinian hypothesis as to his origin, 3374, 3375.
2. Is more than an animal, 3376, 3377.
3. The grandeur and complexity of his nature, 3378-3383, 4815-4819.

4. Was made in the image of God, 3384.
5. His original perfection, 3385.
6. His fall :—
 - (1.) Its evidences, 3386, 3387.
 - (2.) Its effects, 3388.
 - (3.) The Scripture account of it vindicated, 3389.
7. His nature depraved, 3390-3397, 2669-2679, 2685, 4552-4558.
8. The conflicts of his nature, 3398.
9. His moral blindness, 3399.
10. His need of a Divine redemption, 3400, 1401, 2368.
11. His vanity, 3401.
12. His dependence on God, 3402.
13. An object of Divine care, 3403.
14. His liberty restricted, 3404.
15. His greatness: in what it consists, 3405, 3406.
16. Is immortal, 3407-3415, 2176, 3278-3287, 4649-4667.
17. His future, 3416, 3417.
18. The unity of the human race, 3418-3420.
19. The future of the human race, 3421-3423.

MEANS OF GRACE.

1. Their necessity, 3424, 3425.
2. Are only means, 3426, 4107, 4108.
3. For what purpose they are to be used, 3427, 3428, 3330.
4. In what spirit we are to avail ourselves of them, 3429, 3430.
5. The folly of Pharasaism, 3431.
6. Are not in themselves saving, 3432-3437.
7. Yet they are not to be neglected, 3438-3442.
8. On the contrary, they are to be diligently used :—
 - (1.) That we may thereby show our love to God, 3443.
 - (2.) Because God has appointed them, 3444-3448, 1785-1792, 4205, 5054.
 - (3.) Because it is by them we have communion with Christ, 3449, 3450, 5077.
 - (4.) Because we need them, 3451-3455.
 - (5.) That we may be in the way of blessing, 3456, 3457, 5076.
 - (6.) Notwithstanding that to some they are not a blessing, 3458.
 - (7.) Notwithstanding that they may not be immediately a blessing to ourselves, 3459.
9. The danger of neglecting them, 3460.
10. The guilt of despising them, 3461, 3462.
11. Are all to be esteemed and used, 3463, 3464, 2503.
12. Why the power to delight in them is sometimes withheld, 3465.

MEDITATION.

- I. WHAT IT IS, 3466, 3467.
- II. IS PRACTISED BY ALL WHO LOVE GOD, 3468, 3469.
- III. ITS USEFULNESS :—
 1. It prepares us to receive and retain the Word of God, 3470-3473, 2661-2665, 5083-5085.
 2. It makes divine truth effectual to our salvation, 3474-3479.
 3. It renders good impressions lasting, 3480.
 4. It gives clearness and fulness to our views of truth, 3481, 3482.

5. It makes God's Word delightful to us, 3483, 3484.
6. It delivers us from vain thoughts, 3485-3487.
7. It quickens our affections, 3488-3491.
8. It promotes spiritual health, 3492.
9. It strengthens the spiritual vision, 3493.
10. It enriches the understanding, 3494.
11. It nourishes the soul, 3495, 3496.
12. It gives depth to the character, 3497.
13. It promotes spiritual fruitfulness, 3498.
14. It brings comfort to the soul, 3499-3501.
15. It keeps hope active, 3502.
16. It brings God near, 3503, 3840-3843.
17. Its advantages must be experienced to be known, 3504.
- IV. IS A DUTY FOR EVERY DAY, 3505, 3506.
- V. HOW IT IS TO BE CONDUCTED :—
 1. We must be alone with God, 3507.
 2. We must leave behind all vain and worldly thoughts, 3508.
 3. We must select single truths for special consideration, 3509, 3510.
 4. We must select practical topics for consideration, 3511.
 5. We must not be in too great haste to bring our meditation to a close, 3512-3514.
 6. Neither must it be unduly prolonged, 3515.
- VI. ITS DIFFICULTIES :—
 1. Are merely initial, 3516, 3517.
 2. Yield to persistent effort, 3518, 3519.
 3. Are not to deter us from it, 3520.
- VII. ITS PROPER RESULTS :—
 1. Prayer, 3521.
 2. Practice, 3522-3525.

MIRACLES. [See LAW : LAWS OF NATURE, 3170-3183.]

1. Defined, 3526.
2. Are not incredible, 3527, 3528.
3. Reasonableness of our confidence that the New Testament Miracles were really wrought, 3529.
4. Their relation to natural law :—
 - (1.) They are not distinguished from the effects of natural law in being works of God, 3530.
 - (2.) They are not contraventions of natural law, 3531-3534.
 - (3.) Supernatural uses of natural laws are neither inconceivable nor rare, 3535-3538.
5. Their design, 3539-3543.
6. Under what conditions they are authoritative, 3544, 3545.
7. Their significance should be pondered, 3546, 3547.
8. Their cessation, 3548-3551.
9. Folly of the demand that miracles should be repeated, 3552-3555.
10. Are not the most wonderful works of God, 3556-3562.

MORALISTS.

- I. Their excellences :—
 - (1.) To what they are due, 3563.
 - (2.) Are superficial, 3564.
 - (3.) Are incomplete, 3565, 3566.
2. Their lack of the one thing needful, 3567-3570.

3. Their acts are vitiated by their principles, 3571-3575.
4. The difficulty of their task, 3576-3579.
5. Their weakness in temptation, 3580.
6. Repentance towards God their first duty, 3581.
7. Their need of salvation, 3582-3589.
8. Are often further from salvation than the profane, 3590-3593.

MORALITY.

- I. The distinction between morality and religion, 3594, 4141.
2. Is a field-flower, 3595.
3. Is not to be despised, 3596.
4. Yet it is insufficient, 3597-3605, 2823, 2824, 2826, 4449, 4450.
5. It is at best a preparation for something better, 3606.
6. It is good for this world only, 3607.

OBEDIENCE.

- I. ITS IRKSOMENESS, 3608.
- II. ITS NECESSITY, 3609.
- III. ITS REASONABLENESS, 3610.
- IV. ITS WISDOM, 3611.
- V. THE TEST OF SINCERITY AND LOVE, 3612-3614.
- VI. IS A GRADUAL ATTAINMENT, 3615.
- VII. CHARACTERISTICS OF TRUE AND ACCEPTABLE OBEDIENCE :—
1. Accordance with the will of God, 3616, 3617.
2. It is all-comprehensive, 3618-3626, 4091, 4467.
3. It is unquestioning, 3627-3630.
4. It is prompt, 3631.
5. It is exact, 3632.
6. It is cheerful, 3633-3639.
7. It is fervent, 3640.
8. It is sincere, 3641.
9. It is prompted by love to God, 3642.
10. It aims at the glory of God, 3643.
11. It is constant, 3644.
- VIII. ITS REWARDS :—
1. Peace of conscience, 3645, 3646.
2. Comfort in death, 3647.

PATIENCE.

- I. NATURE OF TRUE PATIENCE :—
1. It is neither ignorant nor apathetic, 3648, 3649.
2. It is not stubborn, 3650.
3. It is not ostentatious, 3651.
- II. ITS EXCELLENCE, 3652-3656.
- III. ITS NECESSITY, 3657-3662.
- IV. ENCOURAGEMENTS TO ITS EXERCISE :—
1. Under provocation, 3663, 3957.
2. Under persecutions :—
- (1.) Impatience will but aggravate our misery, 3664.
- (2.) Persecution affords an opportunity for the display of our Christian graces, 3665.
- (3.) It befalls us only by God's permission, and for our good, 3666.
- (4.) God will bring us triumphantly out of it, 3667.
- (5.) The hour of deliverance is at hand, 3668.

3. Under the apparent delays of Providence, 3669.
4. Under affliction :—
- (1.) Impatience will only increase and prolong our misery, 3670-3673, 149.
- (2.) Affliction is inevitable in this life, 3674, 151.
- (3.) Afflictions are the chastisements of a loving Father, 3675, 3676, 148, 150.
- (4.) God watches over His people in their trials, 3677.
- (5.) The purpose of our affliction is to restore us to spiritual health, 3678-3684.
- (6.) We are under the care of a Physician who is "too wise to err, and too good to be unkind," 3685-3691.
- (7.) Affliction is a vocation whereby God honours us, and in which we may glorify Him, 3692-3695, 2554.
- (8.) The issue of all afflictions is good to the people of God, 3696-3702, 152, 153, 154.
- (9.) All temporal sorrows are but "light afflictions," in comparison with the evils from which they deliver us, and the glories for which they prepare us, 3703, 3704.
- (10.) Afflictions endure but "for a moment," 3705, 3706.

V. ITS POWER :—

1. Exemplified in Job, 3707.
 2. Exemplified in our Lord, 3708.
- VI. MUST HAVE ITS PERFECT WORK, 3709-3713.

PRAYER.

- I. ITS NATURE, 3714.
- II. IS THE NATURAL EXPRESSION OF NEED, 3715-3719.
- III. IS A RESOURCE AVAILABLE FOR ALL GOD'S PEOPLE IN ALL THE EMERGENCIES OF LIFE, 3720-3724, 4939, 5066, 5067.
- IV. IS INDISPENSABLE TO THE CHRISTIAN LIFE :—
1. To its existence, 3725.
2. To its sustenance, 3726-3728.
- V. IS A TEST OF CHARACTER :—
1. In regard to the objects for which men pray, 3729.
2. In regard to the temper in which men pray, 3730, 3731.
3. In the regularity with which men pray, 3732, 3733.
4. In regard to the period during which men pray, 3734.
- VI. WHAT PROFIT SHOULD WE HAVE, IF WE PRAY UNTO HIM?—
1. The protection of God's providence will be extended to us, 3735.
2. The promises of God's Word will be fulfilled to us, 3736, 3737.
3. We shall be reminded of our dependence on God, 3738.
4. The burden of our soul will be relieved by the very act of prayer, 3739, 3740.
5. We shall be calmed in, and strengthened for, life's conflicts, 3741.
6. Our character will be ennobled, 3742, 3743.
7. Our souls will be enriched, 3744, 3745.
8. We shall be prepared for heaven, 3746.
- VII. THE METAPHYSICS OF PRAYER :—

2. The secret of its usefulness and power, 3747, 3748.
 3. It is not rendered unnecessary by God's faithfulness to His promises, 3749.
 3. It is not rendered unnecessary by God's unchangeableness, 3750-3753, 2225, 2226.
 4. In view of the experience and testimony of God's people, speculative objections against prayer are futile and absurd, 3754, 3755.
- VIII. ITS RANGE :—
1. Nothing is too little to be made a subject of prayer, 3756.
 2. We may pray for secular blessings, 3757.
 3. Yet there are limitations to its range, such as :—
 - (1.) The real good of the suppliant, 3758.
 - (2.) God's appointments respecting the future life, 3759.
 4. These limitations are wisely and mercifully ordained, 3760, 3554.
 5. These limitations should be reverently respected by us, 3761, 3845.
- IX. IS A DUTY BINDING ON ALL MEN, 3762.
- X. IS A PRIVILEGE, 3763, 3764.
- XI. KINDS OF PRAYER :—
1. Ejaculatory prayer.
 - (1.) Its power, 3765.
 - (2.) Is even more essential than stated prayer, 3766-3768.
 - (3.) Is always practicable, 3769-3773.
 2. Secret prayer, 3774-3777, 2863, 2993, 3435, 3436, 3468, 3469.
 3. Intercessory prayer, 3778, 5078.
 4. Family prayer, 3779-3781.
- XII. MODES OF PRAYER :—
1. Mechanical prayers, 3782.
 2. Extempore prayers, 3783, 3784.
 3. Written prayers :—
 - (1.) Are lawful, 3785, 3786.
 - (2.) To many are necessary, 3787, 3788.
 - (3.) Efforts should be made to outgrow the need of them, 3789.
 - (4.) Are often felt to be inadequate, 3790-3792.
 4. The mode is non-essential, the spirit is all in all, 3793.
- XIII. HINTS AS TO THE CONDUCT OF PRAYER :—
1. Close the eyes, 3794.
 2. Calm the mind, 3795.
 3. Be more careful about the spirit than the order of prayer, 3796.
 4. Be natural, 3797.
 5. Be reverend, 3798, 3799.
 6. Be simple, 3800.
 7. Be thoughtful and deliberate, 3801.
 8. Be specific, 3802, 3843.
 9. Be importunate, 3803.
 10. Be short, 3804-3809.
 11. Let it be in, continue, and end in humble dependence on the merits of Christ, 3810.
- XIV. CHARACTERISTICS OF ACCEPTABLE PRAYER :—
1. It is spontaneous, 3811.
 2. It is simple and sincere, 3812-3816.
 3. It is joyful, 3817, 3818.
 4. It is adoring, 3819.
 5. It is thankful, 3820.
 6. It is thoughtful, 3821, 3822.
 7. It is submissive, 3823, 157, 2984.

8. It is trustful, 3824-3826.
 9. It is believing, 3827-3830.
 10. It is fervent, 3831-3838, 4763.
 11. It is persevering, 3839.
- XV. PRE-REQUISITES TO ACCEPTABLE PRAYER :—
1. Meditation, 3840-3843, 3521.
 2. Familiarity with the promises, 3844, 3845.
 3. Penitence, 3846.
 4. Divine assistance, 3847-3849, 2883, 2886.
- XVI. PROPER SEQUENCES TO PRAYER :—
1. Effort, 3850-3854.
 2. Self-examination, 3855.
 3. Watchfulness, 3856, 3857, 2972, 4903, 4906-4910.
- XVII. HINDRANCES TO PRAYER :—
1. Indulgence in sin, 3858.
 2. Guilt on the conscience, 3859.
 3. Dimness of spiritual perception, 3860.
 4. Inordinate cares and affections, 3861-3863.
 5. Wandering thoughts, 3864, 3865.
- XVIII. IS TO BE CONTINUALLY MAINTAINED :—
1. Even when a devotional spirit is lacking, 3866.
 2. Because continual prayer keeps us in the love of God, 3867.
 3. Because continual prayer is necessary to our stability, 3868, 3869.
 4. Because it promotes our growth in grace, 3870, 3871.
 5. The fitness and importance of daily prayer, 3872-3876, 2697, 2701, 4199.
 6. Because of the baseness of seeking God in adversity only, 3877-3879.
- XIX. ENCOURAGEMENT FOR RESPONDING SUPPLIANTS, 3880-3882.
- XX. ANSWERS TO PRAYER :—
1. How numerous they are, 3883.
 2. Every true prayer is certain to be answered, 3884-3886.
 3. Should be diligently looked for, 3887-3892.
 4. Should be perseveringly sought, 3893.
 5. Are to be patiently waited for, 3894.
 6. Are frequently delayed, 3895, 3896.
 7. Why God sometimes delays to answer prayer, 3897, 3898.
 8. Why some prayers are not answered, 3899.
 9. Recorded answers to prayer, 3900-3902, 801.

PROFESSION.

1. IS A DUTY ABSOLUTELY BINDING ON ALL BELIEVERS :—

1. Because of their past relations to God, 3903.
2. Because of their present relations to God, 3904-3906.
3. Because of their obligations to Christ, 3907.
4. Because of the needs of their fellow-men, 3908, 3909.
5. No personal considerations should be allowed to deter us from it, 3910, 3911, 2374.

II. HOW IT IS TO BE MADE :—

1. Humbly, 3912.
2. Seriously, 3913.
3. Resolutely, 3914-3921.

III. WHAT IS DEMANDED IN THOSE WHO MAKE IT :—

1. Sincerity, 3922-3924.
2. Christian practice :—
 - (1.) Without this we demonstrate that our profession is false, 3925-3930.
 - (2.) With it this we bring dishonour upon religion, 3931, 3932.
 - (3.) Without this we nullify our testimony for Christ, 3933.
 - (4.) Without this we turn our very profession into a means of evil, 3934-3937.

IV. HOW ITS REALITY IS TO BE TESTED :—

1. Negative tests :—
 - (1.) Not by fluency of speech, 3938, 3939.
 - (2.) Not by outward show, 3940-3942, 3468, 3469, 4105.
 - (3.) Not by regularity of attendance at public worship, 3943.
 - (4.) Not by the blossom, but by the fruit, 3944.
2. Positive tests :—
 - (1.) Spiritual life, 3945, 3946.
 - (2.) Love to God, 3947.
 - (3.) Longings after holiness, 3948.
 - (4.) Real conflict with evil, 3949-3951.
 - (5.) Purity of heart, 3952, 3953.
 - (6.) Consistency of conduct, 3954-3956, 4191-4194.
 - (7.) Patience under provocation, 3957.
 - (8.) Steadfastness under persecution, 3958-3960.
 - (9.) Diligence in well-doing, 3961-3964.
 - (10.) Persistence, 3966-3976.

PROSPERITY. [See ADVERSITY, 16-30; WORLD, THE, 4967-4995.]

1. Is not necessarily a proof of the Divine favour, 3977-3980, 189-196, 4932, 4933.
2. Renders it difficult for us to assure ourselves that we have the friendship of men, 3981.
3. Is a test of character, 3982, 3983.
4. Is not a thing to be desired by every man, 3984-3986, 1063, 5059, 5060.
5. Is not the same thing as happiness, 3987-3989.
6. How little it profits us, 3990.
7. Its insecurity, 3991.
8. Exposes us to envy and hatred, 3992, 3993.
9. Should cause us to be especially watchful, 3994-3996.
10. Is spiritually perilous :—
 - (1.) It enfeebles the soul, 3997.
 - (2.) It draws off the soul from God, 3998, 3999.
 - (3.) It causes men to forget God, 4000, 4001.
 - (4.) It makes men forgetful of death, 4002.
 - (5.) It destroys watchfulness, 4003, 159.
 - (6.) It exposes us to temptation, 4004-4007.
 - (7.) It fosters the passions, 4008-4010.
 - (8.) It promotes pride, 4011, 4012, 26.
 - (9.) It increases selfishness, 4013.
 - (10.) It unfits men for trial, 4014, 27.

PROVIDENCE.

1. IS ALL-EMBRACING :—

1. It regards the acts and governs the course of every individual, 4015-4018, 2246-2248, 2325-2327, 3223-3226, 3403, 3404.

2. It controls all the events of our everyday life, 4019-4022.
3. The comprehensiveness of providence is a natural and inevitable result of the omnipresence of God, 4023.
4. Results of the comprehensiveness of God's providence :—
 - (1.) There are no disconnected events, 4024, 4025, 1720.
 - (2.) Great revolutions are effected silently and with apparent suddenness, 4026.
 - (3.) The purposes of the wicked are frustrated, 4027.
 - (4.) All things are overruled for good to them that love God, 4028.
 - (5.) Perfect order shall at length reign in the moral universe, 4029, 4030.

II. ITS MYSTERIES :—

1. Many so-called inscrutable providences are really scrutable, 4031.
2. They are never real :—
 - (1.) They are due to the medium through which we view God's proceedings, 4032.
 - (2.) They are due to the limitedness of our view, 4033, 4034, 1720.
 - (3.) They are due to the fact that the providences we criticise are incomplete, 4035.
 - (4.) They are due to our ignorance and immaturity, 4036, 4037.
3. Must be judged by us reverently, 4038, 4039.
4. Must be acquiesced in believingly, 4040, 4041.
5. The point from which they are to be solved, 4042.
6. Their solution must be awaited patiently, 4043-4048.

III. TRUST IN PROVIDENCE :—

1. Is always to be exercised :—
 - (1.) Even in the greatest straits of life, 4049, 2372, 2373.
 - (2.) Even when God's providences run counter to our ideas and expectations, 4050, 4051, 114, 186, 3364.
 - (3.) Even when God's providences seem to run counter to His promises, 4052, 4053, 3669.
2. Reasons for exercising it :—
 - (1.) Because distrust grieves the Divine Spirit, 4054.
 - (2.) Because all things are in God's hands, 4055.
 - (3.) Because nothing can take Him by surprise, 4056.
 - (4.) The Lord raiseth the soul of His servants, and none of them that trust in Him shall be desolate, 4057, 4058.
3. It is not to be allowed to degenerate :—
 - (1.) Either into an indolent fatalism, 4059, 4060.
 - (2.) Or into a rash presumption, 4061, 4062.

REGENERATION.

1. IN WHAT IT CONSISTS :—

1. The difficulty of defining it, 4063.
2. Not in the destruction or removal of any of our natural qualities or characteristics, 4064, 4065.
3. Not in the impartation of any new faculties, 4066.

4. Not in the addition of anything to what we already possess, 4067.
5. Not in the calling forth of good latent within us, 4068.
6. Not in any merely outward reformation of character or conduct, 4069-4071.
7. But in the impartation of new life to the soul, 4072.
8. In a change of heart, 4073-4076.
9. In the impartation of a new impulse and direction to the moral nature, 4077, 4078.
10. In our moral renewal in the image of God, 4079.
- II. WHY IT IS NECESSARY :—
 1. To render us acceptable in the sight of God, 4080, 4081, 3565.
 2. Because without it no spiritual blessing can be obtained, 4082, 4083.
 3. To heal the disease of sin, 4084, 4085.
 4. To destroy the love of sin in the soul, 4086-4088.
 5. To eradicate pride and self-sufficiency, 4089.
 6. To enable us to derive profit from religious ordinances, 4090.
 7. To enable us to live for the glory of God, 4091.
 8. To enable us to live a holy life, 4092-4095, 3567.
 9. To make us like Christ, 4096.
 10. To ensure a durable profession, 4097.
 11. To qualify us for heaven, 4098-4102, 3568.
 12. Because there can be no substitute for it, 4103-4105.
- III. ITS AUTHOR, 4106-4113, 3148.
- IV. ITS EVIDENCES :—
 1. If it has taken place, there are sure to be evidences of it, 4114, 4115, 2808.
 2. Purification of the thoughts of the heart, 4116.
 3. Hatred of sin, 4117, 4118.
 4. Holiness of life, 4119, 4120.
 5. Likeness to Christ, 4121.
 6. Ease and delight in the performance of duty, 4122, 4123.
 7. Wisdom in the use of the laws, 4124.
- V. SHOULD BE SOUGHT EARLY, 4125, 4126.
- VI. IN WHAT SENSE IT IS INSTANTANEOUS, 4127, 4128.
- RELIGION.
 - I. IS A NECESSITY OF THE SOUL, 4129, 4130.
 - II. TRUE RELIGION—IN WHAT IT CONSISTS :—
 1. Not in outward observances, 4131-4135.
 2. Not in fluent speech concerning sacred things, 4136.
 3. Not in unpractical meditations on spiritual things, 4137-4139.
 4. Not in a confident assurance of our personal safety, 4140.
 5. Not in a mere prudential morality, 4141.
 6. Not merely in the performance of acts of benevolence, 4142.
 7. But in a right government of the soul, 4143-4145.
 8. In doing secular work from sacred motives, 4146, 4147.
 9. In a faithful discharge of our duties towards both God and man, 4148, 4149.

10. Ia likeness to God, 4150-4154.
11. In communion with God, 4155.
- III. ITS REASONABLENESS, 4156-4158.
- IV. ITS VALUE :—
 1. Cannot well be overstated, 4159.
 2. Is manifest in the dignity it gives to our life, 4160.
 3. Is manifest in its influence on individual happiness, 4161-4163.
 4. Is manifest in its influence on the national welfare, 4164-4166.
- V. ITS DIFFICULTIES :—
 1. Are often exaggerated, 4167.
 2. Yet they are not to be concealed, 4168.
 3. Neither are they to be made unduly prominent, 4169.
 4. They are not exceptional, 4170.
 5. They are transient, 4171.
 6. How they are to be overcome, 4172, 4173.
- VI. ITS PLEASANTNESS, 4174-4176.
- VII. HOW THE WORLD JUDGES OF IT, 4177.
- VIII. ITS RELATION TO OUR DAILY LIFE :—
 1. It is to pervade and glorify our whole life, 4178-4187, 1158, 3168-3626, 5043.
 2. Yet it is not to engross all our thoughts, 4188-4190.
 3. It is to be exemplified and perfected in daily life, 4191-4194, 2860.
 4. The trials and temptations of daily life may be made helpful to it, 4195.
 5. It is not to be divorced from business, 4196-4198.
 6. It is not incompatible with business, 4199.
 7. Its function is to sanctify and ennoble business, 4200-4202.
- IX. IS OF UNIVERSAL OBLIGATION, 4203.
- X. ITS GROWTH IN THE SOUL :—
 1. Its feeble beginnings are not to be despised, 4204.
 2. The means by which it is fostered are not to be neglected, 4205.

REPENTANCE.

- I. ITS NATURE, 4206-4209.
- II. ITS NECESSITY :—
 1. To secure us against the judgments of God, 4210.
 2. To our restoration to His favour, 4211, 4212.
 3. To our reaching heaven, 4213.
- III. ITS POWER :—
 1. It prevails with God, 4214, 4215.
 2. It continues to the very end of life, 4216-4218, 4258.
 3. The folly of "turning the grace of God into lasciviousness," 4219-4224.
- IV. IT IS NEITHER EXPIATORY NOR MERITORIOUS, 4225-4228.
- V. HOW IT IS PRODUCED, 4229-4231, 1397-1407.
- VI. MUST NOT BE DELAYED. [See also 1438-1461.]
 1. Because delay is foolish, 4232-4236, 4923, 4938.
 2. Because delay is dangerous, 4237-4240, 4587, 4588.
 3. Because delay multiplies difficulties, 4241-4246.
 4. Because delay is itself a grievous sin, and a sign that really we intend never to repent, 4247, 4248.

5. Because repentance is a divine gift, 4249, 4250.
6. Because repentance is a task too difficult to be accomplished in the hour of death, 4251, 4252.
7. Because "death-bed repentances" are always to be suspected, 4253-4255.
8. Because a "death-bed repentance" may be inefficacious, 4256.
9. The case of the penitent thief affords no argument for delay, 4257, 4258.

VII. HOW ITS GENUINENESS IS TO BE TESTED.
[See also 1430-1437.]

1. Not by intensity of suffering, 4259-4263, 1416-1418.
2. But by its comprehensiveness and definiteness, 4264-4266, 3832.
3. By its continuousness, 4267, 4268.
4. By its leading to amendment of life, 4269-4272.
5. By its leading to watchfulness against sin, 4273.

REPROOF.

I. A CHRISTIAN DUTY, 4274-4277.

II. THINGS THAT HINDER MANY FROM PERFORMING IT :—

1. Fear of presuming, 4278.
2. Fear of offending our friends, 4279.
3. A consciousness of personal imperfections, 4280.

III. DEMANDS RECTITUDE IN THE REPROVER, 4281-4286, 967.

IV. HOW IT IS TO BE ADMINISTERED :—

1. Seasonably, 4287-4290.
2. Privately, 4291-4293.
3. Discreetly :—
 - (1.) With due regard to the social position of the offender, 4294.
 - (2.) With due regard to the disposition of the offender, 4295, 4296.
 - (3.) With due regard to the faults of the offender, 4297, 272.
 - (4.) With frank acknowledgment of the excellences of the offender, 4298-4300.
 - (5.) So as not to discourage, 4301.
 - (6.) The importance of reproving discreetly, 4302-4304.
4. Faithfully and seriously, 4305-4308.
5. With evident reluctance, 4309, 4310.
6. Affectionately, 4311-4317.

V. THE MANNER IN WHICH IT IS RECEIVED IS A TEST OF CHARACTER, 4318-4320.

VI. HOW IT IS TO BE RECEIVED :—

1. With self-distrust, 4321.
2. Meekly, 4322-4328, 2099.
3. Thankfully, 4329-4333.

RESURRECTION.

1. The moral reasonableness of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, 4334.
2. "With what body do they come?" 4335-4338.
3. Is less inexplicable than the creation of the body, 339.
4. Analogies in nature and art, 4340-4346.
5. A necessary caution as to the use of the foregoing illustrations, 4347.
6. Replies to objections, 4348-4352.
7. Its diverse issues, 4353.
8. Easter-Sunday, 4354.

RICHERS. [See PROSPERITY, 3977-4014; THE WORLD, 4967-5065.]

1. Riches and virtue are not incompatible, 4355, 4356.
2. Are in themselves desirable, 4357.
3. Yet they are not to be too earnestly desired, 4358-4365.
4. Insatiability of the desire for them, 4366. [See also AVARICE, 400-422.]
5. Are not to be too ardently loved, 4367-4369.
6. Are loved by many who flatter themselves that they are free from avarice, 4370.
7. Reasons why they are sought, 4371.
8. Do not of themselves make us honourable, 4372-4376.
9. Do not necessarily secure happiness, 4377-4380.
10. Render it difficult for us to discern our friends, 4381.
11. How little they can do for us, 4382-4386.
12. Expose us to the envy and hostility of our fellow-men, 4387, 4388.
13. Are perilous to the soul, 4389-4397.
14. Often debase the character, 4398, 4399.
15. The vanity of heaping up riches, 4400-4402.
16. Their uncertainty, 4403-4406, 4979.
17. Must soon be relinquished, 4407-4411.
18. For what purpose they are entrusted to us, 4412, 4413.
19. Are useless to many, 4414.
20. How they are to be used, 4415-4421.
21. Are worthless without godliness, 4422.

SELF-EXAMINATION.

I. ITS RARITY, 4423.

II. WHY IT IS NECESSARY :—

1. Because we are naturally averse to it, 4424.
2. That we may know if we are in the right way, 4425.
3. That we may ascertain if our graces are real and our hopes well founded, 4426-4428.
4. That we may ascertain the hindrances to our reception of grace, 4429.
5. That we may be saved from spiritual bankruptcy, 4430, 4431.
6. That we may spare ourselves after-regrets, 4432, 4758.
7. Because our hearts are so apt to deceive us, 4433, 4434.
8. Because there are so many unsuspected influences that tend to cause us to go astray, 4435.
9. Because the tendency of evil is to increase, 4436-4439.

III. SHOULD BE MADE FREQUENTLY :—

1. Yearly, 4440.
2. Daily, 4441-4445.

IV. HOW THIS DUTY IS TO BE PERFORMED :—

1. The inquiry must be comprehensive, 4446-4450.
2. It must be particular and searching :—
 - (1.) Taking note of our imperfections as well as of our sins, 4451.
 - (2.) Taking note of the things from which we seek comfort in distress, 4452.
 - (3.) Taking note especially of the motives and principles by which we are actuated, 4453, 4454.
 - (4.) Because only thus can the exercise be made a reality, 4455.

(5.) Because there may be a form of godliness without the power, 4556, 4457.

(6.) Because one habitual fault may vitiate the whole life, 4458.

(7.) Because only thus can our sincerity be proved, 4459.

3. It must extend to the outward life, 4460, 4461.

4. It must be made with Scriptural intelligence, 4462, 2525.

5. The right standard must be employed, 4463-4466.

V. MISTAKES TO BE GUARDED AGAINST :—

1. Judgments are not to be founded on merely transient emotions, 4467, 2525.

2. It must not be forgotten that self-examination is only a means to an end, 4468, 4469.

3. It must not be conducted so as to become morbid and hurtful, 4470-4474.

4. The disparity between our desires after holiness and our actual attainments is not to drive us to despair, 4475.

SIN.

I. A UNIVERSAL CONSCIOUSNESS, 4476.

II. THE EVIL OF SIN, 4477.

III. IS HATEFUL TO GOD :—

1. As a defiance of His authority, 4478, 4479.

2. As an infraction of the moral order of the universe, 4480.

3. Yet it does not necessarily cause Him to hate the sinner, 4481.

IV. IS HURTFUL TO MAN :—

1. It hopelessly enslaves him, 4482-4484, 2714, 2798.

2. It pollutes and corrupts the soul, 4485-4487, 4625, 4626.

3. It forfeits all our claims upon God as our Creator, 4488, 4489.

4. It is the source of all temporal evil, 4490.

V. ITS DECEITFULNESS, 4491-4495.

VI. ITS FOOLY, 4496, 4219-4224.

VII. REASONS FOR SHUNNING IT :—

1. Because when it has once ensnared us, escape from it is impossible, 4497-4499.

2. Because when it has once ensnared us, the very desire to escape may be lost, 4500, 4501.

3. Because, even if we escape from it, some of its effects are eternal, 4502, 4503, 4209, 4225, 4288.

VIII. ONE SIN :—

1. Is a transgression of the whole law, 4504-4506, 3187.

2. Makes way for more, 4507-4509.

3. Proves the whole bent of the heart and life to be sinful, 4510.

4. Is a proof that the Sun of Righteousness is not yet risen upon us, 4511.

5. Is sufficient to ruin the soul, 4512, 2330, 3187, 4583-4586.

IX. LITTLE SINS :—

1. Lead to greater, 4513-4518.

2. Are most numerous, 4519, 4520.

3. Are most dangerous, 4521-4525, 429, 2705, 4720-4725, 4897, 4898.

4. Destroy, 4526-4532.

5. Lead to hell, 4533.

X. CUSTOM IN SINNING :—

1. Increasingly strengthens all sinful habits and dispositions, 4534-4537, 4245, 4246.

2. Sears the conscience, 4538.

3. Renders men insensible to saving influences, 4539, 4540.

XI. PRESUMPTUOUS SINS :—

1. Destroy assurance, 4541.

2. Destroy the moral sense, 4542.

3. Tend to increase, 4543.

4. Greatly provoke God to anger, 4544.

5. Call for profound repentance, 4545.

XII. SECRET SINS, 4546-4549.

XIII. BESETTING SINS, 4550, 4551.

XIV. ORIGINAL SIN :—

1. Is an indisputable fact, 4552, 4553.

2. Is implied in the mission and teaching of Christ, 4554.

3. Cleaves to us till death, 4555.

4. Necessitates continual watchfulness, 4556.

5. It deserveth God's wrath and damnation, 4557.

6. Yet it does not exclude children from covenant mercies, 4558.

XV. SINS OF OMISSION, 4559-4561.

XVI. SINS OF THE PAST, 4562, 4887, 4899.

XVII. SIN IN BELIEVERS :—

1. Is especially conspicuous, 4563.

2. Is exceeding sinful, 4564.

3. Is especially injurious to others, 4565.

4. Brings dishonour on the Gospel, 4566, 4567.

5. Dishonours God, 4568.

6. Dishonours Christ, 4569.

7. Is specially hateful in the sight of God, 4570.

8. A man may sin, and yet be a child of God, 4571-4573.

9. Is but momentary, 4574.

10. Afterwards makes them more watchful, 4575.

11. The fact that God overrules the sins of His people for good should not render us the less watchful against sin, 4576.

12. Should inspire the ungodly with apprehension, 4577.

XVIII. SHOULD BE INSTANTLY AND UTTERLY FORSAKEN :—

1. Because sin in all its forms is the ruin of the soul, 4578-4581.

2. Because one sin leads to another, 4582.

3. Because even one sin is enough to enslave and destroy the soul, 4583-4586.

4. Because our next sin may bring down on us the vengeance we have long deserved, 4587, 4588.

5. Because sin was the cause of Christ's death, 4589, 1590.

6. Because God hates it, 4591, 2296-2301.

7. Because sin in all its forms and degrees is hateful, 4592-4595, 4117, 4118.

8. Because the consequences of sin are so far-reaching, 4596.

9. It must be renounced in the heart as well as in the outward life, 4597-4602, 3209, 4085-4088.

XIX. ITS PUNISHMENT :—

1. Is certain, 4603-4610, 2296-3301, 3055, 3250, 4724.

2. Whatever a man soweth, that shall he also reap, 4611-4614.

XX. CONVICTION OF SIN, 4613, 4614.

SOUL. THE

1. Its mysteriousness, 4615.
2. Invisible yet real, 4616-4618.
3. Its powers, 4619.
4. Is in most men incompletely developed, 4620-4622.
5. Is developed by the cares of life, 4623.
6. Should be carefully guarded from injury, 4624.
7. Is degraded and ruined by sin, 4625, 4626.
8. Its true portion, 4627-4630.
9. Its preciousness, 4631-4633.
10. Its salvation should be the first business of life, 4634.
11. Its loss, 4635-4637.
12. Its relations to the body :—
 - (1.) Their diverse tendencies, 4638, 4639.
 - (2.) The soul should have the pre-eminence, 4640.
 - (3.) The folly of caring more for the body than the soul, 4641-4645.
 - (4.) The loss of the soul carries with it the loss of the body, 4646, 4647.
 - (5.) As the body and soul are partners in sin, so shall they be also in suffering, 4648.
13. Its immortality :—
 - (1.) A world-wide conviction, 4649, 4650.
 - (2.) Influence of the hope of immortality, 4651, 4652.
 - (3.) Is not incredible, 4653, 3407-3411, 3413, 3414.
 - (4.) The soul is not destroyed by its separation from the body, 4654-4657, 3412.
 - (5.) The soul contains within itself prophecies of immortality, 4658-4663.
 - (6.) The condition of the soul in the future life, 4664.
 - (7.) The developments it renders possible, 4665, 3414.
 - (8.) Is an error, a delightful error, 4666.
 - (9.) How faith in the soul's immortality should manifest itself, 4667.

TEMPTATION.

I. WHY IT IS PERMITTED :—

1. That our hearts may be revealed to us, 4668.
2. That our characters may be tested, 4669, 4670, 2676, 2684-2687.
3. That our vigilance may be increased, 4671.
4. That our assurance may be strengthened, 4672.

II. HOW IT ASSAILS US :—

1. Under false masks, 4673-4676.
2. In many forms, 4677, 4678.
3. In forms specially adapted to our weakness, 4679-4683, 1665, 1669-1672.
4. From opposite quarters, 4684.

III. IN WHAT ITS STRENGTH LIES, 4685-4690.

IV. REASONS FOR SHUNNING IT :—

1. Because our safety lies in avoiding it, 4691-4700, 3252.
2. Because exposure to it is perilous, 4701-4708, 3253-3255.
3. Because we are unable to resist it, 4709-4714.
4. Because to expose ourselves to it is to tempt God to leave us, 4715, 3857.

5. Because prevention is better than cure, 4716.
6. Because if we expose ourselves to it, and are overcome by it, we are without excuse, 4717, 4273.

V. THINGS THAT EXPOSE US TO TEMPTATION :—

1. Idleness, 4718.
2. Self-confidence, 4719.

VI. SMALL TEMPTATIONS :—

1. Are most numerous, 4720.
2. Are most dangerous, 4721-4725, 429, 3802.
3. Are sufficient to overthrow most of us, 4726.

VII. ITS RELATION TO MORAL RESPONSIBILITY :—

1. Is no excuse for sin, 4727-4729.
2. Even this invalid plea of "temptation" is often falsely urged, 4730.

VIII. HOW IT IS TO BE RESISTED :—

1. Promptly, 4731-4736, 1844-1847, 2704, 2705, 4482, 4497, 4500, 4501.
2. Unhesitatingly, 4737, 4738.
3. Uncompromisingly, 4739-4746.
4. Hopefully, 4747.

IX. HOW IT IS TO BE OVERCOME :—

1. By being forearmed, 4748-4751.
2. By turning our attention to other subjects, 4752.
3. By considering whether we are able to bear the burden of sin, 4753.
4. By regarding its ultimate issues, 4754-4757.
5. By self-examination, 4758.
6. By humility, 4759.
7. By instant recourse to the throne of grace, 4760-4762.
8. By fervent prayer, 4763.
9. By exercising faith in God, 4764, 4765.
10. By quenching it in the blood of Christ, 4766.

X. CONSOLATIONS FOR THE TEMPTED :—

1. Temptation is not sin, 4767.
2. Temptations are specially experienced by God's children, 4768-4776.
3. Temptation is not necessarily hurtful, 4777-4779.
4. Temptation develops and displays the spiritual excellences of God's people, 4780-4788.
5. God sympathises with His tempted people, 4789, 4790.
6. God succours His tempted people, 4791-4794.
7. Temptations are of short duration, 4795.
8. Temptations promote God's glory, 4796-4800.

XI. DUTIES OF THE TEMPTED :—

1. They are not to permit temptation to cause them to doubt their sonship, 4801-4803.
2. More earnest prayer, 4804.
3. Confidence in the sufficiency of the divine grace, 4805.

XII. DELIVERANCE FROM TEMPTATION :—

1. Is an undeserved mercy, 4806.

XIII. IMMUNITY FROM TEMPTATION :—

1. How it is to be secured :—
 - (1.) By filling the heart with thoughts of the love of Christ, 4807.
 - (2.) By growth in grace, 4808.

TRINITY. THE

1. An object of faith, 4809, 4810.

2. Is incomprehensible by us, 4811, 4812.
3. Yet it is not incredible, 4813, 4814. [See also §§ 851, 852, 2229, 2241.]
4. The difficulty of defining "Unity," 4815.
5. Various attempts to illustrate the mystery of the Trinity, 4816-4821.

TRUTH.

- I. Its characteristics :—
 - (1) It is simple, 4822.
 - (2) It is harmonious, 4823.
 - (3) It is self-manifesting, 4824.
 - (4) It appeals to the understanding, 4825.
 - (5) It is always and everywhere the same, 4826.
 - (6) It is infinite, 4827.
 - (7) It is invincible and immortal, 4828-4832, 1375, 1376.
2. Its relation to goodness, 4833-4836.
3. Its relation to the human mind :—
 - (1) The mind craves for it, 4837.
 - (2) Yet it is often unpopular, 4838-4840.
 - (3) It is difficult to fix it on the mind, 4841.
4. Its importance :—
 - (1) All truth is important, 4842, 4843.
 - (2) Yet all truths are not all equal in value, 4844.
 - (3) Some truths are vital, 4845.
 - (4) The most important truths are within the reach of all, 4846.
 - (5) Seemingly slight departures from truth are not slight evils, 4847, 4848.
5. Controversies concerning truth :—
 - (1) Are not to be entered upon rashly, 4849.
 - (2) Are not to deter us from the service of God, 4850, 4851.
 - (3) Are no excuse for an irreligious life, 4852.
6. How it is to be sought :—
 - (1) Diligently, 4853, 3481-3484.
 - (2) Sincerely, 4854.
 - (3) Impartially, 4855.
 - (4) Prayerfully, 4856.
 - (5) Courageously, 4857.
 - (6) Perseveringly, 4858, 4859.
7. Must be personally applied, 4860-4863.
8. When once attained, is never to be surrendered :—
 - (1) Not even when its advocates prove inconsistent and unworthy, 4864-4866.
 - (2) Not even when it is assailed by doubt, 4867, 4868.
 - (3) Not even when its evidences are for a time obscured, 4869-4870.
 - (4) Not even when our reasons for holding it are disproved, 4871.
9. Importance of a comprehensive and methodical study of truth, 4872-4874.
10. Its gradual development, 4875.
11. New truths are to be welcomed, 4876-4878, 1390.

WATCHFULNESS.

- I. EXPLAINED. 4879.
- II. WHY WATCHFULNESS IS NECESSARY :—
 1. Because our enemy is always awake, 4880, 2695.
 2. Because no man is free from temptation, 4881, 4882, 2701, 4470, 4473.
 3. Because we are never safe from temptation, 4883, 4884, 3709, 4750.

4. Because the path of duty is so narrow, 4885.
5. Because of the difficulty of the Christian's task, 4886.
6. Because of the tendency of the heart to recur to its old sins, 4887, 2701, 4556.
7. Because one hour of heedlessness may be the ruin of the soul, 4888-4890, 4499.
- III. OUR VIGILANCE MUST BE COMPREHENSIVE, 4891-4894.
- IV. THINGS AGAINST WHICH WE NEED TO BE SPECIALLY WATCHFUL :—
 1. Our senses, 4895.
 2. Our weak places, 4896.
 3. Little sins, 4897-4898, 4513-4533.
 4. Our old sins, 4899.
 5. Beloved and besetting sins, 4900, 4500, 4501, 4537.
 6. New sins, 4901.
- V. TIMES WHEN WATCHFULNESS IS SPECIALLY NECESSARY, 4902-4905.
- VI. MUST BE CONJOINED WITH PRAYER, 4906-4910, 3856.
- VII. ITS ADVANTAGES, 4911, 4912.
- VIII. WATCHFULNESS AND HAPPINESS ARE NOT INCOMPATIBLE, 4913.
- IX. A CAUTION, 4914.

WICKED. THE

- I. THEIR GUILT :—
 1. They are practical atheists, 4915.
 2. Their moral nature is corrupt, 4916.
 3. They cleave to the world as their chief good, 4917.
 4. They reject Christ and His salvation, 4918.
- II. THEIR FOLLY :—
 1. In neglecting the great calling of their life, 4919.
 2. In sacrificing eternity to time, 4920, 4921.
 3. In provoking God to anger, 4922.
 4. In deferring repentance, 4923.
 5. In despising God's threatenings, 4924.
 6. In thoughtlessly following the multitude who do evil, 4925.
 7. In their heedlessness of the plainest warnings, 4926, 4927.
 8. In wasting upon trifles the time that should be used in securing the salvation of the soul, 4928.
 9. In using that time to prepare for themselves future misery, 4929, 2807, 4491, 4496.
 10. In shrinking from hell but not from sin, 4930.
 11. In glorying in their prosperity, 4931.
 12. In mistaking their prosperity as an evidence of the Divine favour, 4932, 4933, 4943, 4948.
 13. In expecting at last to be admitted to heaven, 4934, 2730.
- III. THEIR MISERY :—
 1. They are ignorant of the Author of their being, the purpose of their existence, and the source of true joy ; and are thus pitiable as moral idiots, 4935, 4936.
 2. They are morally short-sighted, 4937.
 3. They are excluded from the Divine promises, and exposed to the Divine wrath, 4938.
 4. Their happiness is short-lived, and is full of drawbacks while it lasts, 4939-4942.
 5. Their happiness is short-lived, and is as - evidence of God's abhorrence of them, 4943-4948.

- 6. Their consciences are seared, 4949.
- 7. Even to Divine influences they are insensible, 4950-4953.
- 8. They are led captive by the devil at his will, 4954.
- 9. They carry with them the elements of misery, 4955.
- 10. There awaits them a terrible hour when they will be undeceived as to their true state, 4956, 4957.
- 11. Their destruction is sure, 4958-4960.
- 12. Hence their temporal prosperity is not to lead us to envy them, 4961-4966, 190-196.

WORLD. THE

I. ITS HONOURS AND PLEASURES. [See RICHES, 4355-4422.]

- 1. We can call very few of them really our own, 4967, 4968.
- 2. They are unsatisfying, 4969-4974.
- 3. They are transitory, 4975-4989, 3036.
- 4. How the Christian estimates them, 4990-4993.
- 5. When they become hurtful to us, 4994, 4495.

II. ITS DELUSIVENESS :—

- 1. It is solid and valuable only in its outward appearance, 4996, 4997.
- 2. It shows its best side to us at the beginning, 4998, 4999.
- 3. It promises more than it can perform, 5000.
- 4. It lures us on with false hopes, 5001.
- 5. It will not bear exposure to the light, 5002.
- 6. It deludes that it may degrade and destroy, 5003.
- 7. How we are to treat it, 5004.
- 8. The folly of those who are ensnared by it, 5005.

III. ITS PURSUIT BY THE UNGODLY :—

- 1. Their earnestness in its pursuit, 5006, 5007.
- 2. Their folly in its pursuit, 5008-5018.
- 3. Their sinfulness in its pursuit, 5019, 5020.
- 4. In the end it will profit them nothing, 5021, 5022.
- 5. How it will seem to them in the hour of death, 5023-5025.

IV. THE CHRISTIAN AND THE WORLD :—

- 1. While in the world, he is not to be of it, 5026-5032.
- 2. In what Christian nonconformity to the world consists :—
 - (1.) Not in going out of the world, 5033.
 - (2.) Not in cultivating singularities of dress or manners, but in making the will of Christ the rule of our life, 5034.
 - (3.) In abstaining from unnecessary intercourse with the men of the world, 5035-5037.
 - (4.) In setting before us as the ends of life the attainment of eternal blessedness, the promotion of the Divine glory, and the advancement of the welfare of our fellow-men, and in abstaining from those pursuits and pleasures that are inconsistent therewith, 5038-5040.

- (5.) In keeping the affections disengaged from the world, 5041-5043, 35-38.

3. Why he is not to set his affections on things below :—

- (1.) Because the wealth and the honours of the world are not essential either to our dignity or happiness, 5044.
- (2.) Because their comparative unimportance is shown by the fact that they are bestowed on the good and on the bad indiscriminately, 5045-5047.
- (3.) Because they will not bear close and intelligent examination, 5048.
- (4.) Because they are perilous to the soul, 5049-5059.
- (5.) Because they can be serviceable to us only for a very little while, 5060.
- (6.) Because if we do so we shall risk their continuance, and shall certainly destroy our spiritual peace, 5061.
- (7.) Because God has already bestowed on us a nobler portion, 5062.
- (8.) Because we have assured hope of a better inheritance, 5063, 5064.
- (9.) Because we thus dishonour God Himself, 5065.

WORSHIP. PUBLIC

1. Characteristics of acceptable worship :—

- (1.) It is offered by men who love and serve God, 5066, 5067.
- (2.) It must be intelligent, 5068.
- (3.) It must be sincere and spiritual, 5069, 5070.
- (4.) It must be conducted with reverence, 5071-5074, 3798, 3799.

2. Reasons for maintaining and observing it :—

- (1.) It is peculiarly acceptable to God, 5075.
- (2.) It is one of the chief channels of communication between our souls and God, 5076, 5077, 3867.
- (3.) It quickens the devotional feelings, 5078, 3866.
- (4.) It develops and ennobles the intellectual and moral powers, 5079, 3868-3871.
- (5.) It affords opportunity for intercessory prayer, 5080.
- (6.) It lays the foundation for heavenly friendships, 5081.

3. How often ought we to attend public worship ? 5082.

4. Preparation should be made for it, 5083-5085.

5. While we are engaged in it, our thoughts must be kept under control, 5086, 5087.

6. Common sins in public worship, 5088-5091.

7. By what rule the material accompaniments of worship are to be judged, 5092.

8. Necessity of a suitable building, 5093, 5094.

SUPPLEMENTARY INDEX OF SUBJECTS.

- ABUSE in Argument, 301.
Accidents. There are no, 4024.
Actions: how they are to be estimated, 814.
Adam and Eve, 4712.
 „ his transgressions, 3389.
Admonition. See Reproof, 4274-4333.
Adoption, its signs, 327-334, 2213.
Adoration, its reasonableness, 3819.
Adversity, 16-30.
 „ not necessarily a sign of God's displeasure, 189-196.
Advice is disregarded by the young, 4714.
 „ is easily given, 55.
Affections. The, 31-46.
 „ how they are quickened, 3488-3491.
 „ Mistakes concerning the, 4188-4190.
Affliction, 47-234.
 „ a season when we specially need the help of the Holy Spirit, 2876.
 „ its result: prayerfulness, 3719.
 „ Ministry of hope in, 2913-2921.
 „ shows us our friends, 2152-2159.
Afflictions are outnumbered by mercies, 2307.
 „ how they are to be overcome, 2771-73.
 „ their design: to punish iniquity, 2293.
Agnosticism, unscientific, 366.
Allegories, 15.
Almsgiving. See Beneficence, 444-463.
Ambition, 237-251.
 „ a hindrance to usefulness, 2967.
Analogies: must not be pushed too far, 389.
Angels, 252-260.
Anger, 261-286.
 „ God's, 2288, 2294.
 „ is murder in the germ, 4582.
Anxiety: its folly, 2372, 2373.
 „ its hurtfulness, 2053, 2075, 2058.
 „ its sinfulness, 4054-4056.
Apostasy. See Backsliders and Backsliding, 423-29.
Apostles. The, 287-293.
Appearances are deceptive, 1680, 3000-3005.
Appropriating faith, 1952.
Architecture. Church, 5093, 5094.
Arguments, 294-303.
 „ need to be understood, 4873.
Artificial piety, 3945, 3946.
Assurance, 304-352.
 „ is compatible with temptation, 4801.
 „ is destroyed by presumptuous sins, 4541.
 „ is frequently strengthened by temptation, 4672.
 „ is not identical with faith, 2005.
 „ is not in itself enough, 4140.
 „ its soundness should be tested, 2931, 2932.
 „ reason for cherishing it: growth in grace, 2483-2488.
 „ should be well founded, 4426-4428, 4433, 4434, 4462-4466.
Astronomical objections to Christianity, 397, 398.
Atheism, 353-373.
 „ its folly, 4015, 4016, 4158.
 „ is natural to the human heart, 804.
 „ Practical, 2672, 4915.
 „ Secret, 3207.
Atomic Theory. The, 354, 356-358.
Atonement. The, 374-399.
Austerity, a blemish, 2108.
Avarice, 400-422.
 „ makes men reckless, 1555.
 „ its enslaving power, 4917.
BACKSLIDERS, 423-426.
Backsliding, 427-429.
 „ its causes, 4097, 4393, 4394.
 „ how it is to be avoided, 4430, 4431, 4436, 4439.
Bad habits: how they are acquired, 4515-4525.
Beauty, 430-437.
Beginnings. Right: their importance, 3227.
 „ Small, are not to be despised, 1696.
Belief, 438-443.
Believers. Sin in, 4563.
Beneficence, 444-464.
 „ is true service to Christ, 965.
 „ should be disinterested, 962.
Benevolence, 465-467.
 „ is not the whole of religion, 4142.
Bereavement, 468-477.
 „ its uses, 2739.
Besetting sins, 4550, 4551.
Bible. The, 478-646.
 „ Commentaries on, 4177.
 „ how it is to be read: courageously, 4857.
 „ „ „ diligently, 4853.
 „ „ „ impartially, 4855.
 „ „ „ prayerfully, 4856.
 „ „ „ perseveringly, 4858, 4859.
 „ „ „ sincerely, 4854.
 „ „ „ with personal application of its truths, 4860-4863.
 „ Its descriptions of heaven, 2714-2717, 2719.
 „ Its revelations are necessarily imperfect, 2715, 2716.
 „ its spiritual teaching, 3155.
Blessings are often overlooked or forgotten, 1685, 1686.
Boasting, 1987.
Body. The, 647-654.
 „ an essential part of human nature, 844.
 „ Resurrection of the, 4334-4354.
Body and Soul. The, 651-654.
Books, 655-686.
 „ how soon they perish, 501.
Business customs, 3937.
 „ is not to be allowed to engross the whole of our time, 5054.
 „ Religion and, 4196-4202.
 „ Sharp practice in, 4525.

- CALLOUSNESS is not patience, 3649.
Calmness in argument, 300.
Calvinistic and Arminian Controversy. The, 1390.
Care haunts the wicked, 2294.
Cares : how are we to escape from them, 2778.
 " of life : their beneficial influence, 4623.
 " Worldly : hostile to the spiritual life, 3861, 5053.
 " " their folly, 5014.
 " " their profitlessness, 5008.
Careless. The, 687-705.
Carnal mind. The, 2677, 2678.
Ceremonies to be fixed by the Church, 1189.
 " See also Forms and Ceremonies, 2077-92.
Chance. Creation by, 353-359.
Character, 704-722.
 " disclosed by death, 1551-1553, 1557.
 " how far it is influenced by education, 1769, 1771, 1774.
 " how it is to be ennobled, 3742, 3745.
 " Influence of circumstances on, 3563.
 " is perfected by adversity and affliction, 21, 212, 215.
 " is tested by adversity, 3982, 3983.
 " Christian, 723-748.
 " " Germs of, 3056.
 " " how depth is to be given to it, 3497.
 " " in heaven, 2740-2743.
 " " is slowly developed, 3291-93.
 " " is tested by temptation, 2684-2687, 4699, 4670.
 " " its influence, 1090.
 " " its ultimate triumph, 2454.
 " " will be brought up to the Divine idea of perfectness, 215.
Charity. See Benevolence and Benevolence, 444-467.
Cheerfulness, 749-762.
Childhood, 763-765.
Children, 766-834.
Christ, 835-985.
 " brought life and immortality to light, 3415.
 " His death, 1651.
 " His incarnation the distinctive doctrine of Christianity, 1137.
 " His love : its conquering power, 3352, 3353, 3356.
 " " its constraining power, 3578.
 " " transcends ours, 3351.
 " His meekness, 960.
 " His miracles, 3527, 3529, 3539, 3541, 3543, 3547.
 " His satisfaction for sin, 1140.
 " His sympathy for children, 765.
 " our High Priest, 379.
 " our surety, 392.
 " Rejection of, 2678, 2808, 2809, 2811.
 " the Rock of Ages, 1967.
 " the Sacrifice for sinners, 2321.
 " the Way, 1986.
 " the wisdom of His appeals to His disciples, 4168.
Christian. The, 986-1119.
 " his afflictions, 3674, 3699.
 " his communion with God, 4155, 4162, 4146, 4149, 4178.
 " his confidence in prayer, 3824-3826.
 " his duty to the Church and the world, 4137-4139.
 " his example, 3934-3937.
 " his failures, 2524, 2529.
Christian. The, his hatred of sin, 4117, 4118.
 " his relation to the world, 5026-5030.
 " his sins, 1648, 4563-4577.
 " his supreme motive, 3642.
 " how the world will judge of him 2397.
 " Infirmities of, 2313.
 " is a temple of God, 2902.
 " longs for heaven, 2780-2787.
 " reasonableness of his confidence in Christ, 2908.
 " the wisdom of his choice, 4156-4158, 4178.
Christian experience, 1141.
 " graces, 2972.
 " life, 4771, 4775.
 " service, 966.
 " workers, 1093, 1094, 2200, 2945, 2948, 2966, 2967, 3713.
Christianity, 1120-1169.
 " can only be known experimentally, 2881-2886.
 " contrasted with heathenism, 959.
 " its ennobling influence, 1084, 4160.
 " its evidences, 3529, 3555, 4869, 4871.
 " how its truth is to be tested, 2019.
 " in what sense it rejects good works, 2396, 2414.
 " is incomprehensible by unspiritual men, 1087.
 " is not incredible, 393-398, 2249.
 " its power, 2446.
 " its relation to the Mosaic law, 3215, 3216.
 " Real and nominal, 1121.
 " True, 4183.
 " why it is hated, 369.
 " why some reject it, 2274.
Church. The, 1170-1251.
 " its membership, 3314, 3315.
 " Joining. See Profession, 3903-76.
Comfort, 1252-1285.
 " for Christian workers, 3713.
 " for desponding suppliants, 3880-3882.
 " for the lowly, 4018.
 " is often foolishly desired, 2610-2613.
 " is the portion of the sincere, 3010, 3015.
 " for those oppressed by a sense of sinfulness, 329.
 " for the tempted, 4767-4800.
 " how it may be increased, 2014-2017.
 " how some lose it, 3460, 3461.
 " Worldly, 4973, 4975, 4984, 4987.
Commandments. God's : are not grievous, 3202, 4173.
 " " have their source in love, 3200, 3201, 3611.
 " " their mercifulness, 3198, 3199.
 " The ten : the centre of the Mosaic law, 3216.
Commentaries, 4177.
Communion with God, 221, 3507, 3508, 2863, 4155, 4162, 4178.
Communism. Christian, 1240.
Companionship. Evil, 2114, 2123-2148, 4693, 4700.
Comparisons : need to be made with caution, 389.
Conceit is an evidence of ignorance, 2970.
Conduct : how it may be regulated, 3567-3570.
 " is not an infallible test of character, 1432.
 " the best evidence of character, 800.

Confession : essential to forgiveness, 1146.
 " is the first condition of peace, 4724.
 " its wisdom, 4614.
 Confession of Christ, 1042, 3903-3976.
 Conflicts of the Christian life, 1059-1062.
 Consideration : its importance, 2668.
 " See Meditation, 3466-3525.
 Conscience, 1286-1347.
 " how it is destroyed, 4920, 4538, 4542.
 " how it is hardened, 1527.
 " how it troubles the wicked, 4941.
 " its awaking, 4724.
 " its terrors, 4605, 4607.
 " scared, 4949.
 " terrors of a guilty, 2292.
 Consistency of conduct, 3954-3956.
 Consolations for the Christian life, 1063-1071.
 " for discouraged hearers, 2628-2637.
 " See also Comfort, 1252-1285.
 Constancy. See Perseverance.
 Constitutional peculiarities, 704-708.
 Contentment, 1348-1366.
 " cannot come from earthly things, 4629.
 " is better than ecstasy, 2073.
 Controversies, 1367-1391.
 " are no excuse for an irreligious life, 4852.
 " are not to be entered upon rashly, 4849.
 " are not to deter us from the service of God, 4850, 4851.
 " Ecclesiastical, 1220-1223, 1225-1227.
 " their true end, 3104.
 Conversation. Religious, 802.
 Conversion, 1392-1395.
 " a cause of joy among the Angels, 259, 260.
 " how it is to be effected, 2668.
 " is not necessarily followed by great joy, 3046.
 " its importance, 4633, 4644.
 " its reality is not to be taken for granted, 4457.
 " Story of a, 1732.
 Conviction, 1472-1490.
 " described, 2028.
 " Legal and evangelical, 3207, 3209.
 " of sin, 4613, 4614.
 " should not be resisted, 4636.
 Courage. Christian, 205, 4058.
 Courtesy : its influence on character, 336.
 Covetousness of Judas, 4492, 4495.
 " See Avarice, 400-422.
 Creation. The, 1491-1507.
 Criticism : doubtfulness of its results, 524.
 Culture. Selfish, 2206.
 Curiosity, 1508-1518.
 " is natural, 3068.
 " its usefulness, 791.
 Curious questions. Answers to, 2718, 2794.
 Custom, 1519-1533.
 DAILY duties : fidelity to, 3236, 3241, 3244-3251.
 " the tests of character, 742.
 Daily mercies, 3177.
 Damnation : how easily it is incurred, 2793.
 Dancing, 4537.
 Danger. Critical times of, 4904.
 Darwinian hypothesis. The, 3374, 3375.
 Day of Judgment, 3054-3066.
 Death, 1534-1643.
 " of children, 829.

Death. Early, 829-833.
 " Happiness in, 1076, 1109-1111, 1133, 4163.
 " in regard to the Christian, 477, 2569.
 " of the learned, 3281.
 " will not alarm those who are prepared for it, 3277.
 Death-bed repentances, 4216-4218, 4251-4258.
 Decorum, 5089.
 Defeat is not to be deplored, 4832.
 Denominational exclusiveness, 1177, 1201, 1221, 1224.
 Depravity of the human heart, 2669-2679.
 Desertion, 1644-1659.
 Design. The argument from, 353-360, 3752.
 Desires. Forbidden, 4707.
 " their influence on character, 1842, 1847.
 Desponding. Comfort for the, 2513-2516, 2527.
 Destiny : how is it determined, 3056, 3571.
 Development theory. The, 2506.
 Devil. The, 1660-1679.
 Difficulties lie at the outset of every enterprise, 3517, 3519.
 Diligence in well doing, 3691-3694.
 Discipline. Church, 1231, 1232.
 " of children, 812-815.
 Discontent, 1680-1720.
 " how it is to be cured, 139.
 " its unreasonableness, 2327.
 Discussions. Momentous, 4737, 4738.
 " Profitless, 1785-1792.
 Disinterestedness exemplified in Christ, 962.
 Disposition, 704, 722.
 Dissensions, 1218-1230.
 Distance : its effect on the mind, 3060.
 Doctrine. Errors in, 4847, 4848.
 " its importance, 4833, 4836, 4842, 4843.
 " See Truth, 4822-4878.
 Doctrinal knowledge is in itself worthless, 3091.
 Doing good, 1721-1746.
 " should be the business of our life, 3289.
 " the path to true honour, 2208.
 Doubt should not lead to infidelity, 4867, 4868.
 Dress. Singularities of, 5034.
 Drunkenness grows upon men gradually, 4498.
 Duty. Delight in, 2556, 2557, 4122.
 " Exact performance of, 2555.
 " Narrowness of the path of, 4885.
 EARNESTNESS essential to spiritual excellence, 2505-2507.
 " how it expresses itself, 4136.
 Earth. The : its place in the universe, 252.
 " its ultimate destiny, 979.
 Education, 1747-1775.
 " limits of its power, 4077, 4084.
 " its power, 806.
 Ejaculatory prayer, 3765-3773.
 Election, 1776-1802.
 Eloquence is helped by knowledge, 3073.
 " is powerless to save men, 1397, 1405.
 Emotion is itself of little value, 3347.
 Emotions : how they are to be produced, 3558, 3363.
 Encouragement for Christian workers, 1723-1727.
 " for the desponding, 1656, 1657, 1605.
 " its power, 823.
 Envy is excited by prosperity, 4387, 4388.
 " follows the prosperous, 3992, 3993.
 " the penalty of greatness, 246.
 Errors, 1803-1828.
 " are often only isolated truths, 4874.
 Estimates. False, 3014.

Eternal punishment, 2180-2192.
 Evidences of Christianity, 1143-1150, 1169.
 Evil spirits. See The Devil, 1660-1679.
 Evil thoughts, 1829-1849.
 Examination. See Self-examination, 4423, 4475.
 Example, 1850-1872.
 " is not to be followed indiscriminately, 4925.
 " limits of its power, 4084.
 " of Christ, 894-902, 1062, 1871, 1872, 2499, 2502, 2849-2851, 3289, 4461.
 " only the highest should be set before us, 4463.
 " its power, 777-779, 2123, 2126, 2130, 2140, 2145, 3935-3937.
 Excellence : how it is to be attained, 3239.
 Excellences. Moral : are all derived from God, 2375.
 Excuses. False, 4727-4730.
 Experience : how little it benefits others, 810.
 " value of its testimony, 3754, 3755.
 Extempore prayer, 3783, 3784.
 FAILURE is not to drive us to despair, 3243.
 Faith, 1873-2018.
 " a constant rule of life, 1873, 2173-2175.
 " and practice, their mutual influence, 1142, 1157, 1873.
 " Appropriating, 572, 972.
 " Examples of, 1275.
 " honoured and rewarded, 4057, 4058.
 " how God honours it, 3890, 3892, 3900, 3902.
 " in Providence, 4015-4069.
 " is endangered by too much thinking, 1516.
 " is strengthened by affliction, 122, 123.
 " is the foundation of knowledge, 3067.
 " its relation to good works, 2398-2409.
 " must be personally exercised, 2430.
 " must be reposed in God alone, 4764.
 " why it is essential to salvation, 3093.
 Fall. The, 3389.
 Family prayer, 3779-3781, 3788.
 Famines, their cause, 4031.
 Fashion. A life of, 3230.
 Faults : how they are to be overcome, 2560.
 Fault-finding : its commonness, 4425.
 Fear, 2043-2063.
 " Faith and, 2025-2029.
 " its place in Divine worship, 5083, 5086.
 Feeling, 2064-2076.
 " is in itself worthless, 953.
 " is not the whole of religion, 4144.
 " should not be allowed to expend itself in words, 2410.
 " untrustworthy as a test and guide, 1262-1265, 1271, 1279, 1281.
 " when strong is often silent, 4136.
 Foreknowledge. God's, 2263-2266.
 Forms and Ceremonies, 2079-2092.
 " zeal concerning, 2990, 2991.
 Fortunes may be curses, 809.
 Freedom. Man's : is limited, 3404.
 Friend. The ever-faithful, 964, 2170.
 Friends. False, 23.
 Friendship, 2093-2172.
 " its duties, 4274-4277, 4310.
 Fruitfulness : how it is promoted, 3498.
 " not always apparent in the sincere, 344.
 Future rewards and punishments, 2173-2192.
 " their present influence, 3058-3060.

GEOLOGY and Scripture, 505.
 Ghost : meaning of the word, 1639.
 Gifts, 2193-2219.
 Giving : how God gives, 2304.
 God, 2220-2390.
 " always present with His people, 198, 202.
 " His commandments, 3611, 3616, 3619.
 " His faithfulness to His promises, 3749.
 " His foreknowledge, 179, 1791.
 " His glory is to be our constant aim, 3573, 4188, 5030.
 " His love for sinners, 390, 3350.
 " the source of all other love, 3323.
 " His mercy : its abundance, 1257.
 " His promises, 1258, 4052, 4053.
 " His providence, 4015.
 " His sympathy with us, 954, 955, 3756, 3757.
 " His sympathy with the tempted, 4789, 4794.
 " His severity, 2316, 2317.
 " His threatenings, 4924.
 " how we are to glorify Him, 3613, 3616, 3619.
 " the Comforter, 202.
 " the Hearer and Answerer of prayers, 3720, 4049.
 " the great First Cause, 3173-3176.
 Godliness. True, 465.
 " See Holiness, 2813-2866.
 Godly sorrow. See Repentance, 4206-4273.
 Goodness and severity not incompatible, 2316, 2317.
 " and truth, 4833, 4836.
 Good works, 2391-2414.
 " in what sense they are ours, 1972.
 Gospel. The, 2415-2451.
 " can be appreciated only by the spiritually minded, 2586, 2587.
 " its power, 4229-4231.
 " rejected, 443.
 Grace is not to be abused, 351.
 " its conquering power, 1066.
 Grace. Growth in, 2473-2569.
 " how it is to be measured, 1435-37.
 " is promoted by prayer, 3870-3876.
 " is to be attained by daily dependence on Christ, 2852, 2853.
 " its evidences, humility, 2974, 1263-1265.
 " its feeble beginnings are not to be despised, 4204.
 Graces. Christian : how they are to be developed, 2316.
 Graces. Struggling, 2316.
 Great men : their friendship is not to be courted, 2138.
 Greatness. Worldly, 239-248, 4967-4995.
 Grief is short-lived, 216.
 Guilt drives us from God, 3859.
 HABIT is the result of custom, 1519.
 Habits : defined, 4182.
 Habits. Bad : are easily formed, 3253.
 " how they are strengthened, 4497, 4498, 4534-4539.
 " how they are to be avoided, 4441.
 " their effect, 4539, 4540.
 Happiness does not depend on outward things, 3987, 3989, 5044.
 " how it is to be attained, 1736-1743.
 " is impossible without holiness, 2828, 2835, 2833.
 " is not secured by wealth, 1348, 2294, 4377-4380.

Happiness is not to be found in earthly things, 4972, 5028.
 " is seldom found, 2386.
 " on what it depends, 1351, 1358.
 " the Christian's portion, 1080-1084.
 " uncertainty of all that the world can offer, 4978, 4983, 4984.
Hatred differs from anger, 262-264.
Health: its maintenance a Christian duty, 650, 654.
 " promoted by cheerfulness, 755.
 " should not be sacrificed in excessive study, 3089.
 " Spiritual, 3492.
Heaven, 2570-2637.
Hearing, 2638-2668.
 " should lead to holiness of life, 3188.
Heart, 2669-2712.
 " if it is pure, the life will be pure, 3952, 3953.
 " its cravings for God, 4129, 4130.
 " its tendency to recur to its old sins, 4887.
 " must be entirely consecrated to God, 4741.
Heathenism: its tendency, 959.
Heathen. Destiny of the, 2811.
Heaven, 2713-2793.
 " Christ's mode of speaking of, 900.
 " how it is made attractive to us, 470, 471.
 " Meetness for, 1068-1071.
 " the hope of the afflicted, 140, 141.
 " the place where many prayers are answered, 3893, 3895.
Hell, 2974-2812.
 " how the fuel for its fires is furnished, 4929.
 " Scripture representation of, 2291.
Helplessness appeals to our pity, 2310.
Heresy is often the offspring of immorality, 4835, 4854.
 " the most fatal, 1205.
Holiness, 2813-2816.
 " an evidence of regeneration, 4119, 4120.
 " an evidence of the genuineness of faith, 1978-1986.
 " can be attained by the regenerate only, 4092-4095.
 " characterises all true believers, 327, 328.
 " essential to the knowledge of God, 2244.
 " in what sense it is perfected in death, 1595-1600.
 " its influence, 1088, 1090, 1858.
 " its progress, 2520, 2523, 2520, 2537.
Holy Spirit, 2867-2908.
 " helpeth our infirmities, 200.
 " His agency is implied in preaching the Gospel, 2365.
 " mode of His operation in the soul, 2531.
 " our need of His help, 1243, 3361.
 " the Author of regeneration, 4006-4113.
 " the Author of all spiritual life and excellences, 1400-1405, 2460, 2462, 2467.
Honour: how is it to be reached, 2472.
Honours. Earthly: their childishness, 2977.
 " Worldly, 4967-4995, 5044-5055.
Hope, 2909-2936.
 " how it is to be kept active, 3502.
 " how it is to be strengthened, 349, 350.
 " its influence, 1589.
 " love, and faith, 2040, 2041.
 " of Heaven, 2771, 2779, 2787.
 " of the hypocrite, 3024, 3025.
Humility, 2937-2985.
Hypocrisy. A sure sign of, 3621.

Hypocrites, 2986-3034.

IDENTITY: in what it consists, 4337, 4338, 4352.

Idleness exposes us to temptation, 4718.

" its corrupting influence, 808, 809.

" leads to discontent, 1684.

Idolatry: its sinfulness, 5019.

Ignorance is sometimes bliss, 3253.

" its injuriousness, 5050.

" its pitiableness, 4825.

" makes man confident, 1384.

Illustrations. Caution concerning the use of, page 802, note.

" Homely, 8-10.

" mistakes in their use, 12-15.

" of the Bible, 6.

" Our Lord's use of, 2.

" their importance in teaching, 1-4.

" whence they are to be obtained, 11.

Imagination. The: its true use, 2241.

" often misleads us, 1803.

Imitation of Christ, 2499, 2502.

Immortality of the soul, 4649-4667.

Impatience: its folly, 3664, 3670-3673.

" its uselessness, 3712.

Imperfections are not to be deemed little things, 4451.

Incarnation. The: the distinctive doctrine of Christianity, 1137.

" See Christ, 846-854.

Inconsistency of professing Christians, 1163, 1164.

Inbred sins: how they are to be treated, 1058.

Indecision: its folly and perilousness, 1409.

Infidelity. See Atheism, 353-373.

Infidel. Death of an, 4163.

Infidel's child. Death of an, 834.

Infidels, beneficialness of their efforts, 1165.

" their inconsistencies, 3718.

Infirmities are not to be deemed little things, 4451.

Infirmity. Sins of, 4721.

Influence: of children, 827, 828.

" how far it reaches, 4596.

" is exerted upon us, 4704.

" Unconscious, 1857-1865.

Information: how it is to be acquired, 3073.

Ingratitude: its commonness and wickedness, 3177.

Innocence: its power, 4712.

Inquisitiveness. See Curiosity, 1508-1518.

Inspiration of the Scriptures, 480-515.

Instinct: its value, 2387.

Integrity, in what it really consists, 3566.

Intemperance. See Drunkenness.

Intercessory prayer, 3778.

Invalids. A comfort for, 213.

Irritableness, 283-285.

JOB: his affliction, 91.

" his patience, 3707.

Jonah: his folly and misery, 1704.

Joy, 3035-3053.

" an element of acceptable prayer, 3817, 3818.

" given in the dying hour, 1642.

" true, springs from within, 1801.

" of Salvation not always experienced even by the sincere, 340-346, 1802.

Judgment. Day of, 3054-3066.

Judgments. God's: to be reverently considered, 144.

Justification by faith, 1890, 1945, 1969-1975, 1999.

KNOWLEDGE, 3067-3155.

" and love, 3137.

Knowledge of God, how it is to be obtained, 3106.
 " of the hypocrite, 3006.
 LATE-COMERS to the house of God, 5090, 5091.
 Law, 3156-3216.
 " of God: needs wisdom to use it rightly, 4124.
 " The Christian's relation to the, 1096, 1097, 1136.
 Laws of nature are of Divine authority, 4131.
 " " Relation of miracles to the, 3530-38.
 Learning is not the same thing as wisdom, 3113.
 Legacies, 467.
 Liberty is founded in law, 3199.
 Life, 3217-3293.
 " is a warfare, 1690.
 " its disappointments, 2933-2935.
 " its troubles are soon over, 217.
 " should be considered as a whole, 166, 168.
 Likeness to God, the essence of true religion, 4150-4153.
 Literature. See Books, 655-686.
 Litigiousness: its folly and wickedness, 3168.
 Little sins, 4513-4533.
 Little things are not to be despised, 2521, 2538.
 " fidelity in, 3245, 3250.
 " their influence, 726.
 " their power, 1723, 1725.
 Liturgy of the Church of England, 3800.
 Loneliness: its painfulness, 1549.
 Looking to Jesus, 798.
 Looking up, 176.
 Lord's prayer. The, 3801.
 Lord's Supper, 3294-3322.
 " is not to be overrated, 3426.
 " why Christians love it, 3443.
 Love, 3323-3373.
 " and faith, 2036-2039.
 " is mightier than law, 3206-3208.
 " its power, 4311-4317.
 " the constant passion of the soul, 31.
 Lowly. Comfort for the, 4018.
 Lysurgus. Laws of, 5039, 5040.
 MAHOMET and Christ, 977.
 Man, 3374-3423.
 " born to trouble, 47-51.
 " his power over natural laws, 3172, 3180-3183.
 " his inability to keep God's commandments, 3185, 3186, 3189, 3190.
 " immortal, 2176.
 Manhood. True: is attained only in the Christian Life, 1084.
 Means of Grace, 3424-3645.
 " " are worthless without the Holy Spirit, 2877-2891.
 " " attendance on them is not religion, 4131-4135.
 " " why so many derive no profit from them, 3319-3322.
 Mediator. Necessity of a, 375, 376.
 Meditation, 3466-3525.
 Meekness exemplified in Christ, 960.
 " under reproof, 4322-4328.
 Melancholy: a hindrance to assurance, 343-345.
 Memory in Heaven, 2750, 2792.
 Men: how their worth is to be estimated, 3046.
 " how they are to be judged, 712-715, 717, 738, 743.
 " their moral possibilities are known to God, 1071.

Mercies. Daily, 3177.
 " should awaken gratitude, 35.
 Mercy of God, 2328-2350.
 Middle Ages. The Church in the, 1187, 1207.
 Mind. The: its craving for truth, 4837, 4840.
 Ministerial counsel often foolishly sought, 1272, 1273.
 Ministry. Importance of training for the, 287.
 Miracles, 3526-3562.
 Miserliness. See Avarice, 400-422.
 Missions: their reasonableness, 2420-2424.
 " their success, 3355, 3377.
 " their ultimate success, 1166-1168.
 Modesty. False, 3906-3910.
 Money. Love of: how a Christian may use it, 433.
 " See Avarice, 400-422.
 " See Riches, 4355-4422.
 Moralists, 3563-3593.
 " insufficiency of their methods, 4084, 4085.
 " their imperfections, 4449, 4450.
 Morality, 3594-3607, 2826, 4449, 4450.
 " may be morally worthless, 4453, 4456, 4457, 4591, 4593, 4597, 4599, 4600.
 Mosaic law. The, 3211-3216.
 Mothers: their influence, 820.
 Motives determine character and destiny, 3056, 4453, 4454.
 " determine the quality of action, 3332, 4147.
 Mourning for the dead, 469, 472.
 Murmuring: its unreasonableness, 158.
 " See Discontent, 1720.
 Mystery inseparable from Christianity, 1140.
 Mysteries of Providence, 1508-1518, 4020, 4031-48.
 NATIONAL establishment of Religion, 1160.
 " welfare, influence of religion on the, 4164-4166.
 Nature. Laws of, 3170-3183.
 " Uniformity of: what it teaches, 363-365.
 Negative righteousness is not sufficient, 3603.
 Nobility of life: how it is to be obtained, 3244-51.
 Novelty. Craving for, 2590-2594.
 OBEDIENCE, 3608-3647.
 " is made easy by love, 3336-3341, 3517.
 " its rewards, 3105, 3106.
 Offensive sayings are best met with silence, 272.
 Old age does not necessarily bring virtue, 1449.
 " should be prepared for, 3275.
 " Solitariness of, 1630.
 Omission. Sins of, 3368, 4559-4561.
 One thing needful. The, 3567-3570.
 Opportunities should be promptly used, 4289, 4290.
 Order: its importance, 1215-1217.
 Original sin, 4552-4558.
 Ostentatious virtues, 3651.
 PARABLES. Christ's use of, 911.
 Parents: effects of their sins on their children, 824, 825.
 " influence of their example, 777-779.
 " must not chastise in anger, 316, 821.
 " should rule by love, 3340.
 " their mistakes, 809, 811, 817, 818, 820.
 " their obligations to their children, 803.
 Party-spirit, 1224.
 Passion. See Anger, 261-286.
 Passions are fostered by prosperity, 4008-4010.
 " must be steadily controlled, 33.
 Patience, 3648-3713.

Peace: how it is attained, 1893, 1894, 3224.
 " is the result of victory, 3398.
 " is the reward of obedience, 3645, 3646.
 " no peace to the wicked, 2296-2301.
Penitent. Encouragement for the, 2331-2345.
Perfection: how it is to be reached, 1195, 2473-2482.
 " in what it consists, 3621.
 " in what sense it is attained by death, 1595-1600.
 " is attained gradually, 2466, 2508-2511.
 " is to be our aim, 2848.
 " the Christian's hope, 2458, 2488.
Persecution affords an opportunity for the display of our Christian graces, 3665.
 " how the Christian triumphs over it, 2773.
 " is overruled for good, 1244, 1245, 1249-1251.
 " no hurt to God's people, 207.
 " Steadfastness under, 3958-3960.
Perseverance a proof of sincerity, 3966-3976.
 " essential to success, 3839.
 " is found only in the regenerate, 4097.
 " its necessity, 3589.
Pharisees. The, 3593.
Philanthropy is inseparable from true piety, 3348.
Philosophy: its failure, 479.
Pity. Evidences of, 800.
Pleasure: in what sense it is prohibited in the Bible, 1153, 1155.
Pleasures: how they are used, 964.
 " the zest that is given to them by privations, 220.
Pleasures. Sinful: are certain to lead to sorrow, 4609, 4610, 4612.
 " are Satan's baits, 4755, 4757, 4676, 4680, 4681.
Poor. God's care for the, 2310, 2311.
Posthumous influence, 1094, 1095.
Prayer, 3714-3902.
 " a means of usefulness, 213.
 " for the dead, 3759.
 " Hindrances to, 1789.
 " Inconstancy in, 3008.
 " of the ungodly, 2027.
 " prompted by faith, 1927.
 " Relations of the laws of nature to, 3179-82.
 " United, 5075.
Prayerfulness is promoted by affliction, 69.
Preachers. A lesson for, 41.
 " are to concentrate their energies in their great calling, 3229.
 " are not to strain after novelty, 2590-2594.
 " how they are to deal with popular errors, 1820, 1821, 1826, 1827.
 " how they are to set forth the doctrine of man's depravity, 3391, 3396.
 " need and may have the Holy Spirit's help, 2885-2888.
 " should be blameless, 967, 3112, 3125, 4281, 4285.
 " should not be ignorant men, 1154.
 " should not aim at being rhetorical, 2589, 2608.
 " should warn sinners of their danger, 2810.
 " the conditions of success, 2653.
 " the results of their efforts are often long hidden, 4049.

Preachers: their imperfections do not destroy the importance of their message, 2436.
Preaching does not depend for its success upon intellectual power, 1399.
 " how it is to be successful, 3354, 3356.
 " Importance of practical wisdom in, 1154.
 " its foolishness, 4106, 4108-4110.
 " Legal, 4229-4231.
 " should deal with daily duties, 4198.
 " the ordinary means of conversion, 2641.
Preecocity is not to be encouraged, 807.
Predestination. See Election, 1776.
Presumptuous sins, 4541-4545.
Preventing grace, 62.
Prevention is better than cure, 4716.
Pride. Correctives of, 2209-2212, 2216-2219.
 " folly of pride of rank, 4989.
 " is a hindrance to grace, 2951.
 " is hostile to spiritual fruitfulness, 2983.
 " is promoted by prosperity, 4013.
 " leads to prayerlessness, 2958.
 " makes men ambitious, 2963.
 " seeks publicity, 2944.
Primitive Church. The, 1237-1240.
Probation. No second, 2191, 3063, 3065, 3066.
Procrastination: its folly, 692-696, 1445-1452, 1541, 1562, 1566, 1569, 3062-3066.
 " its folly and danger, 4232-4246, 4249, 4258, 4289.
 " its wickedness, 4247, 4248.
Profession, 3903-3976.
 " how it is to be made honourable, 4202.
 " of the hypocrite, 2995-3005, 3017-3023.
 " tested by affliction, 75-82.
Promises. God's: are to be prayerfully meditated, 3484, 3499, 3501, 3512, 3521.
 " a knowledge of them is essential to acceptable prayer, 3844, 3845.
 " are always to be trusted, 4052, 4053.
 " are to be pleaded in prayer, 3749.
 " precious to the afflicted, 138.
 " their fulfilment is often delayed, 3669.
Prophets. The: their conceptions of God's mercy, 847.
Prosperity, 3977-4014.
 " of the wicked, 4931, 4939-4948, 4961-4966.
 " should not be allowed to check our prayerfulness, 3877-3879.
 " See Diversity, 16-30.
 " why it is granted, 444.
Providence, 4015-4062.
 " Relations of the laws of nature to, 3178.
Provocations should be met by patience, 3663, 3957.
 " their purposes, 2464, 2305.
Public opinion is the hypocrite's rule of action, 2989.
Public schools, 1770.
Public worship, 5066-5094.
 " how the working classes are to be got to attend it, 794.
Punishment of sin, 4603-4614.
Purpose. Importance of having and maintaining a great, 3232-3243.
RAINBOW. The, 1176.
Revelation and reason, 537.
 " its limits are to be respected, 1503-1518.
 " Necessity of a, 478, 479.
Reason and revelation, 537.

Reason, Faith and, 2022-2024.
 " is incompetent to deal with Spiritual truths, 1087.
 Receiving Christ, 1961, 1974.
 Recognition of friends in Heaven, 2171, 2172, 2746-2749.
 Redemption : its cost, 912.
 " marvellousness of its method, 2319-21.
 " The mystery of, 1140.
 Refinement may be only superficial, 3564.
 Reformation. National : must begin in the home, 806.
 Reformation. Personal : how it is to be effected, 448, 1849.
 " is not regeneration, 1393, 1394.
 " is not necessarily a sign of regeneration, 3209, 4069-4071, 4077.
 " is not sufficient, 4085.
 " where it should begin, 2692, 2693, 4104.
 Regeneration, 4063-4128.
 " is effected silently, 2895, 2896.
 " See Conversion, 1392-1471.
 Regrets. Fruitless, 4271, 4468.
 Rejection of Christ, 4918, 4924.
 Religion, 4129-4194.
 " and morality, 3594-3607.
 " can be imparted to us only by the Spirit of God, 3148.
 " can only be known experimentally, 2881, 2886.
 " not to be neglected because of controversies respecting it, 1373.
 " Relation of forms and ceremonies to, 2077-2091.
 Religious experiences vary greatly, 1410-1429.
 Religious observances : their true purpose, 2844.
 Religious ordinances. See Means of Grace, 3424-3465.
 Renewal : in what sense it differs from regeneration, 2874.
 Repentance. 4206-4273.
 " its relation to faith, 2030-2034.
 " Relation of fear to, 2025-2029.
 " See Conversion, 1392-1471.
 " should follow sin promptly, 4441, 2698.
 " the first duty of all men, 3581, 3584, 3587.
 Reproof, 4274-4333.
 " a duty of friendship, 2160-2162.
 Reputation : its value, 721, 722.
 Resolution. Christian, 3914-3921.
 Resolutions. Good : how little they can do for us, 4766.
 Respectability may be morally worthless, 4453, 4456, 4457.
 Resurrection of Christ, 922, 4354.
 " of the body, 1620-1622, 4334-4354, 4648.
 Retribution. Laws of, 4609, 4611, 4612.
 Reverence : its fitness in worship, 5071-5074.
 Revolutions. Great : how they are to be effected, 4026.
 Rich. Duty of the, 454.
 Riches, 4355-4422.
 Ridicule is not to be heeded, 3914, 2403.
 Righteousness : its true standard, 3184.
 Ritual : how is it to be judged, 5092.
 Rome. Church of : absurdity of her claims and doctrine, 877.
 " " falsity of her pretensions, 1204.

SABELLIANISM, 4821.
 Sacrament. See The Lord's Supper, 3294-3322.
 Saints. Mistaken notions of, 990.
 Salvation can be obtained only on God's terms, 2820, 2821.
 " how it is to be obtained, 4760.
 " is needed by all, 2418-2420.
 " is offered to all, 2417, 2421-2424.
 " its freeness, 1962.
 " neglected, 687-703.
 " should be our chief concern, 4928.
 " the doom of those who reject it, 443.
 Sanctification : how it is to be effected, 2526, 2550.
 " is as necessary as justification, 2733.
 " is effected silently, 2895, 2896.
 " is promoted by affliction, 85-90, 116, 215.
 " See Holiness, 2813-2866.
 Sarcastic speeches, 2163.
 Satan, 1660-1679.
 Scepticism is not to be feared, 4829.
 " its folly, 3067.
 " its powerlessness, 368.
 " of able men, 2437.
 Science. Modern : its teaching, 4031.
 Schism. Modern : 1822, 1823.
 Scoffer answered. A, 1128.
 Scripture. The. See The Bible, 478-646.
 Seasons. The : are evidences of a Divine Government, 363.
 Second Advent. The, 980-982.
 Secret sins, 4546-4549.
 Secrets. Betrayers of, 2119.
 Sectarism, 1177, 1201, 1221, 1224, 2450.
 Secular work, 4146, 4147.
 Selfishness is often increased by prosperity, 4013.
 " is to be avoided in adversity, 28.
 " its unnaturalness and folly, 4415.
 Self-confidence : its folly, 4712-4714.
 " its spiritual perilousness, 3583, 3589-3593, 4719.
 Self-deception : its causes, 3014.
 " its commonness, 2686, 4448-4450.
 Self-denial is not demanded by religion only, 3703, 4170.
 " is not the whole of religion, 4169.
 " its proper consummation, 2557.
 " The great example of, 1729.
 Self-distrust : its wisdom, 4321, 4733.
 Self-examination, 4423-4475.
 " should follow prayer, 3855.
 Self-righteousness : how is it to be cured, 3193.
 " is excluded by true faith, 1988, 1989.
 " is ruinous, 1950.
 Self-sacrifice is inspired by love, 3342.
 Self-seeking : characteristic of the hypocrite, 2986, 2988.
 Senses. The : are Satan's landing places, 4895.
 " not the test of truth, 366.
 Sentimentalists. Religious, 3347.
 Severity an essential element in the Divine character, 2316, 2317.
 Shame, 4084.
 Sight. Faith and, 2020, 2021.
 Silence a characteristic of Divine operations, 1546.
 Sincerity : how it is to be tested, 333.
 " in Christian profession, 3922-3944.
 " in prayer, 3812-3815.
 " makes duty delightful, 3634, 3639.
 " renders our services acceptable, 3635-3638, 3641.

- Sincerity. The comfort of, 1085, 1086.
 Sin, 4476-4614.
 „ God's relation to, 2275-2286.
 „ is to be forsaken instantly, 4232-4258.
 „ its punishment, 2180-2186.
 „ must be utterly forsaken, 3832.
 „ occasions of sin are to be shunned, 3857, 4273.
 „ renders prayer powerless, 3858.
 „ why it cannot be forgiven without atonement, 376.
 Sinner's. God's compassion for, 2295.
 „ may be transformed into saints, 2376.
 Sinfulness. Sense of: a sign of grace, 329, 1262, 1277, 1279.
 Slanders: how they should be met, 280, 3663.
 Sleep. Blessedness of, 2778.
 Sleeping in Church, 2570-2572.
 Society: its influence, 3742, 3743.
 Sophistry: how it is to be refuted, 303.
 Sorrow. Godly and worldly, 227.
 „ its effect on character, 20.
 „ See Affliction, 47-236.
 „ Worldly, 224-227.
 Soul. The, 4615-4467.
 „ „ a ghost, 1639.
 „ „ finds rest only in Christ, 968-971.
 „ „ finds its rest and portion only in God, 2378-2387.
 „ „ God's indwelling in the, 2388, 2389.
 „ „ is nourished by meditation, 3495, 3496, 3499-3501.
 „ „ its chief glory, 2822.
 „ „ its immortality was brought to light by Christ, 3415.
 Speculative questions, 3511.
 Spiritual discernment: a gift of the Holy Spirit, 2868-2870.
 „ „ is indispensable to the perception of spiritual truths, 550, 598, 600, 2586, 2587, 3148, 3155, 3568, 3860.
 „ „ is promoted by growth in grace, 2551, 2552.
 Spiritual sleep and death, 4950-4953.
 Steadfastness under persecution, 3958-3960.
 Stoicism is not patience, 3650.
 Stubbornness: its folly, 2978.
 Students should be careful of their health, 3089.
 Study. Rules for, 3094-3096, 3507-3515.
 Submission in prayer, 3833.
 „ to God's providence, 158, 1699, 1718.
 „ to the will of God, 2287, 3685-3699.
 „ Reasons for, 2327.
 Substitution. See Atonement, 374-399.
 Success is usually overrated, 3518.
 Suffering is not lessened by the fact that there are many sufferers, 3054.
 „ See Affliction, 47-236.
 Suicide: its sinfulness, 1604-1606.
 Suicides: their explanation, 1556.
 Sunday-School Teachers: their true object, 1733.
 Superstition a result of morbid fear, 2055.
 „ destructive of real religion, 2288.
 „ its causes, 3348.
 Suspicion: its debasing influence, 822.
 Sympathy is promoted by suffering, 135, 136.
 „ of Christ, 952-957.
 TALENTS entail responsibility, 2202.
 „ their diversity, 2194.
 Talkers. Fluent, 4136.
 Temple. The building of the spiritual, 49, 113.
 Temptation, 4668-4808.
 „ a hindrance to assurance, 343, 345.
 „ besets the prosperous, 4004-4010.
 „ how it assails us, 2007.
 „ kinds of, 1661.
 „ no man is free from it, 4881-4884.
 „ our liability to it should make us watchful, 4881-4884.
 „ Successful resistance to, 2553.
 Thankfulness essential to acceptableness in prayer, 3820.
 „ is promoted by humility, 2965.
 „ our duty, 162-165, 2698.
 Thanksgiving. Reasons for, 3177.
 Theologians: their attempts to solve all mysteries, 1518.
 Theology is necessarily imperfect, 2235, 2239.
 „ should be studied systematically, 4872-4874.
 Thoughts. Distracting, 337.
 „ Evil, 4543, 4734.
 „ Holy, 3506, 3524, 3525.
 „ Purification of the, 4116.
 „ Vain, 1849, 3485-3487, 3508, 4451, 5057.
 „ Wandering thoughts, 2659, 3864, 3865, 5086, 5087.
 Time tests character, 743.
 Time-servers, 3372.
 Tradition. Perversion of, 2085.
 Trials of life develop our Christian graces, 4194, 4195.
 „ „ Prosperity unfits men for the, 4014.
 „ „ See Adversity, 16-30; Affliction, 47-236; Troubles, 4021, 4623.
 Trifles are unworthy of our pursuit, 3228-3231.
 Trinity. The: 4809-4821.
 „ „ personality of the Holy Spirit, 2867.
 „ „ The Deity of Jesus Christ, 835-845.
 Troubles. Little, 4021.
 „ their beneficial influence, 1623.
 Trust in God, 30, 4049-4062.
 „ begets trustworthiness, 822.
 Truth, 4822-4878.
 UNBELIEF: its powerlessness, 368, 2812.
 „ The penalty of, 443.
 Unconscious influence, 1857-1865.
 Unconverted. The, 4952.
 Understanding. The: how it is to be enriched, 3494.
 „ „ Sins of, 4454.
 Unhappiness has its root within us, 1681, 1682.
 Uniformity, 1206-1214.
 "Unity." Difficulty of defining, 4815.
 „ of the Church, 1190-1214.
 Universe. Vastness of the, 2662.
 Usefulness is the true end of life, 3262.
 VAIN thoughts: how to escape from them, 3485-3487.
 „ „ their hurtfulness, 3508.
 Variety, characteristic of God's works, 2193, 2201.
 Vicarious suffering, 374, 376, 392, 393-396.
 Vice depicted, 2688.
 Virtue. Delight in, 3580.
 „ depicted, 2688.
 „ is not loved by the world, 2678.
 „ is rewarded here and now, 3506.

Vision. Spiritual, 3493, 3503.

WALKING in Christ, 1980, 1981, 1989.

Wandering thoughts, in hearing, 2659.

" " in prayer, 3821, 3822, 3864, 3882.

" " in public worship, 5089.

Washington on the value of religion, 4165.

Watchfulness, 4880-4914.

" necessary, because our example may be so injurious, 4565.

" necessary, because by transgression we shall bring dishonour on all that we account most sacred, 4566-4569.

" specially needed in prosperity, 3994-3996, 4003-4013.

Wealth : its uncertainty, 4979.

" See Prosperity, 3977-4014.

" " Riches, 4355-4422.

" Worldly, 5044-5055.

Wicked. The, 4915-4966.

" their punishment, 4603-4612.

" their purposes divinely frustrated, 4027.

Will. The : a supernatural power, 3536-3538.

" " cannot be forced, 1679.

" " its freedom not destroyed in conversion, 1407.

Will. The, must be surrendered to Christ, 2853.

Words. Many, 4882.

Workers. Christian : are of many kinds, 2200.

" " Comfort for, 3713.

" " should be humble, 2945-2948, 2966, 2967.

World. The, 4967-5067.

" " Folly of the love of, 4630.

" " its inability to satisfy the soul, 2378-2487.

" " the love of it is to be overcome, 43, 44, 45.

" " See Riches, 4355, 4422.

Worldliness degrades the soul, 4626.

Worldling. The : his folly, 4156.

Worldly society is to be shunned, 2114, 2123, 2148.

Worship. Public, 5066-5094.

" " Hindrances in, 3858-3865, 3882.

" " its reasonableness, 3610.

" " Modes of, 3793.

" " to whom it is profitable, 4090.

Wrath. See Anger, 261-286.

YOUNG. The : their friendships, 2150.

" " their heedlessness of advice, 4714.

" " their ignorance of the conflicts of life, 5059.

Youthful sins, 4503.

ABSTRACTIONS are useless to the multitude, 846.

Affliction teaches sympathy, 872.

Arian heresy. The, 849.

BAPTISM of Christ, 846.

Body and soul : their mutual influence, 865.

CHILDHOOD of Jesus, 858-863.

Christ : His sufferings, 869, 915.

Christian. The : his sins, 1032.

" his union with Christ, 882, 885.

Christian work. Preparation for, 862.

Church. The : its safety, 892.

Converts. Young, 1009.

DEATH. Preparation for, 1051, 1052.

Difficulties are not to deter us from the Christian life, 1046.

Discouragements in the Christian life, 1053, 1062, 1077.

Distance lends enchantment to the view, 990.

EXAMPLE : its power, 894, 895, 899.

FAITH in Christ : its reasonableness, 905.

Feeling : is inferior to principle, 1004.

" is insufficient, 991.

Fruitfulness is the result of union with Christ, 1005.

GOD, revealed in Christ, 885-857, 875.

Gospel. The : in what sense it can be "adorned," 992.

" its perfectness, 992.

Growth in grace : is often almost imperceptible, 1053.

" its signs, 1036-1038, 1057.

HAPPINESS : it is the business of Christians to diffuse it, 1049, 1050.

Heaven should be daily in our thoughts, 1030.

Holiness. Constant progress is to be made in, 996, 997.

Humility. Reasons for, 1013, 1014.

IMPERFECTIONS, how they are to be got rid of, 1054, 1057.

Incarnation. The, 846-853.

JACOB's ladder, 887.

LOVE for Christ, 1003, 1004.

MONASTIC idea. Folly of the, 1035.

Moralists : the hopelessness of their condition, 1016.

Mosaic law, Relation of Christ to the, 907, 908.

Mysteries are not incredible, 857.

PEACE, the gift of Christ, 884.

Penitent. Encouragement for the, 879.

Perfection is not attained in this life, 1055-1057, 1059-1062.

Plymouth Brethrenism : folly of its teaching, 1035, 1041.

Politics are included in the sphere of Christian duty, 1035, 1041.

Politicians set an example to Christians, 1047.

Pride : its folly in the Christian, 1013, 1014.

Profession, the duty of all Christians, 1042.

REPUTATION : how easily it is ruined, 1033.

Ridicule is not to be dreaded, 1045.

Romanism : absurdity of its doctrines, 878.

SALVATION can be obtained only in one way, 881.

" how it is to be obtained, 887.

" is all of grace, 1007-1012.

" is offered to all, 879, 880.

Service of God, in what it consists, 991.

Singleness of aim, 1031.

Singularity is not to be dreaded, 1043, 1044.

Society : its influence, 1040.

TEMPERANCE : the example of Christ, 902.

Temptation of Christ, 866-871.

WATCHFULNESS is always necessary, 1055, 1057, 1061.

World, The : the Christian's relation to it, 1035-1041.

INDEX OF TEXTS.

GENESIS.

- i. 1. 2253.
2. 4121.
3. 4111.
12. 2403.
27. 3384.
31. 1498-1503.
ii. 8. 4102.
iii. 1. 2007, 4679, 4745.
3. 3629.
5. 3252-3255, 4755.
6. 4754.
7. 4674.
8. 3859.
17. 3358, 3389.
iv. 4. 1276.
5. 4582.
7. 4604.
10. 4502, 4503.
v. 24. 3971.
27. 3259-3261.
vi. 3. 2899, 4249.
5. 1829-1841.
9. 3916, 3960, 3961.
14. 2043.
vii. 8. 2831.
13. 1187, 1250.
21. 3435.
22. 3504.
viii. 4. 1249.
9. 2384, 3436, 3449.
21. 3394.
22. 3170, 3177, 3384.
ix. 13. 221, 1176.
xiii. 2. 4355-4357.
7. 1229.
xv. 1. 2383.
11. 3864, 3882.
xvi. 13. 2260, 2261.
xvii. 1. 3971.
xviii. 4. 2761.
19. 303-306.
xix. 2. 3513.
9. 2847.
15. 258.
17. 1841, 3399.
19. 303-306.
28. 2028.
xx. 12.
xxi. 1. 3884.
14. 3334.
16. 423.
24.
xxii. 1. 4778.
5. 3316, 3319, 5087.
xxiv. 14. 3918.
40.
63. 3466-3479, 3507.

- xxv. 8. 1639.
34. 3642.
xxvii. 39. 40, 3979.
xxx. 39. 2866.
xxii. 9-12. 3718.
26. 4763, 2948.
xxiii. 14. 3804.
xxvii. 3. 2212.
34. 313.
35. 2246.
xxix. 9. 4687, 4694.
xl. 20-23. 4013.
xli. 43. 3978.
xlii. 4. 2314.
9. 1656.
15. 2123.
21. 4604.
xliii. 34. 3979.
xliv. 12. 313.
xlv. 5. 4035.
8. 3666.
24. 1218-1227.
xlvi. 5. 1184.
xlvii. 9. 3218.
xlviii. 17-19. 4040.

EXODUS.

- iii. 2. 1246.
14. 2226, 2341.
iv. 10. 1725, 1728.
vii. 13. 2279.
viii. 8. 3209.
15. 3970.
17. 18, 3632.
32. 3970.
ix. 34. 3970.
x. 26. 2716, 4582.
xii. 19. 4580.
38. 3917.
xiv. 2. 5055.
3. 578, 4005.
6. 3441.
xv. 11. 2275, 2318.
23. 2790.
xvi. 4. 3971.
20. 1362.
21. 1254.
35. 3177.
xvii. 5, 6. 2423.
9. 3441.
xix. 12. 5087.
xx. 5. 824.
11. 3441.
17. 4995.
12. 3257, 3258.
xxi. 24. 3211-3213.
xxiii. 2. 1521-1526, 3937, 4925.

- xxviii. 36. 4406.
xxxii. 10. 4763.
14. 2256.
15. 3621.
xxxiv. 7. 2184.
29. 3525.
33-35. 859.
xxxix. 30. 4466.

LEVITICUS.

- v. 7. 2202.
vi. 9. 3644.
12. 3453.
viii. 30. 2853.
x. 1. 2883.
xi. 44. 2814-2817.
xix. 2. 2814-2817.
17. 4274-4333.
18. 3957.
xx. 7. 2814-2817.
xxiv. 20. 3211-3213.
xxvi. 3. 3971.
4. 2981.

NUMBERS.

- iii. 11. 3618-3622.
24. 2883.
vi. 25. 1252.
xi. 5. 1685.
6. 2754.
9. 3177.
18. 3753.
xii. 24. 4172.
xiv. 24. 1085, 2856, 3917.
xvi. 5. 3064.
14. 1707.
xvii. 10. 1707.
xx. 11. 2423.
xxi. 5. 1685.
9. 1946, 1948, 1999, 2000, 2004, 3442, 4760.
xxiii. 9. 5037.
10. 1111.
19. 2255, 2256, 3747, 3750-3753.

NUMBERS.

- xxvi. 61. 2883.
xxxii. 23. 640, 3250, 4603-4612, 4227.
33. 3055.

DEUTERONOMY.

- iii. 22. 3227.
v. 9. 824.
21. 4995.
29. 3200, 3201.

v. 33. 3971.
 vi. 5. 43-45, 3348, 3349,
 3357-3366, 3947.
 7. 799, 803-806.
 12. 3998-4001.
 vii. 13. 5062.
 viii. 2. 79.
 3. 1255.
 7. 2792, 2798.
 11, 14, 19. 3998-4001.
 18. 4355-4357.
 x. 12. 3348, 3349, 3357-66.
 xi. 1, 12, 13. 3348, 3349
 3357-3366.
 xii. 23-25. 4530.
 xiii. 1-5. 3545.
 4. 3971.
 15. 3545.
 xix. 9. 3348, 3349, 3357-66.
 21. 3211-3213.
 xxvi. 14. 24, 757.
 xxvii. 26. 4504-4506, 4530.
 xxviii. 9. 3971.
 xxix. 20. 2349.
 29. 1508-1518, 1782,
 1784, 2718, 2794,
 3179, 4041.
 xxx. 6. 3348, 3349, 3357-
 3366.
 19. 2807.
 xxxii. 15. 2350, 3998-4001,
 4008-4010.
 19. 4568, 4570.
 46. 2663.
 xxxiii. 25. 3321.
 28. 5037.
 JOSHUA.
 i. 5. 2878.
 6-9. 2791.
 7. 3632.
 8. 3466.
 iv. 10. 1643.
 vi. 1-5. 1167, 3440.
 vii. 10. 1644, 4468.
 11. 1644.
 19. 2267.
 x. 13. 3559, 3560.
 xiii. 1. 1056.
 xxii. 5. 3971.
 xxiv. 15. 1409.
 UDGES.
 i. 7. 4048.
 v. 25. 4494.
 28. 2786.
 xiv. 8. 4784.
 xvi. 4. 4675.
 19. 4715.
 21. 4626.
 28-30. 3850.
 RUTH.
 i. 14. 3917.
 I. SAMUEL.
 i. 17. 27, 3840-3843.
 i. 23. 3980.
 ii. 24. 820.
 iii. 18. 3670-3696.
 v. 3. 3243.

vi. 12. 470.
 19. 1503-1518.
 vii. 9. 3754, 3755.
 x. 9. 4100.
 x. 11. 3938.
 xii. 23. 3778.
 xiv. 4. 2790.
 xv. 22. 3614, 3617.
 29. 2255, 2256.
 xvi. 7. 2214, 2215, 2681-83,
 2997-3006, 4080-81.
 xvii. 37. 122.
 45. 4712.
 xxi. 13. 2008.
 xxiv. 16. 1488, 4229.
 xxv. 17. 4326, 4327.
 36. 37, 4238, 4239.
 xxvii. 1. 4053.
 xxviii. 15. 4957.
 xxx. 6. 2008.
 II. SAMUEL.
 iii. 16. 4597.
 27. 4491.
 x. 12. 4055.
 xii. 1-7. 4293.
 5-7. 4231-4236.
 7. 4573.
 13. 4318-20, 4322-33,
 4591.
 14. 2337, 4563-4569.
 xii. 20. 23, 829-833.
 23. 830, 2746-2749.
 xv. 10. 2350.
 14. 1481.
 26. 4055.
 xvi. 10. 3663.
 xvii. 14. 4027.
 xviii. 32. 2314.
 xix. 5-7. 147.
 xx. 9. 4006, 4492.
 10. 4491.
 xxiv. 1. 4902.
 16. 2256.
 24. 3783.
 I. KINGS.
 ii. 16, 20. 3840-3843.
 iii. 11. 4355-4357.
 14. 3971.
 v. 18. 4099.
 vi. 7. 49.
 12. 3971.
 viii. 23, 61. 3971.
 27. 4015-4018.
 x. 5. 3152.
 23. 4355-4357.
 xi. 6. 1086.
 xiv. 13. 1282.
 xvii. 4. 6. 3892.
 xviii. 21. 1409.
 xix. 13. 2969.
 xx. 11. 3965.
 xxi. 27. 1483.
 29. 1488, 2931.
 xxii. 8. 4308.
 13. 2989.
 xxiv. 34. 3980.
 II. KINGS.
 ii. 1. 2210, 2218, 2219.

ii. 21. 3442.
 iv. 3. 2864.
 5. 2504.
 v. 12. 3446.
 14. 3748, 3755.
 vi. 33. 1704, 3357.
 viii. 13. 4588, 4724, 4901.
 x. 16. 4466.
 29. 3619, 3622.
 xviii. 4. 5092.
 33. 2319.
 xxii. 19. 2981.
 xxiii. 3. 3971.
 xxiv. 10. 4011.
 I. CHRONICLES.
 xvi. 10. 756-762.
 xxi. 15. 2256.
 xxii. 2. 4099.
 5. 5093, 5094.
 xxix. 15. 1100-1102, 3234;
 18. 1007.
 II. CHRONICLES.
 i. 11. 4355-4357.
 ii. 6. 4015-4018.
 vi. 4. 3971.
 8. 2633.
 18. 4015-4018.
 xii. 7. 2981.
 xvi. 29. 2275.
 xvii. 4. 3971.
 xviii. 7. 4308.
 12. 2989.
 20. 3152.
 xix. 7. 2063.
 xx. 12. 1912.
 xxi. 15.
 xxiii. 12. 3877-3879.
 xxvi. 16. 4111, 4112.
 20. 1844, 5087.
 xxix. 12. 4355-4357.
 20. 4355-4357.
 xxxii. 7. 4335-4337.
 25. 4111-4112.
 xxxiii. 8. 3187-3189.
 12. 1443, 2981.
 13. 941, 3754, 3755.
 xxxiv. 21. 3971.
 27. 2981.
 37. 4259-4262.
 xxxv. 22. 4060.
 23. 3980.
 EZRA.
 ix. 6. 146.
 NEHEMIAH.
 ii. 4. 5. 3778.
 iv. 15. 4027.
 v. 15. 2063.
 19. 3937.
 vi. 3. 1826.
 viii. 10. 2050, 3042.
 ix. 6. 2273.
 17. 2338, 2339.
 33. 146.
 ESTHER.
 ii. 3. 1901.
 iii. 1. 3978.

- v. 6. 3840-3843.
vii. 2. 3840-3843.
8, 9. 2126.
ix. 12. 3840-3843.

JOB.

- i. 1. 4497-4503.
3. 3978.
5. 8778.
6. 4096.
7. 1673, 1674.
8. 4497-4503.
11. 155.
21. 165, 1693.
ii. 3. 4497-4503.
4. 3256, 4580.
6. 3692-3695.
10. 3707.
iv. 20, 21. 689.
v. 7. 47-51.
13. 4027.
17. 3675, 3676.
vi. 9. 1656.
vii. 6. 3267.
viii. 7. 3614.
9. 1877.
viii. 14. 3024, 3029, 5008.
xi. 7. 1495, 1496, 2229-40.
20. 1408.
xiii. 15. 964, 3364.
xiv. 14. 1603, 1604, 1606.
xv. 4. 3521, 3731.
xvi. 20. 4214, 4215.
xvii. 9. 907, 3622.
xviii. 4. 1696.
6. 3020.
xix. 25. 572.
26. 4334-4354, 4649-67.
27. 1557.
xxi. 7. 3020.
15. 3322.
xxii. 2. 3431.
xxiii. 4. 3840-3845, 5082, 5085.
10. 57, 79, 100, 3696.
13. 2255, 2256, 3747, 3750-3753.
xxvi. 14. 1495, 1496, 1507, 2229-2240.
xxvii. 8. 1408.
10. 3008, 3718, 3734.
19. 4382, 4383.
xxviii. 18. 4597-4602.
28. 2608.
xxxi. 1. 4895 4898.
24. 4917.
xxxvi. 15. 2310, 2311.
xxxvii. 5. 1919.
xxxviii. 22. 5061.
xl. 5, 6. 2969, 3144.

PSALMS.

- i. 2. 495-499, 579, 2664, 2665, 2695, 3196, 3197, 3466, 3479-3484, 3585.
3. 2983.
ii. 8. 448.
9. 1161, 1162, 1166-68.
iii. 5. 6. 4058.
iv. 4. 3507.

- iv. 5. 4049.
6. 1252.
7. 2378, 2379, 4974.
8. 4058.
v. 1. 3841.
3. 2697, 3506, 3872-3876, 3887-3892.
vi. 6. 4214, 4215.
8. 1844.
9. 3754, 3755.
vii. 2. 2288-2294.
11. 4946, 4956.
12. 2296, 2301.
14. 4729.
viii. 1-4. 2968-2970.
2. 3356.
7. 5082.
2. 3038.
ix. 14. 756-762.
16. 4174.
4. 4915.
11. 3012.
13. 4924.
14. 2310, 2311.
17. 3754, 3755.
xiii. 1. 1645-1648.
5. 756-762.
xiv. 1. 4915.
3. 3390-3397.
7. 756-762.
xvi. 6. 1687.
8. 4760.
10. 844.
xvii. 5. 1009, 1069.
7. 4049.
14. 4966.
15. 4334, 4627-4630.
xviii. 6. 4049.
xix. 6. 3622.
7-11. 506-509.
8. 2217.
10. 3484.
11. 2855, 3200, 3596, 3611.
12. 4546-4549.
13. 4544-4545.
14. 3797-3823.
xx. 5. 756-762.
xxi. 1. 756-762.
xxii. 1. 1264, 1656.
2. 3723.
5. 4049.
16. 4627-4630.
21. 3754, 3755.
24. 3754, 3755, 4049.
26. 4070.
xxiii. 1. 961.
6. 5082.
xxiv. 4. 3622.
xxv. 10. 599.
11. 2334-2337.
15. 3794.
xxvi. 8. 3443.
11. 3971.
xxvii. 1. 1918.
4. 2639, 3966, 5082.
14. 2791.
2. 4049.
5. 232, 4947, 3705.
7. 1658, 2298.
xxxi. 16. 1252.

- xxxi. 24. 2791.
xxxiii. 1. 756-762, 3033-3042.
10. 4027.
12. 4164-4166.
xxxiv. 4. 3754, 3755.
5. 3521.
6. 3720, 3754, 3755, 4049.
10. 3758.
11. 2063, 2472.
14. 4597-4602.
19. 3661.
22. 4057, 4058.
9. 756-762.
xxxvi. 6. 2273.
8. 2833, 4070.
xxxvii. 1. 4939-4948, 4954-66.
5. 1923, 1929, 4946, 4948.
23. 2325, 3226.
24. 3677.
27. 4597-4602.
35. 36. 4612.
38. 4965.
xxxviii. 2. 2292.
8. 4763.
20. 727-730.
xxxix. 2, 3. 3734.
3. 3491, 3524.
6. 1537, 5014.
10. 113. 3638.
11. 435.
12. 4214, 4215.
xl. 1. 1144-1148, 3754, 3755.
4. 4049.
6. 3614.
12. 1262, 1486, 1487, 3880-3882.
xlii. 1. 1533.
2. 4627-4630.
4. 5078.
9. 1649.
xliiii. 4. 1018.
5. 1925.
xliv. 21. 2681-2683.
xlv. 7. 1500.
11. 1901.
xlvi. 5. 1246.
6. 884.
10. 4040.
xlvii. 7. 5068.
xlviii. 11. 756-762.
xlix. 6. 4407-4411.
14. 1114.
16. 4377-4383.
17. 4984.
l. 8. 2990.
15. 3900, 3723.
16. 4938, 5066, 5067, 5070.
22. 4922, 4924, 4938.
li. 1. 2309, 4562.
2. 4083.
4. 4591.
5. 4552-4553.
6. 3641.
7. 3811.
9. 4562.
10. 4073, 4263.
12. 340, 1011, 1082.

li. 16. 8614.
 lv. 8. 5082.
 17. 2697, 3791, 3866-79.
 lvi. 13. 1009.
 lvii. 7. 3498.
 lix. 5. 4544.
 15. 1252.
 17. 2347.
 lxi. 2. 3734.
 lxii. 2, 5. 4764.
 4. 738.
 10. 3984-4010, 4358-88,
 4389-4399.
 lxiii. 11. 2269-2274.
 2. 3427.
 3. 2378-2387.
 5. 3499, 4070, 4627-80.
 7. 756-762.
 lxv. 4. 4627-4630.
 13. 2955, 2956, 2964.
 lxvi. 16. 3907.
 18. 3864, 3858, 4264.
 19. 3754, 3755.
 lxvii. 1. 1252.
 6. 2912.
 lxviii. 3. 756-762.
 5. 465.
 10. 2310, 2311.
 13. 2310, 2311, 3667.
 lxix. 10. 2847.
 lxxi. 20. 2067.
 lxxii. 2. 448.
 8. 1161, 1162, 1166-68.
 12. 2310, 2311.
 lxxiii. 3. 4032-4034, 4939-
 4948, 4954, 4966.
 12. 3977-3980.
 17. 4966, 4035.
 18. 4966, 1009.
 25. 43-45, 2720, 2378-
 2387, 4162.
 25. 26, 1018.
 26. 4627-4630.
 lxxiv. 1. 189.
 lxxvii. 6. 4441-4445.
 9. 189, 1649.
 12. 3466-3479.
 18. 1919.
 lxxviii. 7. 220.
 20. 2341.
 lxxx. 3, 7, 19. 1252.
 lxxxiv. 2. 2381, 2385-2387,
 3427, 3443, 4129,
 4130, 4627-4630.
 4. 5082.
 7. 3965.
 11. 2306, 3052, 3753,
 3899, 3971.
 lxxxvii. 2. 1170.
 7. 1013, 1014.
 lxxviii. 7. 1486, 1487.
 lxxxix. 7. 2047, 3798, 3799,
 5071-5074, 5083,
 5085-5087.
 15. 2378.
 16. 756-762.
 xc. 2. 2258.
 10. 3259-3261.
 12. 1558-1561.
 xci. 11. 3902.
 16. 3257, 3258.

xciii. 1. 3170.
 xciv. 7. 3012.
 19. 1257-1259, 1832,
 1849.
 xc. 4, 5. 4205, 4232-4258.
 6. 3610, 3798, 3799,
 5071.
 7. 1438-1452, 3447.
 4. 4636.
 xcvi. 2. 4036, 4037.
 10. 4592-4595, 4597-
 4602.
 11. 1894.
 12. 3038, 3042.
 c. 2. 4123, 3038.
 3. 3610.
 ci. 8. 3498.
 cil. 3. 3493.
 4. 5082.
 13. 3884.
 ciii. 13. 958, 1284, 2314,
 2247, 2248, 2325,
 4181.
 14. 958.
 19. 3156, 3157, 3174.
 20. 21, 4143.
 civ. 6. 3157.
 10. 2955, 2962.
 cv. 24. 1498-1503, 2196.
 34. 3038, 3042, 3131.
 3488-3491, 3499.
 cv. 3. 756-762.
 4. 3726.
 cvi. 1. 2344.
 3. 3644, 4467.
 7. 45, 2309.
 15. 3758.
 45. 2256.
 cvii. 1. 2344.
 6, 19, 23. 2027, 3718,
 3719.
 13, 19, 28. 3718, 3719,
 3877-3879.
 17-19. 69.
 41. 2310, 2311.
 cix. 31. 2310, 2311.
 cx. 3. 2564.
 cxi. 2. 1499, 1503-1506.
 10. 2063.
 cxii. 3. 4355-4357.
 cxvi. 2. 3726.
 7. 39, 968-971, 2378-
 2387, 2861.
 8. 1009.
 10. 1927.
 15. 1552.
 cxviii. 21. 3754, 3755.
 28. 1952.
 cxix. 1. 3200, 3201, 3647.
 9. 1034.
 14. 3612.
 15. 3466.
 18. 607, 1087, 2869-
 2870, 2877, 2878.
 23. 3466-3479.
 25. 1599, 2067.
 37. 4717, 4895.
 45. 328.
 48. 3466-3479.
 49. 3521.
 54. 3218.

cxix. 57. 1018.
 63. 2123-2130.
 67. 60-65.
 71. 72, 117.
 77. 3196, 3197, 4123,
 4123.
 78. 3466.
 90. 3170.
 92. 3196, 3197.
 96. 3185.
 97. 3196, 3197.
 105. 630, 638, 4875-78.
 108. 630.
 113. 1830, 1837-1847,
 4591-4595, 4597-
 4602.
 116. 1011, 1012.
 133. 3832.
 135. 1252.
 140. 575.
 148. 3466-3479.
 163. 3196, 3197, 4591-
 4595, 4597-4602.
 165. 3196, 3197, 3645.
 174. 3196, 3197, 4123,
 4123.
 cxx. 1. 3754, 3755.
 cxxiv. 7. 5055.
 cxxvii. 1. 3735.
 cxxx. 4. 4219-4224.
 cxxxii. 1. 246.
 14. 1170.
 15. 2310-2311.
 16. 757.
 cxxxiii. 1. 1197, 1198.
 2. 2858.
 3. 4049.
 9. 1847.
 cxxxvii. 6. 955.
 cxxxix. 1. 2681, 2682.
 2. 2264.
 3. 966.
 7. 2257-2262.
 17. 1257.
 19. 8, 3506.
 cxli. 3. 2699.
 5. 2099.
 8. 3794.
 cxlii. 5. 1018, 4627-4630.
 7. 1623.
 cxliii. 5. 3466-3479.
 10. 2287.
 cxlv. 9. 1360, 4015-4018,
 14. 2312.
 18. 5069.
 19. 3895.
 cxlvi. 9. 4027, 4948.
 cxlvii. 3. 2312.
 11. 2819. cxlviii. 6. 3170, 3174, 3176,
 4141.
 8. 3971.
 11-13. 5088, 5089.
 cxlix. 2. 756-762.
 PROVERBS.
 l. 5. 8100.
 7. 2063.
 10. 4495.
 22. 687-703.
 28. 4253.

l. 32. 1329.
 ii. 4. 3841, 4853.
 7. 3971.
 9. 10. 3149.
 iii. 2. 3257, 3258.
 7. 2045, 4597-4602.
 8. 16. 4114.
 11. 3675, 3676.
 16. 3257, 3978, 4355-4357, 5062.
 33. 3779-3781.
 34. 2203, 2982-2985.
 iv. 14. 3252-3255, 4925.
 18. 2458, 2475, 2527, 8154, 3247, 3965-76.
 23. 33, 1841-1848, 2691, 2695-2698.
 25. 3239.
 v. 12. 4318-4320.
 vi. 16. 4591, 4592.
 vii. 2. 4559.
 viii. 13. 4592-95, 4597-4602.
 17. 4125, 4126.
 ix. 10. 2063.
 x. 17. 4318-4333.
 22. 4355-4357.
 xi. 4. 3990, 4332, 4333.
 xii. 1. 4318-4333.
 10. 1667.
 26. 1083.
 27. 3505.
 xiii. 7. 3010.
 9. 3020.
 15. 4496.
 18. 4318-4333.
 20. 4891.
 22. 419.
 24. 816-821.
 xiv. 13. 749, 750.
 14. 1081, 4070.
 16. 1384.
 27. 2063.
 34. 4164-4166.
 xv. 5. 10, 31, 32, 4318-4333.
 8. 3858.
 12. 4318-4320.
 13. 752.
 15. 752-755.
 23. 4237-4290.
 26. 1829-1831, 1836-41.
 xvi. 1. 3783, 3795.
 6. 2063, 4597-4602.
 7. 4597-4602.
 9. 3226.
 18. 19, 1359, 1362.
 19. 2964.
 xvii. 10. 4318-4333.
 13. 749-762.
 22. 752-755.
 xviii. 2. 2944.
 14. 3657, 4753.
 24. 964, 2390, 2170.
 xix. 4. 7. 964.
 xx. 27. 1309.
 xxi. 26. 406-412.
 27. 3858.
 30. 4027.
 xxii. 1. 721, 722, 3992, 3993, 781-788, 775-790, 794, 798, 799, 803-806, 808, 809, 811-

815, 1760, 1761, 1771, 1774.
 xxiii. 5. 3991, 4403-4406, 4979, 4986.
 7. 712, 717, 739, 740, 1829, 1841, 1842, 2691, 2692, 2695, 3567, 3571, 4073-4078, 4454.
 13. 14. 816-821.
 17. 2063, 4190, 5043.
 24. 1456.
 26. 2638.
 xxiv. 10. 29.
 12. 4603-4612.
 16. 4447, 4571, 4574.
 19. 3957.
 20. 3025.
 xxv. 2. 1536.
 26. 3936.
 xxvi. 10. 4948.
 12. 1384, 3094, 3590.
 xxvii. 7. 220.
 xxviii. 5. 1087.
 7. 3200, 3201, 3198, 3609.
 9. 3762.
 13. 2340, 4211, 4212.
 27. 451.
 xxix. 1. 687-703.
 15. 816-821.
 18. 3609.
 20. 3590.
 23. 2948.
 xxx. 8. 1718, 3934, 3985, 4358-4383.
 28. 5008.
 xxxi. 30. 485.
 ECCLESIASTES.
 l. 2. 2381, 2385, 2386, 4970, 5048.
 4. 3170.
 8. 4969, 4971.
 9. 3222.
 18. 8110.
 ii. 2. 749, 750.
 11. 4430, 5048.
 11. 12. 4970, 4972, 4974.
 14. 4052.
 16. 2210, 2218, 2219.
 iii. 26. 3977-3980.
 iv. 8. 3987-3991, 4366.
 10. 4332.
 v. 1. 5071-5074.
 2. 3798, 3799, 3804-3809.
 11. 3990.
 vi. 2. 2294, 3990, 4377-83.
 vii. 1. 721, 722, 1033, 1552.
 6. 3976.
 10. 990.
 14. 17.
 viii. 11. 2299.
 ix. 1. 3977-3980, 4944.
 2. 3. 4052, 5045.
 11. 1362.
 x. 1. 1033.
 19. 757.
 xi. 9. 641, 749-762.
 xii. 1. 1452.

CANTICLES.

v. 2. 1656.
 vi. 11. 2561.
 viii. 6. 3357.
 7. 3332.
 ISAIAH.
 l. 3. 2668.
 4. 3394.
 5. 3679.
 11. 2290, 3614, 4131-4134.
 11-15. 5066, 5067.
 14. 1500.
 16. 727-730.
 17. 3615.
 18. 3811.
 25. 86.

ii. 3. 3971.
 4. 2429, 2693.
 9. 2975, 2976.
 vi. 3. 361.
 9. 10. 2439-2442.
 4. 3991.
 13. 4922.
 ix. 9. 448.
 xi. 6. 827, 828, 3356.
 9. 1161, 1162, 1166-68.
 xii. 3. 3432, 3437, 3817, 3818, 5077.
 xix. 3. 4027.
 xxv. 8. 1594.
 9. 3038, 3042.
 xxvi. 3. 1915, 1917, 2916, 4053.
 4. 2254.
 10. 2423.
 12. 1015.
 xxvii. 5. 1985.
 9. 73.
 xxviii. 10. 2647, 3097.
 16. 1916.
 21. 2283, 2284, 3676.
 27. 28, 186.
 xxix. 10. 4951.
 11. 526.
 13. 3821, 3822, 5066, 5067, 6070.
 xxx. 10. 11. 2608-2612.
 21. 2872.
 xxxi. 5. 88.
 xxxii. 8. 451.
 xxxv. 8. 636, 2832.
 10. 756-762, 3047.
 xxxviii. 8. 3965.
 xl. 6. 1537, 1539, 1542.
 11. 961.
 18. 2228.
 29. 4015-4018.
 31. 2013, 3321, 3322, 3456, 3459, 5076.
 xli. 16. 754-762, 3038, 3042.
 xlii. 3. 951, 1283, 1996, 2470.
 xliii. 2. 138.
 xlv. 9. 4960.
 13. 3226.
 xlviii. 22. 2296-2301, 4963.
 xlix. 10. 2779.
 15. 4015-4018.
 l. 2. 2341.

i. 10. 991, 2005. ii. 11. 3047. iii. 6. 3390-3397, 4476. 10. 2328. iv. 8. 1656, 2324. 17. 4800. lv. 1. 943. 1-3. 1712. 6. 1444. 7. 2331, 2335, 4597-4602. 13. 1394. lvi. 15. 2253, 2955. 17. 18, 1659. 21. 2296-2301. lviii. 9. 3722. lix. 2. 1644. 5. 5003. 7. 1829-1831, 1842. lxi. 1. 4955. 10. 756-762, 3033, 3042. lxiii. 7. 2309. 8. 2245. 10. 2256, 2260. lxiv. 6. 1538, 1543, 1546, 1552, 1553. lxv. 14. 1083, 3047. 18. 3038, 3042. 24. 3722. lxvi. 1. 2228. 2. 3946. 13. 120.	ix. 23. 3987-3993, 4367-4369, 4372-4383. xii. 3. 4945. 5. 4713. xiii. 16. 2299. 23. 806, 1448, 4088, 4109. xv. 6. 2256. xvii. 9. 2669-2678, 2680, 3385, 3387, 3390-3397, 4433, 4434-4454. xviii. 8, 10. 2256. xix. 7. 4027. xxvi. 4. 3971. 13. 2256. 19. 2256. xxviii. 11. 280. xxix. 7. 1041. xxx. 14. 187. xxxi. 18. 2245. xxxii. 30. 3394. xliv. 4. 2281, 2282, 4478-80, 4592-4595, 5019.	xxxiii. 31. 2474, 2576. 32. 2577. xxxvi. 24-27. 3971, 4077, 4078. 25. 2331. 25, 26. 633. 26. 3208, 4067, 4073-76. xxxvii. 41. 3440. xxxix. 23, 24. 1644. xlvii. 9. 1151.
DANIEL.
i. 15. 26. ii. 33. 3965. iii. 15. 2269. 25. 3299. v. 3. 3978. 6. 1443. 20. 4011, 4012. 25-28. 4061. 27. 2996. 30. 4928. vi. 10. 2697, 3866-79, 4199. 13. 3840-3843. ix. 7. 146. 16. 3344. 21-23. 3722. xi. 35. 1244, 1245. xii. 4. 3097.
HOSEA.
ii. 14. 119. iii. 25. 3299. iv. 6. 3093. 17. 1451. vi. 14. 5043. viii. 2. 2027. x. 12. 1446. xi. 4. 2896. 12. 5069. xii. 14. 382. xiii. 3. 5043. 9. 443. 10. 8. 12. 3055. 14. 1594. xiv. 5. 1244, 1245, 2256-2858. 8. 4601. 9. 3971.

JEREMIAH. ii. 13. 4627-4630. iii. 12. 424. 23. 806, 1452-1455, 1458. iv. 3. 1446. 14. 1829-1847, 2574, 3508, 3882. 22. 4919. v. 7. 2350, 4008-4010. vi. 14. 1258, 1259, 1327-1333, 2608-2613. 20. 3614. 30. 2996. vii. 23. 3971. 22. 23, 2290. viii. 11. 1218, 1259, 1827-33.	ix. 23. 3987-3993, 4367-4369, 4372-4383. xii. 3. 4945. 5. 4713. xiii. 16. 2299. 23. 806, 1448, 4088, 4109. xv. 6. 2256. xvii. 9. 2669-2678, 2680, 3385, 3387, 3390-3397, 4433, 4434-4454. xviii. 8, 10. 2256. xix. 7. 4027. xxvi. 4. 3971. 13. 2256. 19. 2256. xxviii. 11. 280. xxix. 7. 1041. xxx. 14. 187. xxxi. 18. 2245. xxxii. 30. 3394. xliv. 4. 2281, 2282, 4478-80, 4592-4595, 5019.	LAMENTATIONS. i. 8. 4490. ii. 19. 3723. iii. 22. 2295. 33. 36.6. 40. 4459. iv. 1. 4626. EZEKIEL. iii. 3. 4174. 17-21. 2810. xi. 19. 3208. 19, 20. 4073-4076. 20. 3971. xiii. 13, 14. 2608-2612. 19. 4726. xvi. 6. 948, 949. 49. 809. xviii. 4. 605, 3188. 20. 3188. 31. 4073-4078. xxviii. 2-5. 4011, 4012. 5. 3982, 3983, 3994-96. xxxi. 10. 4011, 4012. xxxiii. 15. 3971.
---	---	---

MATTHEW. i. 21. 2853. ii. 11. 5071. iii. 7. 2795, 2806. 8. 2541, 3925-3930, 3954-66, 4269-4272. 10. 864, 2394. 12. 1183, 2802-2804. iv. 1. 4767-4806. 1-11. 868-871. 2. 865. 3. 2007. 6. 1934. 8. 4726. 9. 1677. 17. 2032. 20. 3631. v. 3, 4. 3880-3882.	v. 5. 2980. 8. 2244, 2709, 3052, 3128. 13. 14. 1237. 14. 1032, 1185, 1186, 3935, 4177, 4193, 4563-4569. 16. 731, 1042, 1044, 1089-1091, 1735, 3906, 4136, 4177, 4200, 4202. 20. 2990, 3566. 22. 28, 1835, 1842. 28. 1836, 4398. 38. 3211-3213. 40. 3169, 3169. 48. 744. vi. 1. 4091. 1-3. 2942-2945.	vi. 1. 5. 2994. 6. 2983, 3715, 3774-3777. 7. 3782, 3900, 3904-3909. 8. 3800. 9. 3801, 3925. 10. 979, 2287, 4143. 11. 3757. 13. 3856, 3857, 4708, 4717. 21. 470. 832. 22. 1031, 1085. 24. 4190. 25. 4641-4645. 30. 1990-2006. 33. 1063. 34. 2372-2374. vii. 2. 1739, 1742.	vii. 3. 4423. 3-5. 4281-4286. 7. 3751. 11. 3758, 4552-4558. 12. 1136. 13. 2790, 2793, 4213. 14. 2829, 3031. 15. 738. 16. 800, 2672, 3925, 3930, 3962. 16-20. 712-718. 17. 2404, 2456, 4096. 17. 18. 3574. 18-20. 1148. 19. 5063, 5064. 21-23. 3216. 31, 32. 4054, 4057. viii. 2. 1963. 4. 962.
---	---	---	--

viii. 9. 3627. 10. 2561. 25. 1246, 1247. 26. 2017.	xix. 16-22. 76. 20. 3591, 3603. 23. 4368-4369. 23. 24. 4389, 4397. 30. 3457. 31. 3920. 32. 3356. 33. 3961, 3963, 3964. 31. 32. 3593. 33. 4334-4354. 39. 3134. 35-40. 1136. 36-38. 4559. 37. 43. 45. 3332, 3343, 3349, 3366, 3947. 39. 1040. xiii. 3. 1136, 2990. 25. 1394, 1404, 2693. 25. 26. 1459, 1463. 27. 738, 2996, 2997-3006, 3952. 28. 2823, 2824, 4069-4071, 4073-76, 4080, 4081, 4106.	iv. 24. 1739, 1742. 26. 27. 1162, 2634. 27. 3246. 28. 25. 28. 2533, 2535, 2538, 2540, 2565, 2570. 31. 2518. 34. 5. v. 19. 942. 27. 1283. 39. 829-833, 1534. vi. 14. 16, 4943. 20. 721, 3209, 3622. vii. 21. 1829-1841, 1849, 2659, 2669-2678. 28. 1275, 1907, 1922. viii. 26. 30. 962. 34. 234, 3938-40. 4168. 36. 687-703, 4156 53, 4635-4637, 4920, 4921, 5021, 5022.	ii. 40. 764. 40-52. 845. iii. 5. 3581. 7. 2796, 2805. 8. 2541, 3925-3939, 3954-3956. 10-14. 4266. 15. 4760. 17. 2802-2804. 21. 864. iv. 1. 4767-4806. 1-13. 866-871. 3. 2007. 5. 4726. 7. 1677. 18. 4955. 27. 4168. 28. 29, 868. 29. 3907. 34. 2735. v. 5. 3433, 5021, 1462. vi. 98. 1739, 1742. 43. 2404, 2456, 3547. 43. 44. 4095. 44. 2692, 2693. 45. 3496, 4073-4074, 4136. vii. 8. 3627. 9. 2561. 28. 3125. 31-35. 1470. 37-50. 4230. 38. 2002. 45-50. 312. viii. 2. 1430. 5. 8, 2653, 2665. 12. 13, 18, 2570. 14. 3984-3986, 3994-4010, 4358-4365. 15. 2627, 3480. 18. 4249. 24. 1246, 1247. 44. 1283. 45. 1956. 52. 1534. 56. 962. ix. 7. 4963. 18. 2863. 23. 234, 3958-3960, 4168. 25. 4635, 4637. 26. 3906. 33. 3744. 44. 2626, 2663. 54. 275. x. 7. 448. 16. 2596. 27. 43-45, 1040, 3332, 3343, 3349, 3367-3366, 3947. 33. 1739, 1740, 1946. 35. 3462. 39. 2648. xi. 2. 979, 2287, 3825, 4143. 4. 3856, 3857, 4706, 4717. 8. 3803. 9. 3893-3902. 9. 10. 3751. 11. 3967. 13. 3758, 4552-4559, 4773. 21. 4516. 32. 2246. 39. 134, 1404, 1459, 1463, 2683.
x. 12. 3709-3713. 22. 3904-11, 3966-76. 26. 3056. 28. 4922. 29. 3402. 30. 3984, 4019-4022. 33. 3920. 38. 1046, 3963-3960, 4168. 38. 39. 87. 42. 968. xi. 10. 448. 11. 3125. 12. 3838. 16-19. 1470. 25. 2437. 28. 928, 929, 1481. 28. 29. 4171-4173. 29. 960, 2966, 2967. 30. 3202, 3341. xii. 19. 960. 20. 321, 951, 1283, 1996, 2470. 23. 2404. 29. 2698. 32. 2867. 33. 993, 2692, 2693, 3574, 3585, 4085. 34. 3496, 4073-4076, 4136. 34. 35. 2692, 2695. 44. 45. 2826. 45. 4516. xiii. 3-8. 2653, 2665. 5. 2526, 3961. 5. 6. 3970. 12. 4249. 21. 3058-3960. 22. 3861-3863, 3984-3986, 3994, 4010, 4358-4365. 31. 2518. 33. 1162, 2445, 2515, 2598. 34. 5. 42. 2291. 46. 619. xiv. 2. 4943. 19. 2504. 23. 2863. 30. 3719, 3808, 3837. 31. 1990-2006. xv. 9. 18. 2692, 2695. 13. 2422. 19. 1829-1841, 1849, 2659, 2669-2678. 27. 1275. 28. 1707, 1927. 8. 1890-2006. xvi. 18. 643, 1165, 1246-1251. 24. 234, 3958-3960, 4168. 27. 4603-4612. 4. 3744. xvii. 3. 987, 2820-2824. 6. 969. 10. 5043. 15. 4291-4293. 19. 20, 5075. xix. 14. 765.	xxiv. 3. 3062. 24. 3016, 3017. 39. 1544. 42. 3062. 42. 43. 4906-4910. 42-44. 980. 44. 1051, 1052. 46. 991. xxv. 3. 3015. 4. 1952. 8. 1471. 11, 12. 4256. 15. 4969. 21. 2406. 25. 727, 2206, 2207, 2736. 29. 4249. 34. 2865. 40. 965, 1746, 3366. 41. 2796, 2797. 42. 4415. 46. 2806. xxvi. 26. 3298-3301. 32. 3064. 35. 2084-2687, 4669. 36. 5087. 39. 3616. 41. 1849, 3515, 3252-3255, 3635, 3772, 4638, 4762. 42. 2287. 46. 2811, 2812. 46. 5058. 56. 1995. 62. 280. 75. 2529. xxvii. 5. 1556. 27. 4105. 46. 1264, 1651, 1657. xxviii. 2. 3949. 19. 2867, 4809. 20. 966. MARK. i. 9. 864. 13. 866-871, 4767-4805. 24. 2735. ii. 4. 1907. iv. 2. 8. 2653, 2665. 5. 3497, 3961, 3966. 16. 3961. 17. 3958-3960, 3976. 19. 3984-3986, 3994-4010, 4358-4365.	v. 19. 942. 27. 1283. 39. 829-833, 1534. vi. 14. 16, 4943. 20. 721, 3209, 3622. vii. 21. 1829-1841, 1849, 2659, 2669-2678. 28. 1275, 1907, 1922. viii. 26. 30. 962. 34. 234, 3938-40. 4168. 36. 687-703, 4156 53, 4635-4637, 4920, 4921, 5021, 5022. ix. 5. 3744. 9. 962. 21-26. 1446. 24. 2001. 42. 959. 43. 2802-2804. x. 14. 765. 15. 3490-3892. 20. 3591-4168. 21. 234, 1889, 3567-3570, 4458. 23. 3984-3986, 3994-4010. 25. 4358-69, 4389-97. 28. 1907. xi. 3. 3961. 11. 2684-2687. 24. 3827-3830. xii. 18. 4334-4354. 30. 33. 43-45, 3332, 3348, 3349, 3364, 3947. 31. 1040. 33. 3614. 34. 3570, 3586. xiii. 1. 3974. 13. 3106-3976. 33. 4906-4910. 37. 4556. 38. 980. xiv. 22. 2298-3301. 31. 4669. 34. 37. 3606. 36. 3616. 38. 3856, 3857, 4273, 4691-4717, 4743, 4762. 44. 5058. 50. 1995. 65. 3012. 72. 2529. xv. 34. 1264, 1651, 1657. 9. 1430. xvi. 16. 443, 2806, 2809. ST. LUKE. i. 11. 28, 255. 50. 2349. ii. 4. 3988. 9. 255. 10. 762. 11. 883. 13. 256. 19. 2662, 3474, 3495-3497. 25. 876. 29. 1602.

xi. 49. 4168.	xx. 27. 4334-4354.	vi. 35. 4130.	xvi. 13. 2860, 2870, 2877-
xii. 2. 3056.	xxi. 7. 3062.	37. 928-930, 2417.	2882.
5. 4922.	8. 4487.	51. 1784.	23. 24. 26. 3810.
7. 3654, 4019-4022.	12. 4168.	64. 1936.	xvii. 3. 2019, 3118, 3120,
8. 3904-3911.	19. 286.	vii. 17. 599, 1142, 2019,	3130-3142.
15. 1348, 1682, 1711-	34. 1544-1546.	3106, 3148.	4. 976.
1713.	34. 35. 3062.	19. 3609.	12. 945.
19. 3654.	xxii. 19. 3296-3301, 3309-	37. 395.	15. 4194.
20. 4419, 5015.	3311.	38. 1068, 1081.	16. 5026-5032, 5037.
23. 4641-4645.	24. 3764.	viii. 9. 4284-4286.	21. 999, 1190-1214.
24. 3882.	31. 4770.	12. 877, 878, 978,	24. 3823.
28. 1990-2006.	32. 1921, 3778.	3577.	26. 3140.
35. 1051, 1052, 1562.	40. 1489, 3252-3255.	34. 36. 4955.	xx. 25. 2017.
40. 1051, 1052.	40. 46, 3856, 3857.	50. 2871, 3199.	29. 2020.
48. 2202, 2394, 2398.	42. 2287, 3616.	37. 4090.	xxi. 3. 3433.
49. 2244.	45. 4273, 4691-4717,	40. 4838-4840.	15. 991, 3331.
xiii. 7. 2394, 3961, 3963,	4743, 4762.	ix. 4. 1444.	17. 1282.
3964.	44. 3724, 4804.	6. 3442, 3446.	18. 3695.
19. 2404, 2518.	48. 4006, 4491.	7. 3440.	21. 1508, 1518.
21. 1182, 2445, 2575.	62. 2529, 4224, 4229.	25. 1144-1148.
23. 24, 702, 1388,	xxiii. 43. 1508, 4216, 4257,	39. 2441.	ACTS.
1508, 1518.	4258.	x. 9. 879-881.	i. 8. 1243, 2835-2838,
24. 702, 2790, 2793,	xxiv. 30. 3369.	11. 961.	25. 4959.
3589, 3931, 4213,	31. 1610.	35. 635.	ii. 24. 27, 31, 844.
4738.	32. 2887, 3148.	xi. 44. 4334-4354.	44-47. 1240.
32. 3392.	45. 3143.	24. 2480.	iii. 19. 3611.
xiv. 18. 4205.	52. 845.	xx. 26. 965.	21. 979.
23. 5076.	ST. JOHN.	32. 2419, 2442.	iv. 2. 4334-4354.
27. 1046, 3958-3960.	i. 1. 875.	48. 5057.	14. 3933.
xv. 8. 397.	9. 385.	xiii. 7. 113, 3103-3155,	18. 292.
10. 259.	11. 2678.	3700-3702.	23. 5037.
17. 4070.	12. 1959, 1961, 4863.	14. 4316.	34. 35. 1240.
18. 3825.	14. 846, 849, 850,	15. 1851, 3347.	v. 9. 4373.
20. 2314.	1137.	17. 2399.	31. 4249, 4250.
xvi. 9. 3647, 4961, 4962.	16. 935, 939, 2342,	34. 3347.	40. 292.
9-11. 4415-4421.	2751-2753, 2852,	35. 3329, 3370-3373.	vi. 9. 1375, 1376.
10. 2854, 3244-3251.	2979.	xiv. 1. a. 1589.	vii. 51. 2899.
13. 4190.	17. 3216.	2. 4632.	60. 1636, 3726.
15. 4081.	ii. 10. 4998, 4999.	6. 838, 1986.	viii. 21. 4080, 4081.
18. 4580.	11. 3539, 3541.	7. 3527.	31. 2643.
19. 4013.	iii. 3. 974, 975, 1087.	9. 2241.	37. 1936.
21. 4415, 4559.	3-5. 2730-2738, 2820-	11. 3543.	ix. 6. 1725, 3726, 4126.
22. 258.	2824.	13. 14. 3810.	11. 2471, 3721, 3788.
31. 3539, 3544.	4. 4840.	15. 987, 3309-3311.	x. 38. 2205-07, 3289.
xvii. 1. 1163, 1164.	5. 3209, 4063-4128.	21. 991, 3309-3311,	34. 3447.
2. 959.	8. 1412, 1413, 2893,	3609, 4460, 4461.	xi. 18. 4249, 4250.
10. 3288, 4226.	2896, 2898, 2906,	21. 24. 974, 975.	xii. 7. 1627, 1628.
20. 1414, 1423, 1424.	5447, 5456.	23. 840, 973, 975,	10. 1468.
1426-1429, 1546,	9. 591, 3629, 4112.	2900, 3335-3342.	xiii. 46. 2807.
1559, 2239, 2526,	10. 3119.	24. 2609.	xiv. 22. 197, 2793.
2536, 2634, 2637,	14. 1944, 1999, 2000,	26. 2867.	xv. 2. 1229.
4026.	2004.	27. 1591.	9. 327, 1897, 1984.
24. 3893.	14. 15. 1946, 1948.	30. 4068.	39. 1331.
27. 1544.	16. 398, 854, 2249,	33. 1637, 1638.	xvi. 6. 2867.
30. 2895.	2319, 2320, 2417,	xv. 1. 4050.	13. 5081.
xviii. 1. 3803, 3839, 3893-	3350, 3351.	1. 2. 2394, 2516.	26. 1576.
3902.	17. 1140.	2. 126, 192, 215,	31. 1942, 1961, 1964,
3. 3837.	18. 1949, 3057.	2394, 2516, 2714-	3611.
11. 2993, 2994, 3014,	18. 36. 2808, 2809.	2718.	xvii. 2. 17, 1375, 1376.
3563.	36. 2435, 2438, 3582.	4. 1000, 1005.	11. 2615-2617.
13. 1593, 3788, 3797,	7. 3763.	4. 5. 748, 931, 2358,	18. 4334-4354.
3805, 3809, 3812,	11. 3321, 3437, 3450.	2852.	21. 2577, 2591, 2594.
3816.	14. 1081.	5. 796, 882, 993-	26. 3419, 3420.
16. 765.	15. 3450.	995, 1024, 1025,	27. 3399.
17. 3890-3892.	20. 3777.	1241, 1401.	28. 397, 3402.
21. 3591.	24. 2223, 3793, 3796,	8. 737, 3155, 3613,	30. 3032, 3681.
22. 1889, 2667-3670,	3812-3816, 5069,	3944.	31. 957.
4458.	5070, 5084.	11. 1083.	xviii. 4. 19, 1375, 1376.
23. 4367-4369.	29. 2448.	12. 3347.	8. 1375, 1376.
24. 3984-39. 6, 3994-	42. 883.	12. 17. 3329, 3370-	15. 4761.
4010.	43. 2428.	3373.	28. 2867.
25. 4358-4369, 4399-	17. 3530.	13. 948, 949.	31. 2810.
4397.	17. 957.	14. 987, 2900.	35. 1736-1743.
xx. 2. 4355-4357.	28. 4334-4354.	16. 3840.	xxiii. 6. 8, 4334-4354.
4. 2944.	39. 4853.	19. 2846.	xxiv. 5. 4334-4354.
12. 1290, 1967.	40. 1406, 2807.	xvi. 2. 1290, 1300-1307.	5. 1445, 4248.
14. 2679.	vi. 15. 1160.	8. 1472.	26. 4917.
17. 2562.		12. 13. 4875-4878.	xxv. 7. 5043.

- xxvi. 9. 1290, 1300-07.
18. 4088.
xxvii. 22-25. 31, 44, 1790.
xxviii. 22. 1045.
5. 1847.
- ROMANS.
- i. 3. 849.
5. 1843, 1988.
7. 990.
16. 1045.
17. 1892.
20. 1491, 1494, 1504.
ii. 1. 4281-4286.
6. 4603, 4612.
9. 2296-2301.
15. 1286-1290.
20. 738.
iii. 10. 3390-3397.
19. 20. 3584.
20. 3193, 3194, 3354.
20. 28. 1476, 1969-75.
2418.
22. 1971.
iv. 9. 22. 1972.
19. 2017.
24. 1975.
v. 1. 1894, 1969-1975.
2. 2918, 3502.
5-5. 215, 221.
5. 2867, 3361, 3362.
6. 8. 397, 948, 949.
8. 1140, 2319-2321.
2678.
12. 1536-1538.
16. 1016.
20. 934, 2332-37, 2376.
vi. 4. 1980, 3971.
14. 3160, 3161.
16. 3199.
19. 3621, 4454.
22. 993, 2855.
23. 1962, 4491-4496.
3578.
vii. 6. 1096, 1097, 1136.
7. 2423, 3194.
9. 1340, 1341, 1490.
3191.
9. 10. 13. 2630.
18. 1007, 1055, 4068.
23. 24. 1053.
24. 1699, 1618, 3216.
4482-4484.
25. 3395, 3398.
viii. 1. 2825, 3057.
1-5. 2813.
2. 2871, 3534.
3. 849, 3210, 3398.
3. 12. 3395.
4. 3971.
5. 1030.
6. 4102.
5. 11. 14. 2905.
7. 2677-2679, 3575.
9. 2900, 2902-2904.
19. 4095.
14. 2872, 2873, 2875.
15. 2050.
16. 2906-2908.
17. 1076.
18. 3703.
20. 23. 3388.
22. 393, 3674.
23. 2787.
24. 3502.
26. 200, 2668-98, 3795.
3847-3849, 4763.
28. 1244, 1245, 3699.
- 3700-3703, 4028.
4051.
2264.
29. 30. 1796-1802.
30. 1776, 1777.
32. 854, 1140.
37. 3703.
ix. 6. 1016.
14. 4039.
20. 4038, 4039.
2. 3. 3582-3593.
10. 1936, 3110, 3124.
3903.
12. 2422-2424.
13. 3336.
14. 2641.
xi. 6. 2405-2409.
22. 2180-2184, 2316.
2317, 2795.
xii. 1. 2393.
2. 5033-5043.
3. 3014.
4-8. 2193-2201.
6. 4874.
11. 2764, 3831-3838.
4137-4139.
17. 1041.
19. 3957.
21. 4914.
xiii. 8-10. 1136.
11. 12. 1117.
12. 982.
xiv. 1. 1283.
4. 1280.
7. 4596.
17. 1028, 4102, 4134.
4135, 4151-4154.
4174.
17. 18. 1136.
19. 2208.
20-23. 1308.
xv. 4. 1258, 3501.
13. 350, 1893.
xvi. 26. 1983, 1985.
- I. CORINTHIANS.
- i. 1. 990.
10. 11. 1218-1230.
10-12. 1822, 1823.
17. 1399.
17. 18. 1141.
18. 2439-2442.
18. 23. 1087.
21. 479, 3440, 3442.
4107-4111.
24. 841, 842.
26-28. 1093, 2437.
27. 2598.
30. 3953.
h. 4. 1307, 2608.
5. 2598.
6-14. 606.
9. 2714-17, 2789.
10. 598.
12-15. 1087.
14. 974, 975, 2437.
2738-3860.
iii. 3. 1218-1230.
5. 3477.
6. 7. 3430.
7. 2599.
26. 2902, 2904.
18. 3590.
21. 1078, 1080.
22. 1631.
iv. 7. 1360, 2462, 2979.
3563.
13. 1079.
- iv. 15. 3447.
16. 2597.
v. 6. 3632, 4515.
10. 5033, 5035-37.
13. 1231.
17. 4067.
vi. 7. 3163, 3169.
19. 2902.
20. 4415.
vii. 23. 4415.
29-31. 5033.
31. 1163, 1155.
4975-89, 4993.
5032.
viii. 2. 4877.
ix. 25. 1106, 1153, 1155.
27. 3123, 3853, 4640.
x. 4. 1010, 1080.
11. 2301.
12. 4881-4884.
13. 181, 3918.
16. 3299.
27. 650, 653.
31. 1019-23, 1031.
1158, 2988.
3573, 4091.
4188-90, 5030.
xi. 8. 739.
18. 1218-1230.
24. 3296-3301.
3309-3311.
28. 3317, 3320.
4423-4475.
29. 3318.
3. 2883.
4-30. 2193-2201.
22. 1300.
25. 1822, 1823.
31. 2208, 2568.
xiii. 1. 2215, 3011.
2. 3121.
5. 2931.
8-12. 3125-3129.
9. 4827, 4875-78.
10. 4815.
11. 2568, 4990.
13. 2040, 2041.
3328.
xiv. 9. 2208.
15. 5068.
20. 1215-1217.
xv. 9. 10. 4065.
10. 2979.
12-52. 4334-4354.
22. 396.
24. 979, 985.
31. 1547, 3272.
33. 5037, 5056.
34. 687-703.
41. 1210.
54. 1594.
55. 1612, 2559.
xvi. 22. 3368.
xxviii. 9. 3620, 3634.
- II. CORINTHIANS.
- i. 3. 4. 202.
10. 122.
20. 3749.
22. 100, 2903.
24. 2010, 2011.
ii. 10. 391.
11. 1669-1672, 4673-
4683, 4691.
14. 2642.
16. 2439-2442, 2458.
2461.
iii. 2. 4177.
- iii. 2. 2622, 2623.
3. 741, 2397.
5. 1005, 2361.
6-9. 3216.
10. 18. 1121.
17. 2871, 3192.
18. 1048, 3742, 3743.
iv. 4. 848, 1663.
6. 1121.
8. 9. 1349.
16. 1616, 1552.
16. 18. 1694, 1695.
2766-2799.
17. 22. 210, 216, 219.
2645, 2723.
2727, 2793.
3700-8, 4623.
18. 176.
v. 1. 4649-4667.
4-8. 1601.
5. 2903.
7. 1926, 2173-2175.
2178.
8. 1632, 2775, 2778.
2780, 2789.
9. 1576.
9. 10. 3058, 3059.
10. 957, 3063, 3251.
4603-4612, 4648.
11. 2810, 3478.
14. 1003, 1004, 1152.
3352-3356, 3578.
3642.
17. 4093, 4114-4124.
20. 2432.
21. 394.
vi. 10. 1351.
14. 1232, 2887.
16. 2902.
17. 1035, 1040, 1043.
5035, 5056.
vii. 1. 2045, 2046-2048.
2054, 2484, 2489.
9. 10. 227.
20. 1460, 1461, 2836.
3267, 4249-4231.
11. 746, 747, 2028.
4269-4272, 4575.
viii. 1. 3083, 3090.
7. 732-736.
ix. 8. 993-995, 1024.
23-25. 1349.
x. 5. 4116.
7. 2996-3005.
12. 2970, 4465.
xi. 29. 1238.
xii. 7. 3853.
9. 1066, 1280, 2366-
2374. xiii. 5. 739, 2456, 4423-
4475.
8. 1165, 1375, 1376.
4828-4831.
14. 2867.
xiv. 3. 4. 2437.
- GALATIANS.
- i. 8. 2617.
16. 1393, 3616.
ii. 4. 4294.
16. 1969-75, 3596-98.
3604-3607.
20. 748, 885, 972, 3145.
iii. 10. 2330, 4504-4505.
4449, 4450.
11. 1892.
13. 382.
20. 2979, 3578.

III. 24. 1969-1975.
27. 4182.
IV. 1-3. 3214.
4. 849.
5. 382.
16. 4838-4840.
19. 3578.
20. 2846.
V. 2. 1945, 1950, 2545,
2546.
6. 2006, 2036, 2401,
2421.
7. 2547, 2550, 3968,
3973-3975.
9. 4515.
15. 1218-1230, 1239.
16. 4119.
16, 17. 1057, 1060, 1061.
17. 2907, 3398, 4638,
4639.
22. 2897, 2905, 3330.
29. 3632.
VI. 1. 2684-2687.
2. 3534.
3. 3014.
6. 4611, 4612.
7. 3246.
9. 1045.
12. 1046, 3934, 3958-
3960.
14. 1035, 1949.

EPHESIANS.

I. 1. 1179.
4. 1779.
6, 7. 942, 946.
10. 391.
11. 2867.
13. 100.
14. 2903.
17. 2532.
23. 4015-4018.
II. 1. 3312, 3564, 4489,
4863, 4933.
2. 1632.
3. 4552-4558.
942, 946, 1005-16,
4068.
7. 3476, 3417, 3421-23.
8. 1976, 1977.
9. 1013, 1014, 2411.
10. 1077, 2404, 3971.
12. 3575, 4957.
22. 2900-2902.
III. 17. 2030.
19. 950, 1069, 2385,
2388, 2389, 2751-
2753.
20. 2337, 2366-2374.
IV. 1. 3971.
3-13. 1190-1214, 1220.
4-6. 1171-1174.
8, 11. 12, 926.
13. 2664, 4154.
15. 1028, 1200, 4311-17.
19. 4539, 4540.
20. 4120.
22-24. 1034.
23. 2488.
24. 1072.
26. 2696.
27. 4507-4509.
30. 2867-2899, 4054.
35. 274.
V. 1. 4141, 4150-4153.
9. 2545, 2546, 4079.
14. 687, 703, 4952.
15. 1032, 3926, 4177.

V. 17. 5068.
VI. 4. 775-790, 794, 798,
799, 803-806, 808,
809, 811-815.
6. 4146, 4147.
7. 3636-3638.
8. 3539.
11. 1668-1672, 4426,
4673-4683, 4691.
12. 1664, 1661, 2499.
16. 1661.
17. 627, 628.
18. 3776, 4906-4910.

PHILIPPIANS.

I. 1. 990.
6. 1070.
9. 2532.
11. 1084.
13. 14, 92.
16. 2548.
21. 1003, 1004, 1572-
1578, 1586, 1613,
1630.
23. 1103, 1104, 1110,
1133, 2559, 2775,
2780-2789.
24. 4146.
II. 3. 2937-2941.
4. 1177, 1201, 1223,
1224, 1238.
6-8. 853.
9. 977, 978, 983.
12. 1490, 1787, 1792,
1796, 2045, 2046,
2048.
13. 1002, 1015, 1401,
1407, 2353.
15. 1237, 4193, 5037.
III. 1. 756-63, 3038, 3049,
3050.
12. 2054, 2063.
12-14. 996, 1062, 1071,
2475, 2500, 2505.
13. 2848, 2849, 3948,
4463.
13, 14. 996.
14. 1105.
17. 1868, 2597.
19. 5020, 5049, 5063.
20. 1029, 1030, 5041.
21. 4334.
IV. 4. 756-62, 3038, 3049,
3050.
5. 982, 1155.
6. 3740, 3756, 3767,
3802, 3820.
8. 46, 732-736, 2545,
2546, 3618-3626,
4153.
11. 1349, 1705, 1719.
12. 1349, 1350.
13. 2791.
19. 2364-2374.

COLOSSIANS.

I. 1. 990.
3. 4. 1047.
10. 993-95, 1024, 2532,
3971.
11, 12. 162.
12. 4098-4102.
19. 935-939.
19, 20. 391.
21. 2432.
27. 3502.
4. 2908.
II. 4. 3147.

II. 6. 1980, 1981, 1983,
2476-2478, 4119.
13. 3582.
15. 382, 3708.
22. 2087.
III. 1. 5063.
2. 43-45, 2770, 5050,
5061.
3. 1001-1002.
4. 885, 1114.
5. 1058, 4085.
9, 10. 4066, 4067, 4079.
10. 1072.
12. 2937-2941, 2948.
16. 2644.
17. 1158, 4188-4190,
4196-4198.
19. 821.
24. 4147.
IV. 2. 4906-4910.
5. 3931, 3932.
6. 802.
12. 732-736.

I. THESSALONIANS.

I. 3. 2916, 3662.
5. 2365, 2385-2388.
15. 727-730.
II. 12. 3911.
13. 3866-3879.
IV. 1. 3971.
3. 3983.
10. 2488, 2490, 2492,
2496, 2586, 2569.
13. 472, 2913-2921.
13, 15. 1636.
V. 3. 2298.
6. 4897-4914.
8. 2910.
16. 1083, 3817, 3818.
17. 3731-3733, 3745,
3746, 3767, 3782-
3902.
19. 2640, 2642.
20. 3439-3464.
21. 1128, 1139, 1139,
1375, 1376, 1824,
4833-34, 4842-47.
VIII. 22. 4563-4569.

II. THESSALONIANS.

I. 3. 2564.
II. 13. 1779, 3953.
14. 3447.
III. 10. 3852.
13. 1045.

I. TIMOTHY.

I. 1. 2936.
4. 1367-1370, 1508-18.
8. 4124.
9. 3160, 3161.
11. 2295.
15. 1484, 1783, 2958,
3354.
II. 1. 5080.
III. 9. 2053.
15. 534.
16. 1140, 2415.
IV. 2. 1313-1315, 1445,
4539, 4540, 4949-
4951.
10. 927.
12. 1854-1856.
13. 655-686.
15. 3094, 3096, 3466-69.
16. 4137.
V. 6. 3682.

V. 21. 4864-4871.
VI. 4. 1367-70, 1508-18.
6. 4422.
7. 4407-4411.
8. 1685, 1686, 1688-92,
2327, 5060.
9. 17, 4358-4369.
11. 727-730.
12. 4634.
12. 19. 696.
17. 402, 1231, 4372-83,
4975-4988.
17, 18. 454.

II. TIMOTHY.

I. 6. 2468.
7. 4833.
8. 1045.
10. 1613, 3415.
12. 1148, 1587, 1592,
1641.
13. 4833-4836, 4842-
4848.
II. 3. 1046, 1690, 3914-21,
3958-3960.
4. 3616.
14. 3511.
19. 4569.
20, 21. 2193-2201.
21. 4105.
23. 1367-1370, 1508-18,
3077, 3085.
26. 4482-4484, 4776,
4954.
III. 5. 3976.
7. 2475.
12. 3958-3960.
13. 1452.
15. 617.
16. 480-515, 633, 634,
646.
16, 17. 1034.
IV. 2. 4305-4317.
3. 2577-2582, 2590.
5. 3967.
6. 2559.
8. 1106.
10. 4393, 4940, 5058.

TITUS.

I. 2. 2910-2912, 3502.
13. 4305-4308.
15. 1316.
16. 4500, 4501.
II. 10. 46, 731, 992, 2397.
12. 2776.
14. 832, 5037.
18. 3038.
III. 5. 2874.
2. 3502.
9. 1218-30, 1367-70,
1508-1518.

HEBREWS.

I. 1. 1120, 3214.
3. 855-857, 3530.
II. 1. 1625.
3. 687, 703, 2436,
4918, 4923.
4. 2867.
7. 8. 4205, 4232-58.
10. 872, 873.
13. 4274-4333.
14. 382, 1568, 1570.
18. 4790-4794.
III. 6. 2918.
6, 14. 3966-3976.
7, 15. 1438-1452.

- iii. 8. 4636.
 13. 3909.
 15. 3447.
 iv. 7. 1438-1452.
 9. 2042, 2723, 2729, 2761.
 11. 2759-2764, 2768.
 12. 15, 16, 956.
 13. 16. 2257-67, 2359, 2681-2683, 5086.
 15. 4790-4794.
 16. 2047, 3796, 3824-3826.
 v. 7. 4763, 3834.
 12. 3102.
 vi. 1. 2391, 2458.
 2. 4334-4354.
 5. 2771-2779, 4651, 4652.
 7. 1024.
 7. 8. 2394, 2395.
 12. 1867-1872, 1896.
 18. 4634.
 19. 2932, 4765.
 20. 925.
 25. 941.
 vii. 5. 3215.
 viii. 16. 572.
 ix. 27. 1536, 1542, 3063.
 x. 19. 3824-3826.
 25. 2843, 3058, 3060, 3438-3464.
 25. 37, 982.
 26. 2191.
 26. 27, 2811.
 32. 3674.
 36. 151.
 36. 37, 3669.
 38. 1892, 4747.
 xi. 1. 1873, 1904.
 4. 1859.
 5. 3665, 3669.
 6. 3067, 3737.
 7. 1892, 1913, 2043.
 13. 1100-1102, 3218, 3284.
 24. 3674.
 27. 1908, 2044.
 30. 1167.
 37. 189.
 xii. 1. 3618-3626, 4550, 4551, 4580, 4581.
 2. 4471-4474.
 4. 2671.
 5-7. 56.
 5-10. 3675, 3676.
 6. 2322.
 6-8. 190, 194.
 10. 2817, 2842, 2843.
 11. 215, 724, 3700-2, 3696-3699.
 14. 727-30, 2730-38, 2820-24, 2827, 2829-2832, 2866, 2865, 3128.
 15. 2759-2764.
 16. 3462.
 23. 1635, 2740-2743.
 28. 3798, 3799, 5071-5074.
 xiii. 5. 1688-1690, 2373.
 8. 837.
 13. 1036.
 16. 455, 2396.
 28. 3622.
- THE EPISTLE OF JAMES.
 i. 2. 4778, 4787.
 2-4. 12, 215.
 4. 148-154, 4194.
 4-12. 3709-3713.
 6. 3827-3830.
 11. 4382, 4383.
 12. 4795.
 13. 2279, 4795.
 14. 1679, 4685-4690, 4728.
 15. 4491-4495, 4534.
 17. 2460, 3323, 3747, 3750-3753, 4111.
 18. 1918-1986.
 19-25. 2618-2621.
 22. 737, 2399, 3609.
 23. 3192.
 25. 2583, 3199.
 26. 2699.
 27. 3961, 3962, 4142.
 ii. 5. 5044, 5047.
 10. 3187.
 10, 11. 4504-06, 4510.
 16. 466.
 17. 2037, 2398-2409.
 20. 995.
 22. 3103-3124.
 iii. 2. 2699.
 4. 3659.
 iv. 1. 1716.
 3. 3729.
 6. 2148, 2955.
 7. 1677, 1678, 2368, 2671, 3950, 3951, 4731-4747.
 8. 2982-2983.
 10. 4259-4262.
 14. 3263, 3264.
 17. 4559-4561.
 v. 7. 2524, 3669, 3712.
 8, 9. 982.
 10. 1851, 1867-1872.
 11. 739, 743, 3707.
 16. 3747, 3748, 3831-39.
- I. PETER.
 i. 2. 3953.
 3. 320, 1076, 2910-12.
 4. 2721-27, 3918, 5047.
 5. 1011, 1067.
 6. 3038, 3042, 4947.
 6-8. 4169.
 7. 724, 4781.
 8. 1082-1084, 3045.
 8, 9. 2713.
 12. 257, 2365.
 15. 2514-2517, 4191.
 15. 16. 744.
 17. 2054, 2063.
 18. 382, 4631-4633.
 23. 4068.
 24. 1837, 1542, 4975-89.
 25. 642-645, 1247.
 ii. 2. 2447, 2592, 2638, 2647, 4833.
 5. 4099.
 11. 1100-2. 1688, 3218.
 12. 4200-4202.
 15. 1981.
 21. 1851, 2499, 2849, 2850, 2856, 4461.
 23. 280.
 iii. 4. 2948.
- iii. 11. 4497-4503.
 15. 2474.
 iv. 7. 4897-4914.
 8. 3363.
 12. 1687, 3697.
 16. 162, 1045.
 v. 5. 2939-41, 2982-85.
 5. 6. 4259-4262.
 6. 2948, 2955, 2961.
 7. 2371-2374, 3741.
 8. 1673, 1674.
 9. 1922.
- II. PETER.
 i. 1. 1258, 2416, 2840.
 2. 2532.
 4. 3501, 3521, 4466.
 5. 1896, 2398, 2481, 2482, 2505, 2545, 2546, 3092.
 5-7. 729, 736, 4204.
 5-10. 2851-2854.
 5-8. 4148, 4149.
 10. 1787, 1793, 2505, 2759-2764, 4140.
 11. 1106.
 12. 2591-2594.
 16. 846.
 21. 2867.
 ii. 3. 1441.
 7. 963, 3916.
 9. 4806.
 15. 4491.
 iii. 4. 365, 3181, 4924.
 8. 3421, 3713.
 9. 3669.
 10. 1796, 3061.
 14. 980, 3058, 3059.
 16. 593.
 18. 745, 1435-37, 2473, 2560, 3091, 3097-3102, 4808.
- I. JOHN.
 i. 1, 2. 846.
 1, 3. 1144-1148.
 5. 2317.
 7. 3971.
 8. 4473.
 9. 1270, 2340, 4441, 4614, 4724.
 ii. 1. 3825.
 6. 3971.
 15. 43-45, 1035, 5065.
 19. 743, 3969, 4097.
 20. 1067, 2869, 2871, 3148.
 iii. 2. 1085, 1089, 1071, 1074, 1075, 1112-1119, 1135, 2237, 2240, 3273, 3282-3284, 3286, 3287, 3291-3293, 3373, 3416, 3667, 4814.
 3. 327.
 4. 4559.
 9. 2856, 4117.
 11, 14, 23. 3370-3373.
 14. 4114-4124.
 16. 5034.
 18. 3347.
 iv. 1. 1824.
 2. 849.
 4. 1280.
 8. 3675.
- iv. 9. 2319, 2320.
 10. 946, 2318, 2678, 3351.
 12. 3370-3373.
 18. 3333.
 19. 3351, 3363.
 v. 3. 3202, 3638.
 4. 2041.
 7. 4814.
 10. 1851, 1906.
 14. 3761.
- II. JOHN.
 ver. 4. 3971.
 5. 3370-3373.
- III. JOHN.
 ver. 11. 727-730.
- JUDE.
 ver. 9. 1826, 1827.
 4. 2349, 2350, 4219-24.
 7. 2301.
 12. 994.
 20. 2213, 2884.
 22, 23. 4295-4297, 4311-4315.
 24. 1068.
- REVELATION.
 i. 9. 3708.
 ii. 5. 425.
 6. 1500.
 26. 982, 3966-3976.
 iii. 1. 3945, 3946, 4426-4428, 4434, 4443.
 2. 3425.
 3. 4252.
 11. 4453, 4454, 4456, 4457, 4833.
 16. 3030.
 17. 2958.
 20. 973, 2899.
 iv. 6. 2729.
 v. 4. 527.
 8. 3809.
 9. 2645, 2700.
 vi. 22. 3363.
 vii. 9. 2744, 2745.
 14. 3811.
 15. 2718.
 16. 2779.
 viii. 22. 534.
 xii. 10. 1667.
 11. 627.
 xiii. 10. 2524.
 xiv. 3. 2645.
 6. 2420, 2750.
 11. 2806.
 13. 1094, 1095, 2729.
 xv. 3. 4035.
 xvi. 15. 4252, 4897-4914.
 xix. 13. 875.
 xx. 9. 2291.
 12. 1297, 3054, 3055, 3063, 4603-4612.
 xxi. 25. 2724, 3723.
 27. 2730-2738.
 3. 2716.
 5. 2724, 3723.
 7. 3609.
 11. 720, 4249.
 12. 4603-4612.
 17. 943.
 27. 4098, 4102.